11–14 These verses could mean that the foremost are “brought nigh in Gardens of bliss” (Ṭ), brought nigh to the Divine Throne (Z), or brought nigh unto God Himself (Aj, JJ). Ibn ʿAjībah notes that the ones brought nigh were greater in earlier times with regard to quantity, not quality. Those toward the end of time are considered by some to be of a higher degree, because they have awakened in a time of heedlessness and exerted themselves in a time of lassitude. Thus because they achieve spiritual awakening without many of the supports available to previous generations, God grants them a rank given to no others (Aj). Regarding the spiritual devolution of human beings over time, the Prophet said to his Companions, “You live at a time when whoever omits one-tenth of what he has been commanded [to do] shall be ruined. But there will come a time when whoever fulfills one-tenth of what he has been commanded [to do] shall be saved.”

Some maintain that those of old means earlier religious communities and those of later times means the Muslim community (IK, JJ, Ṭ). Others interpret them as references to earlier and later generations of Muslims (Z), in accordance with a famous ḥadīth, “The best generation is mine, then those who follow them, then those who follow them” (Aj, IK). The foremost among those of later times are seen as those mentioned in another hadīth: “A group among my community ceases not to follow the truth (zāhirīn ‘alā al-ḥaqq) until the Hour is come, unharmed by those who fail to support them and those who oppose them” (IK).
Regarding the conditions of later times that cause others not to support the foremost, a hadīth states that at this time, “rapacity reigns, passions are obeyed, the world is given priority, and each person admires his own opinion.” From this perspective, these verses point to an ever greater spiritual devolution of human beings rather than progress over time.

15 upon embroidered couches,

16 reclining upon them, facing one another.

15–16 Several verses indicate that the people of Paradise recline upon couches, meaning that they are content and at peace (see 18:31c; 55:54c).
Embroidered is here interpreted to mean that the cushions are encrusted with gold or pearls and rubies (Q, Sh). Some also view the couches as thrones, indicating that those reclining upon them have attained a high rank (see also 18:31; 36:56; 52:20; 76:13; 83:23, 35). Facing one another (cf. 15:47; 37:44; 44:53) implies that none shall need to sit behind another since all will be equally exalted.

17 Immortal youths wait upon them

17 According to the Islamic tradition, those who died before they were of the age to be held accountable for their sins or rewarded for their good deeds serve the believers in Paradise. According to a saying attributed to the Prophet’s Companion Salmān al-Fārsī, “The servants of heaven are the children of the idolaters” (Aj, Q, Sh). In contrast, in a statement attributed to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, they are said to be the children of Muslims (Q, Sh).

with goblets, ewers, and a cup from a flowing spring, wherefrom they suffer neither headache nor stupefaction,

18–19 The mention of drinking vessels is used as a metonym for the drink itself. Ewers translates abārīq, which is said to derive from the verb baraqa, meaning, “to shine, glitter, sparkle,” and is thus taken to indicate vessels that glitter and sparkle from their purity (Q, Sh). From a flowing spring (cf. 37:45) indicates that the liquid is pure and the source never runs dry. Though wine is forbidden to Muslims in this life (see 4:43; 5:90), they are said to enjoy a wine in the Hereafter that bears none of the negative side effects of the wine of this world (cf. 83:25–28). Nor stupefaction (cf. 37:47) translates lā yunzafūn, which can also be read as describing the springs, in which case it is read lā yunzifūn, an expression said of a well that does not dry up, thus indicating that this wine will never cease to flow (Q). For more on the wine of Paradise, see 47:15, which speaks of Paradise containing rivers of wine delicious for those who imbibe. Of this wine, the poet ʿUmar ibn al-Fāriḍ (d. 1235) writes in his Wine Ode: “It refines the character of those who drink it: / The irresolute it guides to the path of resolve, / The miser’s hand it makes generous, / And when anger strikes it instills / Forbearance in one with no clemency.”

20 with fruits as they choose,

and the meat of birds as they desire,

20–21 Cf. 52:22; 77:42. Several other verses also refer to the fruits of Paradise that will be at the disposal of the believers (e.g., 37:42; 38:61; 43:73); see 36:57c. The birds of Paradise are described in several ṣaḥādat as multicolored birds with extraordinary necks and wings; yet when people expressed wonder at their beauty, the Prophet is reported to have said, “Those who eat them are more blessed than are they” (Q, Sy). Elsewhere it is said that the inhabitants of Paradise shall have whatsoever they will (16:31; 25:16; 39:34; 42:22; 50:35).
and [there shall be] wide-eyed maidens, the likeness of concealed pearls,

as a recompense for that which they used to do.

22–24 For the meaning of wide-eyed maidens, see 44:54c. Here it may be read as the subject of the sentence along with immortal youths (v. 17), meaning that both serve the foremost. Or it may be read as another of those blessings that the foremost receive in Paradise. The likening of wide-eyed maidens to concealed pearls indicates both their exquisite beauty and that they remain untouched, as in 55:56 and 55:74. Regarding all such allusions to the blessings of Paradise, there is a famous ḥadīth qudsī: “God says, ‘I have prepared for My righteous servants what no eye has seen and no ear has heard and what has not occurred to the heart of any human being; so recite if you will, No soul knows what comfort is kept hidden for it [32:17].’”

They hear no idle talk therein, nor incitement to sin, save that “Peace! Peace!” is uttered.

25–26 Cf. 14:23; 19:62; 52:23; 78:35; 88:11. Nor incitement to sin (see also 52:23) translates taʾthīm, which can also indicate that there is no lying or any form of sinful speech. These verses can be taken to mean that the inhabitants of the Garden will hear only the greeting “Peace be upon you” (Sh), with which Muslims greet one another in this world, that they will hear only peaceful speech, or that they will hear the words “Peace, Peace” (Aj), as the discourse of the people of the Garden is said to be remembrance of God and wisdom (Aj). Peace (salām) as employed here comprises spiritual soundness, freedom from all evils and defects, and inner contentment.
And the companions of the right; what of the companions of the right?

As translated, what of the companions of the right? expresses wonder at their state (Aj). Others interpret it as an expression of God’s Grace, meaning, “How fortunate are the companions of the right” (IK).

Among thornless lote trees,

Whereas the lote trees of this world have thorns and few fruits, those of Paradise are said to have no thorns and many fruits (IK). Arabian lote trees are believed to be mentioned as a tree of Heaven because of their large leaves under which one can find shade (Iṣ), and can thus be understood as a reference to shade as part of the contentment one finds in Paradise. Thornless translates makhḍūd, which could also mean “fruit-laden,” implying that they almost touch the ground.

Clustered plantains,

Clustered (manḍūd) indicates fruit that covers a tree from top to bottom (JJ) and is so dense that the trunk of the tree is no longer visible (Aj). Though most interpret the trees bearing the clusters as plantains, which are called ṭāllī in Yemen (JJ), others believe what is meant is a large thorny shrub that used to grow in the Ḥijāz (IK).

According to a ḥadīth, the Prophet said, “In the Garden there is a tree in whose shade a rider would travel for a hundred years without the shade being broken. That is the extended shade” (Q, R, Ṭ). Shade translates ẓill, which also denotes “covering” or “shelter,” and can be used figuratively to imply “protection” (Iṣ). Zill is also taken by some to indicate “a state of ease, pleasure, and plenty,” thus “happiness.” This verse and other references to “shade” can thus be seen as allusions to the eternal security and felicity attained in Paradise.

31 gushing water,

31 Gushing translates makhdūd, which indicates water that is not confined to channels (IK, R, Ṭ, Z), and is interpreted to mean that water flows to those in Paradise wherever and however they wish without any effort on their part (Aj, Z). While there is wine for the foremost and boiling liquid for the companions of the left, the companions of the right enjoy pure water.

32 and abundant fruit,

33 neither out of reach, nor forbidden,

32–33 That this fruit is not out of reach is consistent with the descriptions of low-hanging clusters (69:23, cf. 76:14) and the fruits near at hand (55:54) mentioned in other verses. It could also be translated “not cut off,” meaning that there is no season in which this fruit is not available (IK, R, Z).

34 and [upon] raised beds.

34 Raised beds translates furush, which can also be used in classical Arabic as an allusion to women (Iṣ). Thus several commentators relate this verse to 36:55–56: Truly the inhabitants of the Garden on that Day will be busy rejoicing, they and their spouses reclining upon couches in the shade (Aj, Z). This interpretation is supported by the use of the feminine plural pronoun hunna in the following verse, so that this verse could be read “spouses made high,” in which case it is related to the mention of the wide-eyed maidens in v. 22; 44:54;
Truly We brought them into being as a [new] creation,

As a [new] creation could also be translated “in an immediate manner.” This verse implies that the maidens of Heaven are always fresh and untouched.

then made for them virgins, amorous peers,

According to a ḥadīth, the Prophet was asked about those referred to in vv. 35–37 by his wife Umm Salamah. He responded, “They are those who in this world were rendered gray, bleary-eyed, and blind. After their old age God will make them [youthful] peers” (Āl, IK, Q, Ṭ). Amorous implies intimacy and love, while peers implies both that they are of the same age, which is said to be thirty-three years (Aj, Q), and that they are spiritually compatible.

for the companions of the right—

and many from those of later times.

Although vv. 35–37 can be read as a description of the wide-eyed maidens (v. 22) when v. 34 is read as an allusion to them, others see the wide-eyed maidens as bestowed upon the foremost, and the amorous peers as bestowed upon the companions of the right (Q). Whereas the foremost who are brought nigh are few in later generations, the companions of the right will continue to be plentiful as time goes on.

Amidst scorching wind and boiling liquid,

Scorching wind translates samūm, which indicates a wind that penetrates the pores (masām) of one’s body (Aj, Q, Z). Boiling liquid translates ḥamīm, which can mean both intense heat and severe cold, both of which are said to afflict the denizens of Hell (see 78:24–25).

and the shadow of black smoke, neither cool nor refreshing.

In contrast to the extended shade (v. 30) that provides unending security and peace for the inhabitants of Paradise, the shade of Hell has no positive attributes (Z); the comforting image of shade is replaced with the ominous image of the shadow of black smoke, which obscures true vision and indicates impure, even choking air. Like the passions and distractions of this world, such shadows are ephemeral, appearing to grant shade, but only obscuring true vision and understanding by cutting off one’s supply of the air of intellectual and spiritual clarity until they blow away. Such ephemeral shade can even harm the one who seeks shelter in it, as in 77:29–32: Away to that which you used to deny! Away to a threefold shadow that provides no shade, nor avails against the flame. Indeed, it throws up sparks like massive tree trunks.
Truly before that they lived in luxury,

That they lived in luxury indicates that the companions of the left had no inkling of the judgment to which they would be subjected. It translates mutrafiin, which can also indicate pursuing pleasures without any moral considerations.

would persist in great sin,

That the companions of the left would persist in great sin alludes to the fact that God’s Forgiveness was open to them, had they desisted and repented. Great sin can mean sin in general or the one great sin, namely, polytheism (Aj, IK), which is considered the only unforgiveable sin, as in 4:48 and 4:116: Truly God forgives not that any partner be ascribed unto Him, but He forgives what is less than that for whomsoever He will. In the present verse, sin translates hinth, a word that alludes to the phrase hanitha fī yamīnihi, meaning, “He broke the oath that he had taken with his right hand” (Q, Sh, Z), and could thus be seen as an allusion to breaking the covenant with God (see 7:172c). When a youth reaches the age of puberty it is said that he or she has reached the age of hinth, meaning the age at which a person can now break the original covenant made with God before the creation of the world and must now adopt the observance of a revealed religion in order to properly maintain the covenant.

and would say, “What! When we are dead and have become dust and bones, are we to be resurrected?

What! And our fathers of old?”

These verses express a common objection to the Quranic teaching regarding bodily resurrection (cf. 17:49, 98; 23:82–83; 36:78; 37:16–17, 53; 50:3; 79:11).
Say, “Truly those of old and those of later times are gathered for the tryst of a day appointed.”

49–50 All human beings from the beginning of creation until the end of time will be gathered together on the Day of Judgment; see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.”

Then indeed you—O you straying deniers—shall eat from a tree of Zaqqūm, and fill your bellies therewith.

51–53 Just as the inhabitants of Paradise have fruits that befit their station, so too the inhabitants of Hell are provided with “nourishment” befitting their station. The tree of Zaqqūm is best described in 44:43–46: Truly the tree of Zaqqūm is the food of the sinner, like molten lead boiling in their bellies, like the boiling of boiling liquid (also see commentary on 37:62–63; 44:43–46). That their stomachs are full implies that they continue eating even when full, because their rapacious natures can never be satiated.

Then you shall drink from boiling liquid, drinking as do parched camels.

54–55 For boiling liquid (ḥamīm), see 56:42c. Parched camels translates al-hīm, which relates to rabid camels (hiyām); the disease gives them an unquenchable thirst (Aj, IK, Z). Al-hīm is also interpreted to mean smooth earth covered with sand, indicating that they drink sand or a sandy beverage that increases thirst rather than quenching it (Q, Z).
This shall be their welcome on the Day of Judgment.

Welcome translates nuzul, which literally means food prepared to honor “one who is arriving” (nāzil). There is a sense of irony here, as if to say that they have received the meal they sought, similar to the irony in 3:21: Give them glad tidings of a painful punishment (Q); and 4:138: Give glad tidings to the hypocrites that for them awaits a painful punishment.

We created you. Would that you affirm it.

Would that you affirm it could also mean, “Even if you do not affirm [it].” Here the deniers are being asked to affirm either that God created them, that they will be resurrected (Q, Z), or both.

Have you considered that which you emit?

Is it you who created it or are We the creators?

That which you emit is taken by most as a reference either to sperm alone (Ṭ, Z), as in 53:46, from a drop when emitted (Z), or to both sperm and ovum, as in some interpretations of 86:6–7. For v. 59, see also 52:35.

We have decreed death among you, and none outstrips Us.

We have decreed death among you indicates that God takes people at various times, through various infirmities, and for varied reasons that they cannot discern (Aj, Qu) and that no one is able to avoid or delay the moment of death that God has ordained. For a similar verse, see 70:41.
in replacing [you with] your likenesses and bringing you into being again in what you know not.

You have indeed known the first genesis. Why, then, do you not reflect?

61–62 These verses are taken to mean that if one recognizes that it is God Who creates and fashions human beings in the first genesis, meaning the first time, one will recognize that God has the ability to resurrect them (Q). Some also take it to indicate that God can resurrect human beings as monkeys or pigs or any form He chooses (Aj, Q). Why, then, do you not reflect? could also be rendered as an expression of amazement, “Yet you do not reflect!” (Q), or of regret, “Would that you had reflected.”

Have you considered what you reap?

Is it you who sow it or are We the sowers?

Had We willed, We would have turned it to chaff, such that you would remain bitterly jesting, [saying] “Truly we have suffered loss.

Nay! We are deprived.”

63–67 This pericope is similar to 18:42, which says of a disbeliever who had lost his crop: So he began to wring his hands on account of what he had spent on it, while it lay in waste upon its trellises, saying, “Would that I had not ascribed anyone as partner unto my Lord!” It is reported that the Prophet said, “Let none of you say, ‘We caused [something] to grow,’ but rather, ‘We sowed it’” (Aj, Āl, IK, Q). There is also an implication, as in the next pericope, that human beings fail to be thankful for the provisions God gives them, focusing more upon what does not come to fruition than upon what God provides them, as is also implied in v. 82. Bitterly jesting translates tafakkahūn, and here indicates both amazement and regret (Q). Deprived translates maḥrūm, which indicates someone who has been cut off from receiving provision (Aj).

68) Have you considered the water that you drink?

69) Is it you who sent it down from the clouds, or is it We Who send down?

70) If We had willed, We would have made it bitter; will you not, then, give thanks?

68–70 Other verses allude to God’s power to remove water at any time (e.g., 18:41; 67:30), and in several verses, water . . . sent down is used as an allusion to blessings from God (e.g., 35:27; 39:21; 41:39); in others, the manner in which God brings forth life through water is cited as a sign for those who believe (e.g., 2:164; 6:99; 7:57; 80:25–30); and 21:30 states, And We made every living thing from water (see also 24:45; 25:54). Ingratitude for water thus implies ingratitude for all God’s Blessings and for the gift of life itself.

71) Have you considered the fire that you kindle?

72) Is it you who brought into being the tree thereof, or is it We Who bring into being?

73) We made it a reminder and an enjoyment for the desert dwellers.

71–73 Fire is a reminder insofar as it reminds one of the Resurrection or the Fire in Hell (Aj, Bd, T), regarding which the Prophet said, “This fire of yours that human beings kindle contains but a seventieth of the heat in Hell” (T). Desert dwellers translates muqwīn, which can also refer to all travelers (Q, Sh, and is taken by some as a reference to everyone who benefits from the use of fire (Q, Sh, Ṭ).

74 So glorify the Name of thy Lord, the Magnificent!

This is one of many verses in which human beings are enjoined to glorify God. It can also mean, “Glorify by the Name of thy Lord,” thus indicating a command to invoke the Name of God. The term for “glorification,” tasbīḥ, indicates declaring something transcendent beyond all else. In this context it indicates that, although God is responsible for all of the things mentioned in vv. 58–73, He is completely beyond them, both insofar as He performs many other tasks and insofar as none of their perceived deficiencies can be attributed to Him. The Magnificent can be taken to modify either Name or Lord (Bd). This verse can also be seen as a command to glorify God, since God’s Glory is beyond what anyone else can say of it (Aj).

75 I swear by the places where the stars descend!

I swear translates fa-lā uqsimu. In this context, the particle lā in fa-lā could imply emphasis or negation. Most interpret it to function as the former, but some see it as a particle of negation, in which case it would be translated, “Nay, I swear” (Q, Sh, Ṭ). The verse would then mean, “I denounce what you say, [and] I swear . . .” The places where the stars descend most likely refers to the time, place, or manner in which celestial bodies set or to the stations of the stars referred to in 85:1 and 25:61 (R, Ṭ). It can also be taken as a reference to the fading of the stars on the Day of Judgment (see 81:2; R, Ṭ). When taken as a reference to the setting of the stars, it is seen as an allusion to the times of night that are thought to be best for supererogatory devotions (Aj; see 76:26; commentary on 73:1–2, 20). Stars translates nujūm, which could also mean “portions or progressive installments.” It could thus be rendered, “I swear by the descending of the progressive installments [of the Quran],” an interpretation attributed to some early commentators who see this verse as a reference to the gradual revelation of the Quran, three, four, and five verses at a time, over a period of twenty-three years (610–32; IK, Q, Ṭ); see 17:106c; 25:32c. The places where the stars descend can also be seen as an allusion to the hearts of God’s servants, angels, messengers, and the righteous among the believers into which the stars or the progressive installments of the Quran descend (R).

76 And truly it is a magnificent oath, if you but knew.

76 This verse is read by some with a full grammatical stop after oath, in which case if you but knew is read as a conditional phrase with an implied response, such as, “If you but knew, you would affirm” (Aj, R), or “If you but knew, you would act on what that knowledge entails” (Aj), or “If you but knew, you would strive to attain certainty” (R).

77 Truly it is a Noble Quran

77 It can be seen as a reference to everything that has been mentioned thus far in this sūrah or to the whole of the Quran (R). In this instance, Quran may be read according to its linguistic meaning, “Truly it is a noble recitation.” Noble translates karīm, which indicates the joining together of all praiseworthy attributes (R, Sh). What is noble (karīm) is said to be of pure origin and manifest bounty (R).

78 in a Book concealed.

78 In this context, Book is taken by most to mean the Preserved Tablet (85:22; Aj, Q, R, Sh, Ṭ), which is said to contain all of the books of revelation. That it is both noble and concealed indicates that the Quran is preserved from the influence of anyone but God and thus that it is not, as the Prophet’s detractors alleged, the whisperings of jinn or fables of those of old (6:25; 8:31; 16:24; 23:83; 25:5; 27:68; 46:17; 68:15; 83:13; R).
79 None touch it, save those made pure,

It may be read as referring to a Noble Quran (v. 77), or a Book concealed (v. 78) and thus to the Preserved Tablet (Aj, Q, R, T). Others take it as a reference to the physical book containing the written Arabic Quran (muṣḥaf; Aj, Q, T). Based upon this latter interpretation, many interpret this verse to mean that no one may touch the physical Quran unless they are in a state of ritual purity, though there is extensive debate regarding this issue. If taken as a reference to the Book concealed, then those made pure can be taken as a reference to the angels (Aj, Q, T) or to the angels and prophets. In this vein, some relate this verse to 80:13–14, which speaks of pages honored, exalted and purified (Q, T). It can also be understood to mean that no one will actually understand the allusions of the verses that they are reciting, save one whose heart has been purified (Aj). As al-Ghazzālī writes in The Revival of the Religious Sciences, “Just as the external side of the leather of a Quranic codex and its pages are protected against the external skin of a person who touches it except when he is pure, so also its internal meaning is veiled, by the authority of its greatness and might, from the internal aspect of the reader’s mind, except when it is pure from all defilement and is illuminated by the light of glorification and reverence. Just as every hand is not fit to touch the leather of the codex, so too every tongue is not fit to recite its letters, nor every mind fit to understand its meanings” (K. al-Qirāʾah).

80 a revelation from the Lord of the worlds.

This verse is repeated in 69:43. Both instances can be taken as direct responses to those who said that the Quran was fables of those of old (6:25; 8:31; 16:24; 23:83; 25:5; 27:68; 68:15; 83:13), poetry, or mere whisperings from Satan and jinn. In this vein, it is related to 26:210–11: And the satans did not descend with it, nor is it fitting for them, nor are they able.
Do you then scorn this discourse,

81 Scorn translates mudhinūn, which implies both demeaning and denying or “those who take something lightly” (Aj). It can also indicate those who appear tractable and compliant in order to hide their disbelief (Q). The verbal form dahana is thus translated “compromise” when it is said of the disbelievers in 68:9: They wish that thou might compromise and that they might compromise. In this sūrah, mudhinūn can also be understood to indicate those who take religion lightly and are thus willing to deny the revelation secretly, while pretending to believe in it publicly.

and make the denial thereof your provision?

82 This verse is interpreted to mean, “Do you deny that your provision is from God, when in fact you should thank God for your provision?” (Aj, Q). It is reported that some read this verse with “thanks” (shukr) in the place of provision (IK, Q, Sh, Ṭ, Z), though this is probably a case where an interpretation was recorded as a noncanonical reading. According to a ḥadīth, one morning after a downpour, the Prophet said, “God has said, ‘Some of My servants arose as believers in Me and some as disbelievers. He who has said, “We have had a rainfall by the grace (fadl) and Mercy of God,” is a believer in Me and a disbeliever in the stars; and he who has said, “We have had a rainfall by the rising of such and such [a star],” is a disbeliever in Me and a believer in the stars’” (IK, Q). Some say that it was in relation to this event that this verse was revealed (Sh, Ṭ).

Why, then, when it reaches the throat,

83 It is a reference to the soul when it reaches the throat at the moment of death, as in 75:26–28: Nay! But when it reaches the collarbones, and it is said, “Who will [make him] ascend?” And he knows for certain that it is the parting.

84 This verse refers to those who are looking on as another dies, yet have no ability to make the soul stay in the body (IK, Ṭ). Vv. 83–85 point to the unique perspective that death imparts both to the dying and to those witnessing the death of another. Suddenly one realizes that the connection to this world is ephemeral and that God is ever near. Upon witnessing death, one is thus reminded that truly we are God’s, and unto Him we return (2:156).

— and We are nearer to him than you, though you see not—

85 God is nearer to human beings at all times than they are to themselves, and He has power over them at every moment, despite their illusions to the contrary, as in 50:16: We are nearer to him than his jugular vein. The manner in which God exercises this power at the moment of death is most clearly expressed in 6:61–62: And He is Dominant over His servants. He sends guardians over you, till, when death comes unto one of you, Our messengers take him, and they neglect not their duty. Then they are returned unto God, their true Master. Surely judgment belongs to Him, and He is the swiftest of reckoners.

why, then, if you are unconstrained, do you not return it, if you are truthful?

86–87 This verse asks, “If you do not owe your life to God and are yourself responsible for it, why do you not control the moment of death when the soul will be returned whence it came?” or “Why are you unable to return the soul to the body after it has reached the throat?” (Aj, IK, Q). Unconstrained translates ghayr madīnīn, which could also mean “if you are not indebted,” indicating, “If you truly own your own soul and do not owe the debt of your soul to God, then you should be able to control whence it came and whither it will go.”
È

88–94 This last section returns to the categories of human beings discussed in the first half of the sūrah. Each reference is in the singular, as if referring to the soul of the dying person mentioned in vv. 83–87, but nonetheless entails a general discussion of what confronts all souls at the moment of death. These verses are read by some as a discussion of the intermediate realm said to be experienced by all souls after the smaller resurrection, when they reside in the grave before the final resurrection of all human beings for the Day of Judgment (Aj); regarding this intermediary realm, known as the barzakh, and the relationship between the two resurrections, see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.”

É

89 then comfort, bounty, and a Garden of bliss.

88–89 Those brought nigh will be relieved of the cares of this world (Aj, Q, Sh, T). Comfort is interpreted as an allusion to being in God’s Mercy (raḥmah), a cooling breeze (nasīm; Aj, Q), or the direct vision of God’s Face, while bounty alludes to hearing God’s Word (Q). Bounty translates rayḥān, which is also the name for sweet basil. Rayḥān is also rendered fragrant herbs in 55:12, where it refers to the blessings of this world rather than the bounties of the next. As employed here, some say it refers to the basil of this earth (Th), while others say it refers to the scent of Paradise, a perfume that fills the souls of those brought nigh (Aj, IK). Several commentators quote a saying attributed to Abū al-ʿĀliyah (d. 90/708), a Quran teacher among the second generation of Muslims: “None among those brought nigh departs this world until they have been given some of the rayḥān of the Garden; so he smells it, and is then taken” (Aj, IK, Th). Rayḥān is also understood as an allusion to and symbol of the provisions in Heaven or to Heaven itself (Aj, Th). Others say comfort means being saved from the Fire, and bounty means entering the Everlasting Abode (Th). Still others say comfort refers to the grave and bounty refers to the Garden (Th).
And if one be among the companions of the right, then peace unto thee from the companions of the right.

90–91 These verses can be understood to mean that, after souls are questioned by the angels (see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran”), one who is among the companions of the right will be greeted with salutations of peace from the companions of the right (Aj) or salutations from the angels (IK), as in 41:30–31: Truly those who say, “Our Lord is God,” then stand firm, the angels will descend upon them, [saying], “Fear not, nor grieve, and rejoice in the Garden that you have been promised. We are your protectors in the life of this world and in the Hereafter; therein you shall have whatsoever your souls desire, and therein you shall have whatsoever you call for” (IK). In this vein, these verses are also interpreted as an indication that they are promised safety from any and all harm (Q). The shift to the second-person singular, thee, is interpreted by some to mean that the companions of the right give salutations of peace to the Prophet, saying, “Peace unto thee, O Muhammad” (Aj, Q, Th). Alternately, it can be understood as an address to the individual who hears or reads this verse.

But if one be among the deniers who are astray, then a welcome of boiling liquid, and burning in Hellfire.

92–94 Welcome translates nuzul; see 56:56c. V. 93 is similar to 37:67: Then on top of it they will have a brew of a boiling liquid; for the broader implications of boiling liquid (ḥamīm), see 56:42c. As with vv. 88–91, some see these verses as referring to the intermediary realm, though others cite them as proof that disbelievers may be cast into the Fire at the moment of death (Aj). They can also be understood as describing both their punishment in the intermediate realm after the lesser resurrection yet before the greater resurrection and their punishment in Hell after the greater resurrection; for the distinction between these two resurrections, see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.”

95 Verily, this is the truth of certainty;

95 This is read as a reference to what has been mentioned in the immediately preceding verses regarding states of souls in the intermediate realm (R, Ṭ) or to all that has been mentioned in this sūrah (Aj, Q, Sh). The truth of certainty is understood by most to indicate “the truth of what is certain” (Q, R, Sh, Ṭ). It is reported that regarding this verse Qatādah (d. 117/726), one of the foremost commentators from the third generation of Muslim scholars, said, “God does not leave anyone until He has informed him of this Quran; as for the believer, he is made certain of it in this world, and that benefits him on the Day of Resurrection. As for the disbeliever, he is made certain of it on the Day of Resurrection when certainty of it will not benefit him” (Q, Ṭ). According to this interpretation, this verse could be taken as a reference to the entire Quran (R). The truth of certainty is considered by many to be a reference to the highest level of certainty, above the knowledge of certainty (102:5) and the eye of certainty (102:7); see 102:5c. In discussing these levels, some liken the knowledge of certainty to hearing of or being informed of a fire, the eye of certainty to seeing the fire, and the truth of certainty to being consumed by the fire; see 27:7c.

96 so glorify the Name of thy Lord, the Magnificent!

96 So, which translates the particle ʾfāʾ, can be understood to indicate either the order of actions or that the truth that this sūrah contains requires the affirmation of God’s Greatness and Transcendence (Aj).
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Some scholars consider al-Ḥadīd Makkan, while most consider it Madinan (Āl, IK, JJ, Sh). The sixth/twelfth-century commentator Ibn ʿAṭiyyah proposes a potential resolution to this dispute, saying that it has Madinan verses, but it appears that its middle part is Makkan. It takes its name from the phrase We sent down iron in v. 25. Al-Ḥadīd is the first in a group of five *sūrah*s known as “The Glorifiers” (al-Musabbihāt), meaning those *sūrah*s that begin with a glorification of God; the others are 59, 61, 62, and 64. According to a ḥadīth, “Within [the Glorifiers] there is a verse that is better than a thousand verses” (IK, Q, Sh). Some scholars are of the opinion that this ḥadīth refers to v. 3 of this sūrah (IK, Sh), while others propose that it refers to the last verse of Sūrah 59, al-Hashr (Sh).

Al-Ḥadīd begins with six verses that emphasize the Omnipresence and Omnipotence of God. The next five verses (vv. 7–11) then enjoin belief in God and spending one’s wealth in the way of God. This is followed by four verses (vv. 12–15) that contrast the fate that awaits the believers and the hypocrites on the Day of Judgment. The fourth and longest section (vv. 16–24) begins with a call in v. 16, which most say is to believers, to humble or soften their hearts to the remembrance of God. It then discusses the ephemerality of this world and the illusory nature of its delights, continuing the call to spend of one’s wealth from the second section and the contrast between believers and disbelievers from the third. The last section (vv. 25–29) extends the discussion to the People of the Book, criticizing them for having failed to be true to their prophets and calling upon them to believe in the prophethood of Muhammad.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. Whatsoever is in the heavens and the earth glorifies God, and He is the Mighty, the Wise. 2. Unto Him belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth. He gives life and causes death, and He is Powerful over all things. 3. He is the First, and the Last, and the Outward, and the Inward; and He is Knower of all things. 4. He it is Who created the heavens and the earth in six days. Then He mounted the Throne. He knows that which enters the earth and that which issues therefrom, that which descends from Heaven and that which ascends thereto. He is with you wheresoever you are, and God sees whatsoever you do. 5. Unto Him belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth, and unto God are all matters returned. 6. He makes the night pass into the day and makes the day pass into the night, and He knows what lies within breasts. 7. Believe in God and His Messenger and spend from that over which He has appointed you as trustees. For those of you who believe and spend, theirs shall be a great reward. 8. How is it that you believe not in God when the Messenger calls you to believe in your Lord—and He has indeed made a covenant with you—if you are believers? 9. He it is Who sends down clear signs upon His servant to bring you out of darkness into light, and truly God is Kind and Merciful unto you. 10. And how is it that you do not spend in the way of God when unto God belongs the inheritance of the heavens and the earth. Not equal among you are those who spent and fought before the victory. They are greater in rank than those who spend and fight afterwards; yet God has promised unto each that which is most beautiful, and God is Aware of whatsoever you do.  \(^{11}\) Who is it that will lend unto God a goodly loan? He will multiply it for him, and his shall be a generous reward.  \(^{12}\) On the Day when you see the believing men and the believing women with their light spreading before them and on their right, “Glad tidings unto you this Day: Gardens with rivers running below, therein to abide. That is the great triumph.”  \(^{13}\) On the Day when the hypocrites, men and women, will say to those who believe, “Wait for us that we may borrow from your light,” it will be said, “Turn back and seek a light!” Thereupon a wall with a gate will be set down between them, the inner side of which contains mercy, and on the outer side of which lies punishment.  \(^{14}\) They will call unto them, “Were we not with you?” They reply, “Indeed! But you tempted yourselves, bided your time, and doubted; and false hopes deluded you till the Command of God came, and the Deluder deluded you concerning God.  \(^{15}\) So this day no ransom shall be taken from you, or from those who disbelieved.” Your refuge shall be the Fire; it shall be your master. What an evil journey’s end!  \(^{16}\) Has not the time come for those who believe for their hearts to be humbled to the remembrance of God and the truth that has come down, and to be not like those who were given the Book aforetime? But the span of time was too long for them, such that their hearts hardened and many of them are iniquitous.  \(^{17}\) Know that God revives the earth after its death. We have indeed made the signs clear for you, that haply you may understand.  \(^{18}\) Truly men who give in charity and women who give in charity and lend unto God a goodly loan, it will be multiplied for them, and theirs shall be a generous reward.  \(^{19}\) And those who believe in God and His messengers—it is they who are truthful and are witnesses before their Lord. They have their reward and their light. And those who disbelieve and deny Our signs, they are the inhabitants of Hellfire.  \(^{20}\) Know that the life of this world is but play, diversion, ornament, mutual boasting among you, and vying for increase in property and children—the likeness of a rain whose vegetation impresses the farmers; then it withers such that you see it turn yellow; then it becomes chaff. And in the Hereafter there shall be severe punishment, forgiveness from God, and contentment, and the life of this world is naught but the enjoyment of delusion. 21 Race unto forgiveness from your Lord and to a garden whose breadth is as the breadth of Heaven and earth, prepared for those who believe in God and His messengers. That is the Bounty of God, which He gives to whomsoever He will, and God is Possessed of Tremendous Bounty. 22 No misfortune befalls the earth nor yourselves, save that it is in a Book before We bring it forth—truly that is easy for God— 23 that you not despair over what has passed you by, nor exult in that which He has given unto you. And God loves not any vainglorious boaster, 24 those who are miserly and enjoin people to be miserly. Yet whosoever turns away, truly God, He is the Self-Sufficient, the Praised. 25 We have indeed sent Our messengers with clear proofs, and We sent down the Book and the Balance with them, that the people would uphold justice. And We sent down iron, wherein are great might and benefits for mankind, and so that God may know those who will help Him and His messengers unseen. Truly God is Strong, Mighty. 26 And indeed We sent Noah and Abraham and established prophethood and the Book among their progeny. And among them is he who is rightly guided; yet many of them are iniquitous. 27 Then We sent Our messengers to follow in their footsteps, and We sent Jesus son of Mary, and We gave him the Gospel and placed kindness and mercy in the hearts of those who follow him. And monasticism they invented—We did not ordain it for them—only to seek God’s Contentment. Yet they did not observe it with proper observance. So We gave those of them who believed their reward, yet many of them are iniquitous. 28 O you who believe! Reverence God and believe in His Messenger; He will give you a twofold portion of His Mercy, make a light for you by which you may walk, and forgive you—and God is Forgiving, Merciful— 29 such that the People of the Book may know that they have no power over any of God’s Bounty, and that the Bounty is in God’s Hand; He gives it unto whomsoever He will; and God is Possessed of Tremendous Bounty.
Commentary

1. Whatsoever is in the heavens and the earth glorifies God, and He is the Mighty, the Wise.

   1. Whatsoever (mā) is used rather than whosoever (man) to indicate that the praise of God predominates throughout all that exists (JJ). All existing realities in the heavens and on the earth glorify God through their tongues or through their states of being (Aj, Z). The verb “to glorify” (sabbaḥa) indicates declaring something to be beyond all evil, which derives from the original meaning of the verb sabbaḥa, “he went beyond” (Aj, N, Z). The verb “to glorify” occurs in several different forms in the Quran: past, present, imperative, and verbal noun, indicating that from the moment existents come into being they continuously glorify God through speech and deeds, willingly and unwillingly, for there is no thing, save that it hymns His praise, though you do not understand their praise (17:44; Āl). In this and other verses, sabbaḥa is followed by the particle lām, meaning “to” or “for,” an addition that can convey the exact same meaning as when sabbaḥa occurs without it, or it can convey a sense of glorifying God for God’s sake alone (N, Z).

2. Unto Him belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth. He gives life and causes death, and He is Powerful over all things.

   2. That unto Him belongs sovereignty (cf. 2:107; 3:189; 5:17, 18, 40, 120; 7:158; 9:116; 24:42; 25:2; et passim) indicates God’s complete control over all modes of existence. That He gives life and causes death (cf. 2:258; 3:156; 7:158; 9:116; 10:56; 22:6; 23:80; 40:68; 44:8; 53:44) indicates God’s power over all phases of life, existence and nonexistence, at all times (for the stages of life and death, see, e.g., 2:28). Among the Divine Names are the Giver of Life (al-Muḥyī) and the Causer of Death (al-Mumīt). Although neither Divine Name occurs in the Quran, the many Quranic references to God’s giving life and causing death serve as their source, and both Names occur in the traditional lists of the Ninety-Nine Names of God.
He is the First, and the Last, and the Outward, and the Inward; and He is Knower of all things.

3 God is the First in that “God was and there was nothing other than Him”; the Last in that All upon it passes away. And there remains the Face of thy Lord, Possessed of Majesty and Bounty (55:26–27); the Outward in that Wheresoever you turn, there is the Face of God (2:115); and the Inward in that Sight comprehends Him not (6:103) and We are nearer to him than his jugular vein (50:16). According to al-Zamakhshari, rather than a simple list of four Divine Names, this verse can be read as two pairs, “He is the First and the Last, and He is the Outward and the Inward,” indicating that God is outwardly manifest and inwardly hidden at every moment, past and future (Āl, Z). It is also said that the Outward indicates the One Who is above all things, predominating over them, and the Inward indicates the One Who is within everything, such that He knows their inner dimensions (Z). From a Sufi perspective, that God is the Outward points to the manner in which everything that exists can be understood as a “Self-Disclosure” of God.

One of the more famous supplications that the Prophet taught his followers invokes all four of these Divine Names: “O God, Lord of the seven heavens and Lord of the Magnificent Throne! Our Lord, and Lord of everything, Revealer of the Torah, the Gospel, and the Criterion [i.e., the Quran], Splitter of the grain of corn and the date stone! I seek refuge with Thee from the evil of everything over whose forehead Thou hast control. O God! Thou art the First, for nothing is before Thee; the Last, for nothing is after Thee; the Outward, for nothing is above Thee; and the Inward, for nothing is below Thee. Remove the burden of debt from us and free us from poverty” (IK).

He it is Who created the heavens and the earth in six days. Then He mounted the Throne. He knows that which enters the earth and that which issues therefrom, that which descends from Heaven and that which ascends thereto. He is with you wheresoever you are, and God sees whatsoever you do.
4 For the meaning of creation in six days followed by a reference to God’s mounting the Throne, see 7:54c; 10:3; 11:7; 25:59; 32:4. The second part of this verse, beginning with He knows, is repeated in 34:2. That which enters the earth refers to both rain and buried corpses, while that which issues therefrom refers to vegetation and minerals (JJ). The manner in which God is with human beings is debated; some say it refers to God’s Knowledge (JJ) or His Knowledge and Power (Q), while others maintain that it is through His very Essence (Aj) or Being (wujūd; R). That God is with you wheresoever you are at all times follows from His being the First, and the Last, and the Outward, and the Inward. Nonetheless, such “with-ness” can only be affirmed for God in relation to human beings, but not for human beings in relation to God, since you are needful of God; and He is the Self-Sufficient, the Praised (35:15).

5 Unto Him belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth, and unto God are all matters returned.

5 For unto God are all matters returned, see 2:210; 3:109; 8:44; 11:123; 22:76; 35:4c; 42:52–53c.

6 He makes the night pass into the day and makes the day pass into the night, and He knows what lies within breasts.

6 The passing of the night into the day and the day into the night (cf. 22:61; 31:29; 35:13) can refer to either the daily exchange of light and darkness (Aj) or seasonal variations in the length of days and nights (JJ). The references to God’s Knowledge in vv. 3–6 can be seen as an extension of God being the Outward and the Inward. That God knows all things is made clear in v. 3; v. 4 then relates this to the Outward, saying, God sees whatsoever you do (cf. 2:233, 237; 3:156; 33:9; 48:24; 49:18; 60:3; 64:2); and the present verse relates it to the Inward, saying, He knows what lies within breasts (cf. 3:119, 154; 5:7; 8:43; 11:5; 29:10; 31:23; 35:38; 39:7; 42:24; 64:4; 67:13), emphasizing that God is aware of the intentions behind all deeds and all inner thoughts. In this way the sūrah prepares for the discussion of the hypocrites in vv. 13–15, who are often unable to discern between inner intentions and outward actions or who would prefer that there were no way to discern between inner intentions and outward actions.

7 Believe in God and His Messenger and spend from that over which He has appointed you as trustees. For those of you who believe and spend, theirs shall be a great reward.

7 That God has appointed people as trustees over some things indicates that nothing is actually their property, but the property of God, which He has entrusted to them (R, Z). So spending from it should be just as easy as spending from another person’s wealth (Aj, Z). Or the verse can indicate that the property people have inherited from others will then be passed on to the generation after them, so they should not be stingy with it (R, Z). Trustees (mustakhalafīn) derives from the same root as vicegerent (khalīfah). In this way, the command to spend of what God has entrusted is connected to the very purpose for which human beings were created (see 2:30; 6:165; 35:39).

8 How is it that you believe not in God when the Messenger calls you to believe in your Lord—and He has indeed made a covenant with you—if you are believers?

8 He has indeed made a covenant with you could also be read, “Your covenant has indeed been made” (Aj, Bg). Both readings refer to the pretemporal covenant made by God with all of humanity before creation when they were still in Adam’s loins (see 7:172c; JJ, N). In this context, the expression How is it that you believe not . . . if you are believers? reflects the broad Quranic argument that everyone has an innate ability to recognize the truth, if they would only follow what is available to them through the intellect and through revelation (N, R).
9 He it is Who sends down clear signs upon His servant to bring you out of darkness into light, and truly God is Kind and Merciful unto you.

9 Clear signs refers to the Quran or to the Quran and other miracles given to the Prophet. In other verses, clear signs refers to the miracles that Moses performed (17:101; 28:36). For bring you out of darkness into light, see also 14:1, 5; 33:43. Regarding the many implications of this phrase, Ibn ʿAjībah writes, “out of the darkness of sin into the light of repentance and righteousness; out of the darkness of heedlessness into the light of wakefulness; out of the darkness of desire and selfishness into the light of renunciation and purity; out of the darkness of the sensual into the light of the spiritual; out of the darkness of ignorance into the light of knowledge through God.” For the symbolism of light in the Quran, see 24:35c.

10 And how is it that you do not spend in the way of God when unto God belongs the inheritance of the heavens and the earth. Not equal among you are those who spent and fought before the victory. They are greater in rank than those who spend and fight afterwards; yet God has promised unto each that which is most beautiful, and God is Aware of whatsoever you do.

10 The Inheritor is one of the Divine Names, as in 15:23: Surely it is We Who give life and cause death, and We are the Inheritor (cf. 28:58), implying that all things return to God. As all things return to God, nothing should prevent one from spending what belongs to God in the first place (see 57:7c). Unto God are all matters returned (v. 5); so if one willingly spends in the way of God, one derives benefit from it, and if one does not, the property still returns to God, but one derives no benefit.

The victory refers to the conquest of Makkah in 8/630, after which Islam quickly spread throughout the rest of Arabia and it became politically advantageous to donate to its cause. Whereas before the victory, or “opening,” anyone who spent, fought, or emigrated for its cause was clearly doing so in the way of God (e.g., 2:195, 218, 244, 261). In this vein, the Prophet is reported to have said with regard to those who spent and fought before the conquest, “If one of you were to spend the equivalent of Mt. Uḥud [a mountain on the outskirts of Madinah] in gold, it would not reach the extent of what one of them did, not even half of it” (Aj, IK). Some propose that this verse refers specifically to Abū Bakr’s willingness to spend all of his wealth in the cause of Islam (R). According to a hadīth narrated by Ibn ʿUmar, “One time when the Prophet was sitting with Abū Bakr, Gabriel came and inquired about Abū Bakr’s impoverished condition, to which the Prophet responded, ‘O Gabriel, he has spent all his wealth before the victory [over Makkah]!’ Gabriel said, ‘In that case, convey to him God’s greetings of peace and tell him that his Lord asks him, “Are you pleased with Me in your state of poverty or are you averse?”’ The Prophet addressed Abū Bakr, ‘O Abū Bakr, Gabriel is here to convey the greetings of peace from God, and He is asking you whether you are pleased with Him in your state of poverty or are you averse?’ Upon hearing this, Abū Bakr wept and said, ‘How can I be averse unto my Lord? I am pleased with my Lord! I am pleased with my Lord!’” (Q, W).

This verse introduces a clear gradation among the believers, as does 4:95: God favors those who strive with their goods and their lives a degree above those who stay behind. Unto both God has promised that which is most beautiful. But He favors those who strive with a great reward above those who stay behind. Regarding this distinction, a hadīth states, “One who is strong in belief is better and more beloved to God than one who is weak in belief, but in each there is good” (IK).

11 Who is it that will lend unto God a goodly loan? He will multiply it for him, and his shall be a generous reward.

11 The idea of lending unto God a goodly loan (cf. 2:245; 5:12; 57:18; 64:17; 73:20) may refer to anything given in charity. Some, however, stipulate that for charity to be goodly it must meet certain conditions. The most complete list is provided by al-Rāzī: (1) what is given must be from wealth earned in a permissible (ḥalāl) manner; (2) what is given must be from the best of what one owns rather than the dregs (see 2:267); (3) one should give charity despite one’s love for the thing given (see 2:177; 76:8); (4) the charity should be distributed to those who are most needy and most worthy of receiving it; (5) the charity should be concealed to the extent possible (see 2:271); (6) charitable deeds must not be followed by preening or harm (see 2:264); (7) in giving one should seek to please God rather than to be seen of men (see 4:38); (8) what one has given should be regarded as little, no matter how large, as one can only give of the things of this world, which are themselves little; (9) one should give out of what is most valued and loved, for you will never attain piety till you spend from that which you love (3:92); (10) one must not think highly of oneself and poorly of the recipient of the charity. Regarding the multiplication of good deeds, see 57:18c.

12 On the Day when you see the believing men and the believing women with their light spreading before them and on their right, “Glad tidings unto you this Day: Gardens with rivers running below, therein to abide. That is the great triumph.”

12 This verse may be read as a continuation of the previous verse (“his shall be a generous reward on the Day when . . .”) or as the beginning of a new sentence with an implied “Remember” at the beginning (Aj, Bḍ). Their light can refer to the light of faith that is hidden in the breast while in this world, but becomes outwardly manifest in the next (Aj); the light of good deeds (Aj, IK); or the light that shines from the countenance of the believers. Al-Rāzī, however, notes, “The real light is God, and the light of knowledge, which is the light of insight, is the most worthy of being [called] light.” Despite these varying perspectives, their light is seen by most as the light by which God guides the believers over the traverse (ṣirāt) that leads from the plain of Judgment (see 18:47; 79:14) to Paradise (Aj, IK, R); see 57:28c and the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.” The light spreads before them and on their right (cf. 66:8), because that is the direction from which they receive the scrolls of their deeds (IK, Q, R, Sh). For the great triumph as the attainment of the Garden of Paradise, see also 4:13; 5:119; 9:89, 100; 61:12; 64:9; 85:11.

13 On the Day when the hypocrites, men and women, will say to those who believe, “Wait for us that we may borrow from your light,” it will be said, “Turn back and seek a light!” Thereupon a wall with a gate will be set down between them, the inner side of which contains mercy, and on the outer side of which lies punishment.

13 Wait for us (unẓurūnā) could also be rendered “Look upon us”; if the believers were to look upon the hypocrites, the hypocrites could borrow from their light, as the light of the believers shines in front of them (Aj, R, ™, Z). An alternate reading is anẓirūnā, meaning, “Give us a chance” (JJ). The believers tell the hypocrites to turn back and seek a light, that is, to return to the place where the believers themselves received the light from God (Aj, Z) or to return to the world below to perform good deeds through which these lights are earned (R, Z). After they turn back trying to attain this light, which is no longer available to them, a wall is set down between them. According to Mujāhid, one of the earliest Quran commentators, the gate in the wall is the same as the veil mentioned in 7:46: And there will be a veil between them (JJ, R, ™). The inner side refers to the side of the wall on which the believers stand, which contains mercy, and the outer side refers to the side on which the hypocrites find themselves, which faces the Fire (JJ). The hypocrites thus stand between the wall and the punishment (Aj). That the hypocrites can see through the gate, seeing the light that is not theirs, only increases their sorrow (Aj). Alternately, the inner and outer refer to the two sides of the gate within the wall (™, Z). The existence of a gate in the wall can be seen as an allusion to the continuing possibility of Divine intercession for those who have been denied Paradise. According to a long ḥadīth qudsi, God tells the angels to bring from the Fire those upon whom God wishes to show mercy, those who did not ascribe any partners to Him. They are removed from the Fire scraped and torn and then brought back to life by the water of life. When there is only one who remains looking toward the Fire, God turns him away from the Fire upon his request. Then after he gazes upon the Garden for as long as God wills, God brings him to the door of the Garden, and after he requests, “My Lord bring me into the Garden!” the door of the Garden is opened unto him and God admits him to the Garden, granting every wish until all his wishes and desires are exhausted.

They will call unto them, “Were we not with you?” They reply, “Indeed! But you tempted yourselves, bided your time, and doubted; and false hopes deluded you till the Command of God came, and the Deluder deluded you concerning God.

When their fate becomes apparent, the hypocrites call to the believers, Were we not with you? They tempted themselves, thus bringing trials and tribulations into their own lives, and bided either to overcome the believers themselves or for disaster to afflict the believers, as in 4:141, which describes the hypocrites and disbelievers as those who wait upon you, and if a victory comes to you from God, they say, “Were we not with you?” But if the disbelievers have some success, they say, “Did we not overwhelm you, and did we not protect you from the believers?” Here waited can also imply that they wavered in their faith, never truly affirming it (Ṭ). Till the Command of God came refers to the moment of death or to the Day of Judgment, indicating that they wavered in religion until the opportunity to repent had passed. The Deluder (ghurūr) is a reference to Satan, but can also indicate anything that deludes a person. It could also be rendered “delusion” (gharūr instead of ghurūr), in which case it indicates the self-deluding expectations of one who knowingly commits a sin, thinking that God will forgive it (Bg, Ṭ, Z; see 31:33c). Reading this verse in conjunction with v. 16, “delusion” can be read as an allusion to more subtle degrees of hypocrisy that afflict those who become self-satisfied with their religious attainments and cease to strive upon the spiritual path.

So this day no ransom shall be taken from you, or from those who disbelieved.” Your refuge shall be the Fire; it shall be your master. What an evil journey’s end!

No ransom shall be taken from you means that on the Day of Judgment the hypocrites have no way of redeeming themselves, as they did in this world through repentance and performing good deeds (regarding ransom, see 2:48c). That the Fire shall be their master (mawlā) implies both that it has complete control over them and that it is what is nearest to them (ūlā bihim; Aj), that is, to their true nature.
Has not the time come for those who believe for their hearts to be humbled to the remembrance of God and the truth that has come down, and to be not like those who were given the Book aforetime? But the span of time was too long for them, such that their hearts hardened and many of them are iniquitous.

16 To be humbled translates takhshaʿa, which is related to the word khushūʿ, “humility,” one of the most important virtues in Islam, some say the root of all true virtue. The Prophet is reported to have often prayed, “I seek refuge in God from a heart that is not humbled (lā takhshaʿa).” According to a ḥadīth, “The first thing to be removed from this community will be humility, until you will not see a single humble person” (Sy). Some maintain that this verse refers to the hypocrites, who displayed faith outwardly, while failing to manifest it in their hearts. But most agree that it is addressed to Muslims, as “the believer is not truly a believer without humility of heart” (R). According to Ibn Masʿūd, “There were but four years between the time we entered Islam and the time this verse came to reproach us” (Aj, Āl, IK, Z). Others view this verse as a later revelation, based upon a saying attributed to Ibn ʿAbbās, “The believers’ hearts had grown tepid; so they were reproached at the beginning of the thirteenth year of the revelation” (Aj, IK). In this context, the remembrance of God may indicate either the mention of God’s Name, as in 8:2, Only they are believers whose hearts quake with fear when God is mentioned, or the Quran, among whose names is the “Remembrance of God” (Dhikr Allāh). If taken as a reference to God, the truth that has come down refers to the Quran (R), while in this particular context the Book refers to scripture in general.

From a Qur'anic perspective, hearts harden when they become distant from revelation. That the span of time was too long for them thus indicates that hardness overcame the hearts of many Jews and Christians who were living much later in time than their prophets (Aj, R). This verse thus evokes a Biblical theme, as expressed in a prayer of the Prophet Isaiah: “Why, O Lord, do you make us stray from your ways and harden our heart, so that we do not fear you? Turn back for the sake of your servants, for the sake of the tribes that are your heritage” (Isaiah 63:17; cf. Isaiah 6:9–10; Psalm 95:8; 1 Samuel 6:6; Mark 8:17; John 12:40; Romans 9:18; Hebrews 3:8; 4:7). Regarding the hardness of hearts among previous religious communities, see 2:74c; 5:13c; 6:42–44c. In other verses, hearts are referred to as blind (22:46), diseased (2:10; 5:52; 33:12, 32, 60; 47:20, 29; 74:31), locked (47:24), sealed (2:7; 9:87; 47:16), and rusted (83:14). In contrast, the healthy heart softens unto the remembrance of God (39:23), is at peace in the remembrance of God (13:28), and is infused with Tranquility (sakīnah; 48:4).

17 Know that God revives the earth after its death. We have indeed made the signs clear for you, that haply you may understand.

17 God revives the earth after its death by bringing forth vegetation. So too does He revive hearts by restoring them to humility (IK, JJ, R, Z). The relation of this verse to the previous one is found in the following ḥadīth, “The difference between one who remembers God and one who does not is like the difference between the living and the dead.”

18 Truly men who give in charity and women who give in charity and lend unto God a goodly loan, it will be multiplied for them, and theirs shall be a generous reward.

18 Who give in charity (muṣṣaddiq) can also be read, “who confirm [the truth]” (muṣaddiq), which would link it more closely to the mention of the truthful (al-ṣiddiqūn) in v. 19. For a goodly loan, see 57:11c. The manner in which God multiplies charitable offerings is best reflected in 2:261: The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of God is that of a grain that grows seven ears, in every ear a hundred grains. And God multiplies for whomsoever He will (see also 2:245; 4:40; 6:160; 64:17). Those who lend unto God a goodly loan can also refer to those who strive in the way of God until they have removed the love of all that is other than God from their hearts and have thus given their very selves to Him. He will then multiply the Divine lights and the knowledge of Divine mysteries for them (Aj).
And those who believe in God and His messengers—it is they who are truthful and are witnesses before their Lord. They have their reward and their light. And those who disbelieve and deny Our signs, they are the inhabitants of Hellfire.

It is reported that Mujāhid said, “Every believer is truthful and a witness,” and then recited this verse (R, Ṭ). This verse is thus read by some as a reference to all believers, though many maintain that it designates a select group of believers who exceed others in faith (Aj). Truthful (ṣiddīq) is an emphatic form that indicates both those who fervently affirm the truth and those who are utterly honest and sincere. It is thus interpreted to mean those who have the same virtues inwardly and outwardly (Aj). This verse could also be read as making a distinction between the truthful and the witnesses: “Those who believe in God and His messengers, they are the truthful. And those who are witnesses before their Lord shall have their reward and their light” (R, Ṭ). Witnesses translates shuhadāʾ, which is interpreted by some to mean martyrs (IK, Ṭ), as it relates to those who “witness” by dying in the service of their faith, just as “striving” (jihād) is a spiritual virtue that can include fighting in the cause of God; see 4:69–70c.

Know that the life of this world is but play, diversion, ornament, mutual boasting among you, and vying for increase in property and children—the likeness of a rain whose vegetation impresses the farmers; then it withers such that you see it turn yellow; then it becomes chaff. And in the Hereafter there shall be severe punishment, forgiveness from God, and contentment, and the life of this world is naught but the enjoyment of delusion.

The relativity of the wealth of this world is a recurring Quranic theme. Such wealth is seen as a cause of gratitude and should be managed properly, as in 28:77: And forget not your portion in this world; see 34:35–37c. Crops that dry or fail are also used as a metaphor for the relativity of the joys of this world in 2:266; 18:32–42; 39:21; 68:17–33. In this passage, farmers translates kuffār, which can also mean “disbelievers” and could be rendered as such in this passage. For the life of this world is naught but the enjoyment of delusion, see also 3:185; 6:32. The discussion of the deceptive nature of this world continues this sūrah’s focus upon the relationship between the inward and the outward, about which Ibn ʿAjibah writes: “[The world] is something that appears beautiful on the outside, but that conceals what is ugly within it, like one who tricks people and then cheats them. The world appears to those who pursue it as sweetness and infatuation, overtaking them little by little, until they become totally entangled in it and neglect all preparation for the Hereafter. Life passes from their hand in vanity, and the world continues to delude and betray them until it brings them bankrupt to the moment of their death.”

21 Race unto forgiveness from your Lord and to a garden whose breadth is as the breadth of Heaven and earth, prepared for those who believe in God and His messengers. That is the Bounty of God, which He gives to whomsoever He will, and God is Possessed of Tremendous Bounty.

Race unto is an encouragement to aspire toward God, Heaven, and all that is good. Elsewhere the believers are told to vie in good deeds (2:148; 5:48) and to vie in patience (3:200). For the breadth of Heaven and earth, see 3:133, which is almost identical to this verse.

22 No misfortune befalls the earth nor yourselves, save that it is in a Book before We bring it forth—truly that is easy for God—

From an Islamic perspective, misfortunes and afflictions can be a means of spiritual purification if they are endured with patience. In this vein, the Prophet is reported to have said, “No illness or fatigue, no sickness or sadness, not even a worry afflicts a believer without expiating some of the wrongs he has committed.” That all things have been recorded in a Book (cf. 20:52; 22:70; 78:29) before time indicates that all events of this earth have been recorded on the Preserved Tablet (85:22) before entering this realm (R), a point made emphatically in 35:11: God created you from dust, then from a drop, then He made you pairs, and no female bears or brings forth save with His Knowledge. And none who grows old grows old, nor has aught lessened of his life, but that it is in a Book. Truly that is easy for God. For an extended discussion of the issues of predestination and free will onto which this discussion opens, see 4:79c; 54:49c; see also 76:29–30.

that you not despair over what has passed you by, nor exult in that which He has given unto you. And God loves not any vainglorious boaster, Patience and gratitude are considered the proper responses for all that God bestows (see 2:156–57), as a ḥadīth states, “How remarkable is the situation of the believer: everything is good for him; yet this cannot be said except of the believer. If comfort and ease come to him, he is grateful and that is good for him; and if hardship befalls him, he is patient, and that is good for him.” Given that the life of this world is naught but the enjoyment of delusion (v. 20), one should not despair over what has passed nor exult in worldly achievements or possessions, for in the final analysis all things perish, save His Face (28:88). Elsewhere the Quran indicates that one must also avoid being overly exuberant, lest it turn into wanton exultation or lest one attribute blessings from God to other sources or to one’s own merit and forget to remember God (see, e.g., 17:67; 30:33; 39:50).

those who are miserly and enjoin people to be miserly. Yet whosoever turns away, truly God, He is the Self-Sufficient, the Praised.

The first phrase of this verse is repeated in 4:37. To be miserly and encourage others to be the same is connected to being a vainglorious boaster, as it is only by attributing to one’s own merit what God has given that one is able to ignore God’s Command to spend from that over which He has appointed you as trustees (v. 7), that is, property that is ultimately His. Some commentators see this verse as a critique of the Madinan hypocrites, who only gave charity for self-serving purposes (see 2:264; 4:142; 8:47; 107:4–7). Others see it as a general critique of “miserliness” in both wealth and knowledge (Aj). Turns away indicates turning from God or from the duty to give charity (JJ).

25 We have indeed sent Our messengers with clear proofs, and We sent down the Book and the Balance with them, that the people would uphold justice. And We sent down iron, wherein are great might and benefits for mankind, and so that God may know those who will help Him and His messengers unseen. Truly God is Strong, Mighty.

25 For clear proofs, see the introduction to Sūrah 98. In this context, the Book refers to all scriptures (Q). The Balance has many meanings, including the religious Law (Sharīʿah), which provides the standard by which to weigh what is good and beneficial against what is evil and harmful; see 42:17c. From another perspective, the Balance indicates all of those things by which human beings uphold the justice enjoined in the scriptures, and iron containing great might is the means of fashioning weapons with which to defend the truth and to oppose those who revolt against justice (Aj, N). The benefits in iron are then taken as a reference to tools such as the scythe and the pickax, which facilitate other activities. Sent down may be taken literally to mean that iron was sent down directly by God or simply that God created iron, in the same way that 39:6 states that God sent down for you of cattle eight pairs (Q), meaning that He created them. Those who help God are those who help His religion (Q, T, Z). That they do so unseen refers to those who work for religion even though they have not seen one of God’s messengers (Q, Z), or to those who do not perform good deeds for them to be seen by others.

And indeed We sent Noah and Abraham and established prophethood and the Book among their progeny. And among them is he who is rightly guided; yet many of them are iniquitous.

26 The Book refers in a collective manner to each of the scriptures that the progeny of Abraham was given: the Torah, the Psalms, the Gospel, and the Quran (JJ). The Quran here suggests that, although many of those who followed these revelations are iniquitous, it is not a condemnation of their respective religions or revealed books, but of human nature. That such iniquity can afflict Muslims as well is reflected in a hadīth in which the Prophet says of the Muslim community in later times, “The upright will depart one after another until nothing remains but impoverished people, the like of leftover barley and dates.”

Then We sent Our messengers to follow in their footsteps, and We sent Jesus son of Mary, and We gave him the Gospel and placed kindness and mercy in the hearts of those who follow him. And monasticism they invented—We did not ordain it for them—only to seek God’s Contentment. Yet they did not observe it with proper observance. So We gave those of them who believed their reward, yet many of them are iniquitous.

27 We placed kindness and mercy in the hearts of those who follow him indicates that God disposed the followers of Jesus to love one another. This verse could also be read, “and [We] placed kindness, mercy, and monasticism in the hearts of those who follow him,” meaning that God gave monasticism to them initially, but then they altered it and made their own innovations in the practices that God had given them (Q). In this sense it is similar to the accusation that some People of the Book distort the meaning of the word (4:46; 5:13, 41). Most interpret only to seek God’s Contentment to mean that they wanted to please God by inventing monasticism or to mean that God did not ordain them to practice that; rather, God ordained them only to seek what pleases God (IK). According to the latter interpretation, the translation would be, “and We gave him the Gospel and placed kindness, mercy, and monasticism in the hearts of those who follow him; yet they made inventions therein. We did not ordain it for them except for [the purpose of] seeking God’s Contentment.” According to the interpretation represented in the translation, Yet they did not observe it with proper observance indicates that they were not able to maintain the practices they had imposed upon themselves (IK), namely, monasticism. In contrast, the alternate translation implies that they were not able to maintain the practices enjoined by God. The view that some form of monasticism may have been enjoined upon Christians by God is supported by a ḥadīth: “Every Prophet has a form of monasticism; striving (jihād) in the way of God is the monasticism of this community” (IK). Regarding the ascetic practices associated with the Christian form of monasticism, the Prophet is reported to have said, “Giving up the world does not mean making lawful things unlawful or wasting possessions. Rather, giving up the world means that you do not rely more upon what is in your hand than upon what is in the Hands of God.”

28 O you who believe! Reverence God and believe in His Messenger; He will give you a twofold portion of His Mercy, make a light for you by which you may walk, and forgive you—and God is Forgiving, Merciful—

28 In this context, O you who believe is understood by many commentators as an address to Jews and Christians, calling them to believe in the prophethood of Muhammad (IK, Q, R, Z). A twofold portion of His Mercy is thus apportioned to them for following their religion and then believing in and following the Prophet (IK, Q, R, Z). This interpretation is supported by a well-known ḥadīth in which the Prophet stated that among those who will receive their reward twice is “a believer from the People of the Book who has been a true believer in his prophet and then believes in me” (Aj, IK). Others understand this verse as an address to Muslims (Aj, Q), calling upon them to deepen their faith, as in v. 16.

The light for you alludes to guidance or to the Quran (Q), although some say it is the same light mentioned in v. 12 (Z). By which you may walk is understood to be the light by which God guides the believers over the traverse (ṣirāt) that leads from the plain of Judgment (see 18:47; 79:14) to Paradise (Q). According to many accounts in the Ḥadīth literature, on the Day of Judgment all believers are called to cross a traverse (ṣirāt) over Hell that is as fine as a hair and as sharp as a sword and has large thorns that afflict those who must walk or crawl upon it in accordance with their sins. God provides the believers a light whereby they are able to cross, but does not provide any light for the disbelievers, since he for whom God has not appointed any light has no light (24:40); see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.” From a spiritual perspective, light for you refers to the lights of the spirit and the Self-Disclosure of God’s Attributes in the heart of the believer (K) and thus to the light of spiritual guidance from God.

such that the People of the Book may know that they have no power over any of God’s Bounty, and that the Bounty is in God’s Hand; He gives it unto whomsoever He will; and God is Possessed of Tremendous Bounty.

29 According to some, this verse indicates the People of the Book who do not believe in the Prophet Muhammad (Z), as distinguished from those who follow the command to do so in the previous verse. Many see this verse as a response to those who argued that, since Muslims have come later than previous religious communities, their reward with God would be less. Regarding this interpretation, the Prophet is reported to have said to his Companions, “The parable of you and the Jews and Christians is that of a man who employed some laborers and asked them, ‘Who will work for me from the dawn prayer until midday for one qīrāt [a special weight of gold] each?’ And the Jews worked. Then he asked, ‘Who will work for me from the early afternoon prayer until the time of the late afternoon prayer for one qīrāt each?’ And the Christians worked. Then he said, ‘Who will work for me from the later afternoon prayer until sunset for two qīrāt each?’ You are those who did this work. The Jews and the Christians got angry and said, ‘We did more work, but got less wages.’ God responded, ‘Have I been unjust to you with your reward?’ They said, ‘No.’ So God said, ‘Then it is My Bounty, which I give unto whomsoever I will.’” (IK). The verse can also be taken to mean that no one has any control over whom God appoints as a prophet, prophethood and revelation being His greatest bounties. The Jews of Arabia are said to have rejected the prophethood of Muhammad on the grounds that he was not of their lineage and thus could not be a prophet (see 2:90c), while many Arabs opposed him on the grounds that he was not already a leader among them when he was chosen as a prophet (see 43:31c).
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Al-Mujādilah is a Madinan sūrah, although some commentators maintain that only the first ten verses are from the Madinan period and the remainder is from the Makkān period; others maintain that the entire sūrah is Madinan except for v. 9 (Āl, Q). It takes its name from the story of a woman named Khawlah bint Tha‘labah, whose husband, Aws ibn al-Ṣāmit, divorced her according to the pre-Islamic custom of ẓihār, in which a man could renounce his wife by saying, “You are to me as my mother’s back.” Because it addresses this issue, the sūrah is also known as al-Ẓihār. By custom, the invocation of ẓihār meant that the husband was now free of all duties toward the wife, but that his wife was not free to leave her husband and contract another marriage. Khawlah complained of this injustice to the Prophet and to God. Her plea was heard, and God provided a means whereby she and her husband could reconcile.

Al-Mujādilah is the first in a series of ten Madinan sūrahs addressing many of the legal issues that confronted the newly independent Muslim community in Madinah. Insofar as they demonstrate God’s immediate involvement in the affairs of the Muslim community, this series of sūrahs follows upon the statement in 57:4: He knows that which enters the earth and that which issues therefrom, that which descends from Heaven and that which ascends thereto. And He is with you wheresoever you are, and God sees whatsoever you do. God’s Omnipresence is especially indicated in this sūrah, as the first four verses provide an example of God’s responding directly and instantly to the plea of a Muslim woman.

After the opening verses (vv. 1–4), which address the issue of ḥār, vv. 5–6 introduce the discussion of those who oppose God and His Messenger, the theme of the remainder of the sūrah. Vv. 7–10 discuss the secret converse of those who oppose and deride the Prophet and the proper manner in which to hold private discourse, followed by vv. 11–13, which initially enjoin Muslims to offer alms before conversing with the Prophet and then lighten this injunction. The longest section, vv. 14–21, addresses the nature of the hypocrites and their opposition to the Prophet, and the sūrah concludes with a long verse regarding the rewards that God gives to those who believe in God and the Last Day.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 God has indeed heard the words of she who disputes with thee concerning her husband and complains to God. And God hears your conversation. Truly God is Hearing, Seeing. 2 Those among you who commit ḥār against their wives, those are not their mothers. None are their mothers save those who gave birth to them. Truly they speak indecent words and calumny. And truly God is Pardoning, Forgiving. 3 As for those who commit ḥār against their wives and then go back on what they have said, let them free a slave before they touch one another; to that are you counseled. And God is Aware of whatsoever you do. 4 And whosoever finds not [the means], let him fast two consecutive months before they touch one another. And whosoever is unable, let him feed sixty indigent people. That is so that you may believe in God and His Messenger. These are the limits set by God, and the disbelievers shall have a painful punishment. 5 Truly those who oppose God and His Messenger shall be abased, just as those before them were abased. We have indeed sent down clear signs, and the disbelievers shall have a humiliating punishment on the Day when God resurrects them all together, then informs them of that which they did. God has kept account of it while they have forgotten it; and God is Witness over all things. Hast thou not considered that God knows whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth? There is no secret converse among three, but that He is their fourth, nor among five, but that He is their sixth, nor less than that, nor more, but that He is with them wheresoever they are. Then on the Day of Resurrection He will inform them of that which they did. Truly God is Knower of all things. Hast thou not seen those who were forbidden from secretly conversing then returned to that which they had been forbidden, secretly conversing with a view to sin, enmity, and disobeying the Messenger? And when they come to thee and greet thee, they greet thee in a manner that God has not greeted thee and say within themselves, “Why does God not punish us for what we say?” Hell suffices them, burning therein. What an evil journey’s end! O you who believe! If you converse in secret, then do not converse in secret with a view to sin, enmity, and disobeying the Messenger; converse in secret with a view to piety and reverence. And reverence God, unto Whom you shall be gathered.
Secret converse is only from Satan, so that those who believe may grieve; yet he harms them not a whit, save by God’s Leave. And in God let the believers trust. O you who believe! When it is said unto you, “Make room for one another in the assemblies,” then make room, and God will make room for you. And when it is said, “Rise,” then rise, and God will raise in degrees those among you who believe and those who have been given knowledge. God is Aware of whatsoever you do. O you who believe! When you converse in secret with the Messenger, offer charity before your secret converse. That is better for you and purer. But if you do not find [the means], truly God is Forgiving, Merciful. Are you apprehensive about offering charity before your secret converse? If you do not do so and God relents unto you, then perform the prayer, give the alms, and obey God and His Messenger. God is Aware of whatsoever you do. 14 Hast thou not seen those who befriend a people with whom God is wroth? They are not of you, nor are you of them. And they knowingly swear upon falsehood. 15 God has prepared for them a severe punishment. Evil indeed is that which they used to do. 16 They took their oaths as a shield and thus turned from the way of God; so theirs shall be a humiliating punishment. 17 Neither their property nor their children will avail them aught against God. They are the inhabitants of the Fire, abiding therein. 18 On the Day when God resurrects them all, they will swear to Him just as they swear to you, supposing that they have some standing. Lo! Truly they are the liars. 19 Satan has overwhelmed them, and so made them forget the remembrance of God. They are the party of Satan. Lo! The party of Satan are losers. 20 Truly those who oppose God and His Messenger, they will be among the abased. 21 God has decreed, “I shall surely prevail, I and My messengers!” Truly God is Strong, Mighty. 22 You shall not find a people who believe in God and the Last Day loving those who oppose God and His Messenger, even if they be their fathers, their sons, their brothers, or their tribe. God has inscribed faith upon their hearts and strengthened them with a Spirit from Him. He causes them to enter Gardens with rivers running below, to abide therein, God being content with them and they being content with Him. They are the party of God. Truly the party of God—it is they who shall prosper.
Commentary

1 God has indeed heard the words of she who disputes with thee concerning her husband and complains to God. And God hears your conversation. Truly God is Hearing, Seeing.

2 Those among you who commit ẓihār against their wives, those are not their mothers. None are their mothers save those who gave birth to them. Truly they speak indecent words and calumny. And truly God is Pardoning, Forgiving.

1–2 The majority of commentators agree that she who disputes refers to Khawlah bint Thaʿlabah, though some propose other names, which are, however, based upon different lineages of the same individual (Q). It is reported that after her husband said to her, “You are to me as my mother’s back,” Khawlah complained to the Prophet, saying, “He has worn out my youth and I let him enjoy me, but when I grew older and could no longer bear children, he put me away, saying that I am as his mother’s back. O God! I complain to Thee,” and that she did not move from her position until the Angel Gabriel came down with vv. 1–4 (IK, Q, Ṭ, W). In other accounts of this story, the Prophet is reported to have said, “You are [now] forbidden to him,” implying that there was no way they could reconcile. But she objected that he had not invoked divorce as such, making a distinction between divorce and ẓihār, and complained again of her situation. The Prophet, likely seeing ẓihār as tantamount to divorce, again said, “You are [now] forbidden to him.” And they went back and forth in this manner until Gabriel came down with vv. 1–4 (IK, Q, T). That God is Hearing, Seeing (see also 4:58, 134; 22:61, 75; 31:28) would seem to indicate here that God hears and knows the pleas of all people, as in the case of Khawlah. More generally, it reinforces the notion of God’s Omniscience; see 4:58c.

3 As for those who commit ẓihār against their wives and then go back on what they have said, let them free a slave before they touch one another; to that are you counseled. And God is Aware of whatsoever you do.

4 And whosoever finds not [the means], let him fast two consecutive months before they touch one another. And whosoever is unable, let him feed sixty indigent people. That is so that you may believe in God and His Messenger. These are the limits set by God, and the disbelievers shall have a painful punishment.

3–4 After vv. 1–4 had been revealed, the Prophet said to Khawlah bint Tha‘labah, “He should set free a slave.” She replied, “He cannot afford it.” He said, “He should fast for two consecutive months.” She replied, “Messenger of God, he is an old man; he cannot keep fasts.” The Prophet then said, “He should feed sixty poor people.” She replied, “He has nothing to give in alms.” At that moment an ‘arq (a date basket holding thirty measures of dates) was brought to the Prophet. Khawlah said, “I shall help him with another ‘arq.” The Prophet replied, “You have done well. Go and feed sixty poor people on his behalf, and return to your cousin [meaning her husband]” (Q, W). In other narrations, a similar conversation is said to have occurred between the Prophet and Khawlah’s husband, Aws ibn al-Ṣāmit; the final resolution was that the Prophet gave him half of the dates necessary to feed sixty people and attain expiation, and Aws furnished the other half (Q, Ṭ, W).

Freeing a slave also serves as expiation for other offenses, such as slaying a person inadvertently (4:92) or breaking a pledge (5:89), and is considered a praiseworthy form of charity (90:13). A slave freed in expiation must be in good health, without physical deficiency (Q, Ṭ). If one does not own a slave, one may pay for the slave of another to be freed (Q). Before they touch one another means before they engage in sexual intercourse (JJ). For those who do not have the means, a fast of two consecutive months serves as expiation in place of freeing a slave, as it does in the case of killing another believer accidentally (see 4:92). For those whose health prevents them from fasting, feeding the indigent can then serve as expiation. Feeding the indigent is also a “ransom” from fasting the month of Ramadan for those who are unable, but fasting is considered preferable (see 2:184). There is some debate as to how much food one must give the indigent to satisfy this requirement. Most maintain that it is one mudd (JJ), which would be enough food to feed one person two full meals in one day.
According to most schools of law, one must feed sixty people. But according to the Ḥanafī school of law, one can also feed a single indigent for sixty days or more, until one has given the equivalent to what one would have given for sixty people (Q). Regarding the requirements for feeding the indigent, see 5:89c.

That is so that you may believe in God and His Messenger (cf. 48:9) indicates that God has revealed these rulings in order to clarify and teach His Decree, so that, knowing the Divine Decree, those who follow God and His Messenger can now act upon the rulings and cease to follow those of the pre-Islamic Age of Ignorance (R).

5 Truly those who oppose God and His Messenger shall be abased, just as those before them were abased. We have indeed sent down clear signs, and the disbelievers shall have a humiliating punishment

5 Those who oppose God and His Messenger, which occurs three times in this sūrah (vv. 5, 20, 22), can be understood as emphasizing the legislative dimension of the sūrah and the nine sūrahs that follow. In this context the phrase thus indicates those who choose to follow rulings that differ from those that God has established (Bḍ); see commentary on 33:36: Whosoever disobeys God and His Messenger has strayed into manifest error.

6 on the Day when God resurrects them all together, then informs them of that which they did. God has kept account of it while they have forgotten it; and God is Witness over all things.

6 The beginning of this verse is either a clause modifying humiliating punishment or the object of an implied verb, “mention” or “remember” (udhkur), which would mean, “Remember” or “make mention of the Day when God will gather every human being on an open, barren plain for judgment” (see 18:47c; 20:106; 39:69–70c; 79:14c). God keeps account of people’s deeds in a book or registry that is then presented to them on the Day of Judgment, whereupon the disbelievers say, “Oh, woe unto us! What a book this is! It leaves out nothing, small or great, save that it has taken account thereof.” And they find present therein whatsoever they did (18:49; see also 6:59; 17:13–14). For God is Witness over all things, see also 4:33; 5:117; 22:17; 33:55; 34:47; 41:53; 85:9. Elsewhere it is said that God is Witness over what you do (see, e.g., 3:98).

7 Hast thou not considered that God knows whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth? There is no secret converse among three, but that He is their fourth, nor among five, but that He is their sixth, nor less than that, nor more, but that He is with them wheresoever they are. Then on the Day of Resurrection He will inform them of that which they did. Truly God is Knower of all things.

Vv. 7–8 address the secret converse (najwā) of those who conspire against the Prophet, insult him, and attempt to divert others from following him, as in 21:2–3: No new Reminder came unto them from their Lord, but that they listened to it while they played, with their hearts diverted. And those who do wrong confide in secret converse, “Is this not but a human being like yourselves? Will you then yield to sorcery, while you see clearly?” Also see 43:80, where the disbelievers and hypocrites are warned that God knows and hears their secret and their secret converse (cf. 9:78). For a discussion of the manner in which God can be said to be “with” human beings, see commentary on 50:16: We are nearer to him than his jugular vein; and 57:4: And He is with you wheresoever you are.

8 Hast thou not seen those who were forbidden from secretly conversing then returned to that which they had been forbidden, secretly conversing with a view to sin, enmity, and disobeying the Messenger? And when they come to thee and greet thee, they greet thee in a manner that God has not greeted thee and say within themselves, “Why does God not punish us for what we say?” Hell suffices them, burning therein. What an evil journey’s end!

8 The first half of this verse is reported to have been revealed in connection with the Jewish tribes of Madinah and the hypocrites. The latter would reportedly speak secretly among themselves, then look at the believers and wink at each other. When the believers saw this, they thought the hypocrites had news about their relatives who went out on military expeditions, that they had been killed, wounded, or defeated. But when these secret conversations continued, they complained to the Prophet, and he commanded them not to converse in this manner. They did not heed his command and went back to secret conversations among themselves. God therefore revealed this verse (Q, Sy, Ṭ, W).

The second half of the verse is said to have been revealed in response to some of the Jews of Madinah who, instead of saying, “Peace be upon you (al-salāmu ʿalaykum)” to the Prophet, said mockingly, “Death be upon you (al-sāmu ʿalaykum).” The Prophet’s wife ʿĀʾishah was present and responded, “Death be upon you. God has cursed you and is wroth with you,” to which the Prophet responded, “Go easy, O ʿĀʾishah! You must be kind.” In another account of this same incident, the Prophet is reported to have said, “God does not like indecency, nor the uttering of indecent words” (W). When ʿĀʾishah objected that she had only responded in kind, the second half of this verse, beginning with And when they come to thee, was revealed (Q, Sy, Ṭ, W). Within themselves could also be rendered “among themselves.” Their question, Why does God not punish us? indicates their position that, if Muhammad were a true prophet, God would punish them for greeting him as they did (IK, JJ). Hell suffices them means that, although they may not be punished for abusing the Prophet in this life, in the Hereafter they will receive the appropriate punishment for their deeds (IK).

9 O you who believe! If you converse in secret, then do not converse in secret with a view to sin, enmity, and disobeying the Messenger; converse in secret with a view to piety and reverence. And reverence God, unto Whom you shall be gathered.

10 Secret converse is only from Satan, so that those who believe may grieve; yet he harms them not a whit, save by God’s Leave. And in God let the believers trust.

9–10 Whereas vv. 7–8 discuss the secret converse of the disbelievers and the hypocrites, these verses clarify that, although secret converse is often of an insidious nature, private discourse is not evil in and of itself, as in 4:114: There is no good in most of their secret converse, save for him who enjoins charity or kindness or reconciliation between men. And whosoever does that, seeking God’s good pleasure, We shall grant him a great reward. In this vein, a ḥadīth states, “The speech of the Children of Adam always works against them, not for them, except when it is to command the right and forbid the wrong, or to remember God.” That Satan does not harm anyone save by God’s leave indicates that he is ultimately powerless, as in 14:22: And Satan will say, when the matter has been decreed, “Verily God made you the Promise of truth; and I made you a promise, but I failed you. And I had no authority over you, save that I called you, and you responded to me. So do not blame me, but blame yourselves.”

11 O you who believe! When it is said unto you, “Make room for one another in the assemblies,” then make room, and God will make room for you. And when it is said, “Rise,” then rise, and God will raise in degrees those among you who believe and those who have been given knowledge. God is Aware of whatsoever you do.

11 Regarding the revelation of this verse, the early commentator Muqātil ibn Sulaymān (d. 150/767) is reported to have said, “The Prophet was at al-ṣuffah [a veranda in front of the mosque in Madinah where many who were known for their piety and asceticism would congregate]. The place was not spacious, and it was a Friday. The Messenger of God had the habit of honoring those from among the Emigrants and the Helpers who had taken part in the Battle of Badr. Some of those who had participated in Badr came to the gathering and found that people were already there before them. They stood, therefore, facing the Prophet and waiting for people to make room for them. But no one made room for them. The Messenger of God was pained to see this; so he asked those who did not take part in Badr to get up, and he moved as many people as the number of those who were standing who had participated in the Battle of Badr. Those who were asked to vacate their seats were not pleased, and the Messenger of God saw the displeasure on their faces. Then the hypocrites said to the Muslims, ‘Did you not claim that your man deals fairly with people? By God, he has not been fair with these people. He removed people who wanted to be close to their Prophet from places in which they were already sitting and seated in their stead people who came late!’ God then revealed this verse” (Q, R, W).

More broadly, this verse indicates that when one follows the example set by God and His Messenger and makes room for God and His Messenger, God makes room or “expands” matters for them, such as their provision and their accommodation, their knowledge and their breast—expansion of the breast implies psychological ease and spiritual understanding. It may also pertain to matters of the Hereafter, meaning that God expands the grave and the Garden for them (Aj), thus making them places of ease and joy. Al-Rāzī argues for the broad applicability of this verse, saying, “For one who opens the doors of goodness and ease (rāḥah) for God’s servants, God will expand for him what is good in this life and the Hereafter. Hence no reasonable person could restrict this verse to making room in an assembly. Rather, what is intended by it is extending good to Muslims and making happiness enter their hearts. In this vein, [the Prophet] has said, ‘God ceases not to aid the servant so long as the servant aids his Muslim brother.’”

And when it is said, “Rise,” then rise means to rise to perform the prayer or other good deeds (JJ). In the words of Qatādah, “Whenever you are called upon to perform a good deed, respond to the call” (T). Both sentences in the present verse reflect the broader Quranic theme of reciprocity between the Divine and the human, most evident in 2:152: So remember Me, and I shall remember you. From an Islamic perspective, the sincere human effort to seek God is met by God with immeasurable compensation, as in a famous ḥadīth qudsī, “I am as My servant thinks of Me. I am with him when he remembers Me. If he mentions Me within himself, I mention him within Myself. If he mentions Me in an assembly, I mention him in a better assembly. If he comes near to Me by a hand’s length, I come near to him by the distance of a cubit. If he comes near to Me the distance of a cubit, I come near to him the distance of two outspread arms. If he comes to Me walking, I come to him running.”

Though belief or faith (īmān) in and of itself is considered superior to knowledge in and of itself, the believer who has knowledge is considered superior to the believer who does not have knowledge. There are many ahādīth to this effect, among them, “The superiority of one who has knowledge over the one who [merely] worships is as the superiority of the full moon over all the planets” (Aj, Q, Z). It is also said to have been revealed to Abraham, “I am Knowing, and I love those who know” (Aj, Āl, Z). Regarding knowledge in degrees, Ibn ʿAjibah writes, “There are different kinds of knowledge. Their nobility corresponds to that which is known [through each kind of knowledge]. The most superior kind of knowledge is knowledge of [God’s] Highest Essence (al-dhāt al-ʿulyā) by way of unveiling and eyewitnessing, then knowledge of the Divine Attributes and Names, then knowledge of the decrees (ahkām), then knowledge of the bounties connected to Him.”

12 O you who believe! When you converse in secret with the Messenger, offer charity before your secret converse. That is better for you and purer. But if you do not find [the means], truly God is Forgiving, Merciful.

13 Are you apprehensive about offering charity before your secret converse? If you do not do so and God relents unto you, then perform the prayer, give the alms, and obey God and His Messenger. God is Aware of whatsoever you do.

12–13 These verses were reportedly revealed about some wealthy members of the Muslim community who used to go to gatherings with the Prophet and monopolize the conversation with him, so that the poor had no opportunity, and the Prophet disliked this. God therefore revealed v. 12, commanding that alms be given before each conference with the Prophet. Those in straitened circumstances did not have anything to give for alms, while those who were well off were miserly. The Companions of the Prophet found this difficult, and so a dispensation was revealed in v. 13 (IK, Sy, W). ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib is reported to have said regarding v. 12: “There is one verse in the Book of God that no one has applied before me; nor is there anyone who applied it after me [58:12]. I had a piece of gold that I exchanged for silver pieces, and whenever I conferred with the Messenger, I spent one silver piece in charity until I spent them all. Then the verse was abrogated with another verse [58:13]” (Q, Sy, Ṭ, W). According to a minority, there was only one hour between the revelation of v. 12 and its abrogation or modification by v. 13 (IK).

The Command in v. 13 to obey God and His Messenger (cf. 3:32, 132; 4:59; 5:92; 8:1, 20, 46; 24:54; 47:33; 49:14; 64:12; see also 7:156–57; 59:7) stands in juxtaposition to the condemnation in this same sūrah of those who oppose God and His Messenger (vv. 5, 20, 22). That the Command is combined with the injunctions to perform the prayer and give the alms (as in 33:33) implies that it is through prayer and almmsgiving, among other things, that such obedience is achieved.

14 Hast thou not seen those who befriend a people with whom God is wroth? They are not of you, nor are you of them. And they knowingly swear upon falsehood.

15 God has prepared for them a severe punishment. Evil indeed is that which they used to do.

14–18 These verses address the issue of hypocrisy among the Muslims of Madinah, which is dealt with more fully in Sūrah 63. The present passage is said to have been revealed with regard to a man of whom the Prophet said to a group of Muslims, “A man will come to you and look with the eyes of Satan. When he comes to you, do not speak to him!” A man of blue complexion then entered. The Prophet greeted him and said, “Why do you and your companions insult me?” The man said, “Let me bring them to you.” And he and his friends swore by God and made excuses. Then God revealed this verse (Sh, Sy, Ṭ, W). In another account, the man in question is identified as a hypocrite named ʿAbd Allāh ibn Nabant, who used to keep the company of the Prophet and then report what he heard from him to the Jews of Madinah. When asked why he and his friends insulted the Prophet, he swore by God that he did not, but the Prophet said that he did. ʿAbd Allāh ibn Nabant went and brought his friends who then swore by God that they did not insult him. Then God revealed vv. 14–18 (Q, W, Z). This verse is also part of the general command to not take enemies of Muslims as protectors, as in 3:28: Let not the believers take the disbelievers as protectors apart from the believers. Whosoever does that has no bond with God (see also 4:139, 144; 5:51, 57; 9:23).

16 They took their oaths as a shield and thus turned from the way of God; so theirs shall be a humiliating punishment.

16 That the hypocrites took their oaths as a shield (cf. 63:2) indicates that they have used them deceptively, a practice also abhorred in pre-Islamic Arabia. The Quran thus extols those who keep their oaths (3:77; 38:44) and warns against using them to harm or deceive, as in 16:94: Take not your oaths to practice deception among yourselves, lest a foot slip after it had been firmly planted, and you taste evil for your having turned from the way of God, and yours should be a great punishment (see also 2:224; 5:53, 89; 6:109; 9:13; 16:38, 91–92; 24:53; 35:42). That they turned from the way of God is understood to indicate the manner in which they turn others away or block them from the way of God by disparaging the Muslims and sowing doubt (Sh). But it can also mean that they themselves turned away.

17 Neither their property nor their children will avail them aught against God. They are the inhabitants of the Fire, abiding therein.

17 This verse is almost identical to 3:10 and 3:116. In the Hereafter, nothing other than belief and good deeds can avail anyone. Thus Abraham is reported to have said that the Day of Resurrection is the Day when neither wealth nor children avail, save for him who comes to God with a sound heart (26:88–89).

18 On the Day when God resurrects them all, they will swear to Him just as they swear to you, supposing that they have some standing. Lo! Truly they are the liars.
18 The hypocrites swear to God that they are Muslims (Z), supposing that they have some standing because they think their outward declarations of faith will benefit them (Z). Such a sentiment also indicates the implacability of their duplicity, as nothing can convince them of their error.

19 Satan has overwhelmed them, and so made them forget the remembrance of God. They are the party of Satan. Lo! The party of Satan are losers.

19 Satan rules over the hypocrites, so that their obedience is to him in all that he asks of them, they are among his flock, and they forget to remember God with their tongues and their hearts (Sh, Z). And as a famous ḥadīth states, “The likeness of one who remembers his Lord and one who does not remember is as the likeness of the living and the dead.”

20 Truly those who oppose God and His Messenger, they will be among the abased.

20 Those who oppose God and His Messenger refers to those who outwardly oppose and conspire against the Muslim community. Normal relations between Muslims and those non-Muslims who do not oppose them is allowed on an individual and communal level by verses such as 60:8: God does not forbid you, with regard to those who did not fight you on account of religion and did not expel you from your homes, from treating them righteously and being just toward them; and on a societal level by verses such as 8:61: And if they incline toward peace, incline thou toward it.

21 God has decreed, “I shall surely prevail, I and My messengers!” Truly God is Strong, Mighty.
21 Decreed could also be rendered “inscribed,” indicating that this has been written upon the Preserved Tablet (85:22; JJ, Sh, Z). The manner in which God and His messengers prevail is understood to be by means of both proof, which could refer to revelation, and the sword (Sh, Z).

22 You shall not find a people who believe in God and the Last Day loving those who oppose God and His Messenger, even if they be their fathers, their sons, their brothers, or their tribe. God has inscribed faith upon their hearts and strengthened them with a Spirit from Him. He causes them to enter Gardens with rivers running below, to abide therein, God being content with them and they being content with Him. They are the party of God. Truly the party of God—it is they who shall prosper.

22 This verse is in the second-person singular and can thus be taken as an address to the Muslims in general, as translated, or as an address to the Prophet himself, meaning, “Thou shalt not find” (Sh). The first sentence of this verse was reportedly revealed regarding several instances in which Muslims fought in battle against their own family members for the cause of Islam. Interpreted in this manner, their fathers refers to Abū ʿUbaydah ibn al-Jarrāḥ, who killed his father, ʿAbd Allāh, a soldier in the opposing Makkan army, at the Battle of Uḥud (IK, Q, Sy, W); their sons refers to Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, who challenged his son to a duel at the Battle of Badr, saying “O Messenger of God, let me be among the first [to fight or to die]” (IK, W); their brothers refers to Muḥ’ammad ibn ʿUmayr, who killed his brother, ʿUbayd ibn ʿUmayr, during the Battle of Badr (IK, Q, W); and their tribe refers to ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, who killed his uncle al-ʿĀṣ ibn Hishām at the Battle of Badr (Q, W). Beyond these specific instances to which the verse may refer, it indicates that the bond of faith and belief overrides that of family and provides greater protection (Sh); see 49:10c. It also reflects the broader Quranic theme that one must not love anything of this world at the expense of one’s love for God and His Messenger, as when the Prophet is commanded: Say, “If your fathers, your children, your brothers, your spouses, your tribe, the wealth you have acquired, commerce whose stagnation you fear, and dwellings you find pleasing are more beloved to you than God, and His Messenger, and striving in His way, then wait till God comes with His Command.” And God guides not iniquitous people (9:24).

That God has inscribed faith upon their hearts indicates that He has established it firmly in believers’ hearts and expanded their breasts for it (Z) or that He has consolidated faith in their hearts so that they believe in it fully, rather than believing some parts of it but not others (Q, R). That He has strengthened them with a Spirit from Him is understood in various ways. Some say it indicates the manner in which God aids believers in overcoming their enemies (Sh). Others say that a Spirit from Him refers to the Quran and its proofs; to light and faith; to clear proof and guidance; to the Mercy of God; or to the Archangel Gabriel (Q), all of which are profoundly interrelated. It can also be seen as a reference to the light of certainty (Aj). In this vein, the commentator al-Ālūsī writes, “What is intended [here] by Spirit is the light of the heart, which is the light that God casts into the hearts of whomsoever He will among His servants, and by which hearts attain peace [see 13:28] and ascend to the heights of realization (taḥqīq).” The pronominal suffix from Him (minhu), here interpreted as a reference to God, could also be read “from it,” in which case it would refer to the faith that He has inscribed upon their hearts (Aj, Āl, R, Z).

God being content with them and they being content with Him (cf. 5:119; 9:100; 98:8) indicates that God is content with their obedience to Him and they are content with His Recompense for them in the Hereafter and with what He has ordained for them in the world (Aj, IK). According to al-Rāzī, the items mentioned in this verse can be seen as four blessings from God: faith in the heart, support through a Spirit from Him, being admitted to the Garden, and mutual contentment with God; he also says, “The blessing of contentment is the greatest of blessings and the most distinguished of [spiritual] ranks.” Regarding this state of contentment, a hadith states, “Whosoever has submitted is provided for sufficiently, and whomsoever God has caused to be content with that which He has given him has succeeded” (Bg on 98:8). Also see 5:119c.

The party of God is also mentioned in 5:56, where it is used to describe those who avoid taking protectors other than God, the Messenger, and the believers, as enjoined in 5:51 and 5:55. Here it is placed in contrast to the party of Satan (v. 19), which in referring to the hypocrites mentioned in this sūrah indicates those who would compromise the Prophet and the Muslim community for the paltry gains of this world.

The Gathering

al-Ḥashr

A*l-Ḥashr*, a Madinan sūrah, takes its name from the mention of the first gathering in v. 2. It is also known as al-Naḏîr or Banū Naḏîr (Āl, IJ, Ṭ), since most of its verses are said to have been revealed in relation to the Jewish tribe of Banū Naḏîr after they were banished from Madinah for having broken their treaty with the nascent Muslim polity. This is the second in a group of sūrah known as “The Glorifiers” (al-Musabbiḥāt), because they begin with a reference to the glorification of God; the other sūrah in the group are 57, 61, 62, and 64. According to a ḥadīth, “Within [the Glorifiers] there is a verse that is better than a thousand verses” (IK, Q, Sh). Some scholars are of the opinion that this ḥadīth refers to v. 3 of Sūrah 57, al-Ḥadīd (IK, Sh), while others propose that it refers to the last verse of this sūrah (Sh).

After arriving in Madinah, the Prophet established peaceful relations with the Jewish tribes of the surrounding oasis, of which the largest were the Banū Qaynuqāᶜ, the Banū Naḏîr, and the Banū Qurayzhah. The tribes of the oasis had made a covenant, often known as the Constitution of Madinah, in which they pledged to support one another, should any of them be attacked by outside forces, and to make no alliances against one another. The Muslims believed that the Banū Qaynuqāᶜ had broken these terms after the Battle of Badr; hence the Banū Qaynuqāᶜ were subsequently banished from the oasis.
After the Battle of Uḥud, the Banū Naḍīr were accused of having entered into an alliance against the Muslims and having plotted to kill the Prophet. When the Prophet heard of their treachery, some say from the Archangel Gabriel, others say through a woman of the Banū Naḍīr, the Prophet presented them with the choice of leaving the oasis with all their possessions, but retaining the right to the proceeds from their crops, or facing war. They requested a respite of ten days. After conferring with their allies, among whom were some of the hypocrites within Madinah, they chose the latter course, thinking that reinforcements would be forthcoming. The Muslim armies besieged their fortresses for twenty-one days, during which time the fighting was limited to brief exchanges of arrows. The Banū Naḍīr’s hopes dwindled when none of the promised reinforcements arrived. When the Muslim armies cut some of the Banū Naḍīr’s prized date palms that lay just outside their fortresses, it was more than they could bear. They sent word they would agree to the initial terms of exile. The Prophet, however, was no longer willing to offer the same terms. Under the new terms, they would be banished, allowed to keep their considerable wealth, except their armaments, but had to forfeit their land, crops and all. The Banū Naḍīr had no choice but to accept.

Dealing with the complexities of administering justice when a treacherous group makes up a part of a small community, this sūrah addresses all of the groups that were to be found in the nascent Muslim community: the Emigrants from Makkah; the Helpers who had embraced Islam before the emigration; the Helpers who had embraced Islam after the emigration; the hypocrites, who embraced Islam outwardly but betrayed it inwardly, many of whom conspired against the Prophet; and the Jewish tribes, who initially welcomed the Prophet, but many of whom later developed animosity toward him and his followers. After the first section (vv. 1–5) addresses the situation of the Banū Naḍīr, vv. 6–10 discuss the proper distribution of spoils from their banishment among the different groups of believers and the relationships among these groups. Their harmonious relations are then contrasted to the disharmony between the hypocrites and the Banū Naḍīr (vv. 11–19), whose counsel toward one another is likened to that of Satan (v. 16). After declaring the incommensurability of those destined for the Fire and those destined for the Garden (v. 20), the sūrah ends with a famous passage that discusses the nature of the revelation (v. 21) and provides the most comprehensive list of Divine Names in the Quran (vv. 22–24).

1 Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God, and He is the Mighty, the Wise. 2 He it is Who expelled those who disbelieve among the People of the Book from their homes at the first gathering. You did not think they would go forth, and they thought their fortresses would protect them from God. Then God came upon them whence they reckoned not, and cast terror into their hearts, as they razed their houses with their own hands and with the hands of the believers. So take heed, O you who are possessed of sight. 3 Had God not ordained banishment for them, He would have punished them in this world. And in the Hereafter theirs shall be the punishment of the Fire. 4 That is because they defied God and His Messenger; and whosoever defies God and His Messenger, truly God is severe in retribution. 5 Whatsoever of the palm trees you cut down or left standing upon their roots, it was by God’s Leave, and that He might disgrace the iniquitous. 6 As for what God has given in spoils from them to the Messenger, you spurred neither horse nor camel for it. But God grants His messengers authority over whomsoever He will, and God is Powerful over all things. 7 That which God has given in spoils to His Messenger from the people of the towns is for God and His Messenger, and for kinfolk, orphans, the indigent, and the traveler, that it not come to circulate among your wealthy. Whatsoever the Messenger gives you, take it; and whatsoever he forbids to you, forgo, and reverence God. Truly God is severe in retribution. 8 For the poor emigrants who were expelled from their homes and their property seeking bounty and contentment from God and who help God and His Messenger—it is, they who are the truthful. 9 And those who were settled in the land and in belief before them love those who emigrated to them and find in their breasts no need for that which they were given. They prefer others over themselves, even if they be impoverished. And whosoever is shielded from the avarice of his soul, it is they who shall prosper. 10 And those who came after them say, “Our Lord! Forgive us and our brothers who preceded us in faith, and place no rancor in our hearts toward those who believe. Our Lord! Truly Thou art Kind, Merciful.” 11 Hast thou not seen those who act with hypocrisy, saying to their brothers who disbelieve among the People of the Book, “If you are expelled, surely we shall go forth with you. And we shall never obey anyone against you. And if you are fought, we shall help you.” God bears witness that they are surely liars. 12 Were they expelled, they would not go forth with them, and were they fought, they would not help them. And were they to help them, they would surely turn their backs. Then they would not be helped. 13 Truly you incite more intense dread in their breasts than God. That is because they are a people who do not comprehend. 14 They will not fight you all together, save in fortified towns or from behind walls. Their might is fierce among themselves. You suppose that they are together; yet their hearts are divided. That is because they are a people who do not understand, 15 like those who shortly before them tasted the evil consequences of their affair—and theirs shall be a painful punishment— 16 like Satan when he says unto man, “Disbelieve!” Then when he disbelieves, he says, “Surely I am quit of you. Truly I fear God, Lord of the worlds.” 17 The end of both is that they will be in the Fire, abiding therein. That is the recompense of the wrongdoers. 18 O you who believe! Reverence God and let every soul consider what it has sent forth for the morrow; and reverence God. Truly God is Aware of whatsoever you do.

And be not like those who forget God, such that He makes them forget their souls. It is they who are the iniquitous.

Not equal are the inhabitants of the Fire and the inhabitants of the Garden. The inhabitants of the Garden—they are the triumphant.

Had We made this Quran descend upon a mountain, thou wouldst have seen it humbled, rent asunder by the fear of God. These are the parables We set forth for mankind, that haply they may reflect.

He is God, other than Whom there is no god, Knower of the Unseen and the seen. And He is the Compassionate, the Merciful.

He is God, other than Whom there is no god, the Sovereign, the Holy, Peace, the Faithful, the Protector, the Mighty, the Compeller, the Proud. Glory be to Him above the partners they ascribe.

He is God, the Creator, the Maker, the Fashioner; unto Him belong the Most Beautiful Names. Whatsoever is in the heavens and the earth glorifies Him, and He is the Mighty, the Wise.
Commentary

Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God, and He is the Mighty, the Wise.

Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God is repeated in 61:1; 62:1; 64:1; see 64:1c. To the many permutations of this phrase in the Quran, 17:44 adds, And there is no thing, save that it hymns His praise, though you do not understand their praise.

He it is Who expelled those who disbelieve among the People of the Book from their homes at the first gathering. You did not think they would go forth, and they thought their fortresses would protect them from God. Then God came upon them whence they reckoned not, and cast terror into their hearts, as they razed their houses with their own hands and with the hands of the believers. So take heed, O you who are possessed of sight.

Here those who disbelieve among the People of the Book is a specific reference to the BanūNaḍīr; see the introduction to this sūrah. At the first gathering refers to the gathering of the Muslim forces. Alternately, it can be read “to the first gathering” as a reference to the BanūNaḍīr’s having been banished to Syria (T), but then gathering in Khaybar. God cast terror into their hearts when the Prophet heard of their plans to assassinate him and had their leader, Kaʿb ibn Ashraf, executed instead (Q). God came upon them whence they reckoned not refers to the fact that those who executed Kaʿb had previously been trusted allies of the Banū Naḍīr (Q). After being forced to leave their homes, the Banū Naḍīr are reported to have taken them apart with their own hands, as they sought to take with them anything of value (T). That they razed their houses with their own hands could also be taken as an allusion to the fact that their banishment and loss of property resulted from their breaking their treaty and then rejecting more congenial terms before being forced to forfeit their homes. and their land altogether. The injunction to take heed, or “reflect,” O you who are possessed of sight, is understood by the philosopher and jurisprudent Ibn Rushd as a “proof of the obligatory nature of the syllogism, or of both the syllogism and legal reasoning (qiyās)” (Faṣl al-maqāl, 28).

3 Had God not ordained banishment for them, He would have punished them in this world. And in the Hereafter theirs shall be the punishment of the Fire.

4 That is because they defied God and His Messenger; and whosoever defies God and His Messenger, truly God is severe in retribution.

3–4 He would have punished them in this world is interpreted to mean that, had the Banū Naḍīr not been banished, God would have punished them with execution and capture (Ṭ), just as the Banū Qurayzah were punished for their treachery after the Battle of the Trench in 4/627.

5 Whatsoever of the palm trees you cut down or left standing upon their roots, it was by God’s Leave, and that He might disgrace the iniquitous.

5 After the siege of the Banū Naḍīr had lasted for several days, the Prophet ordered the cutting down and burning of some palm trees that lay within sight of their fortresses. The Banū Naḍīr were alarmed and said, “You claim, O Muhammad, that you seek goodness. Is there any goodness in damaging productive trees and cutting them down?” They also said to him, “Is corruption upon the earth part of what you claim has been revealed to you?” The Prophet was distressed upon hearing this, and the Muslims began to fear that cutting down the trees may have been an act of corruption. Yet they disagreed among themselves. Some said not to cut the palm trees down, for they were part of what God had given as spoils, but others wanted to cut them down. And so God revealed v. 5, confirming the opinion of those who warned against cutting the palm trees down, while at the same time affirming the lawfulness of cutting them down under these particular circumstances. God informed them that the cutting down of trees or leaving them standing is only by His Leave (IK, W). Gratuitous destruction of enemy property, especially trees and crops, is prohibited by Islamic Law (Bg, IK, R, Ṭ, Z).

6 As for what God has given in spoils from them to the Messenger, you spurred neither horse nor camel for it. But God grants His messengers authority over whomsoever He will, and God is Powerful over all things.

6 You spurred neither horse nor camel for it indicates that the property taken from the Banū Naḍīr was not to be treated as booty acquired in battle, which would have been distributed among the victorious combatants with one-fifth going to the Prophet for the needs of the Muslim community, as stipulated in 8:41: Whatsoever you take as spoils, a fifth is for God and His Messenger, and for kinsfolk, orphans, the indigent, and the traveler. But in this instance, as the booty had in effect been surrendered without a fight, the Prophet was to be granted full authority over its distribution. He then gave it to the Emigrants, many of whom had been in straitened circumstances since their emigration from Makkah, and to two of the Helpers, the Muslims who had made Madinah their home before the migration of the Prophet. The remainder he used for the needs of his family and to purchase armaments for the Muslims (IK).

7 That which God has given in spoils to His Messenger from the people of the towns is for God and His Messenger, and for kinfolk, orphans, the indigent, and the traveler, that it not come to circulate among your wealthy. Whatsoever the Messenger gives you, take it; and whatsoever he forbids to you, forgo, and reverence God. Truly God is severe in retribution.
The recipients of the booty listed here appear in one form or another in several other verses (e.g., 2:177, 214; 4:36; 8:41); see also the essay “Quranic Ethics, Human Rights, and Society.” That it not come to circulate among your wealthy indicates that the Prophet sought to distribute the spoils of the siege in a manner that would establish greater economic parity among the Muslims. Although this verse provides specific rulings pertaining to the distribution of booty after the defeat of the Banū Naḍīr, Muslims have often taken the injunction Whatsoever the Messenger gives you, take it; and whatsoever he forbids to you, forgo, and reverence God as a more general command applying to all that was enjoined by the Prophet, in accord with many verses that command Muslims to obey God and obey the Messenger (3:32; 4:59; 5:92; 24:54; 47:33; 64:12; see also 3:132; 4:80; 7:156–57; 8:1, 20, 46; 33:33; 49:14; 58:13). Hence this verse is often linked to a famous saying of the Prophet: “When I order you to do something, then do as much of it as you can. If I forbid something for you, then shun it” (IK, Q).

For the poor emigrants who were expelled from their homes and their property seeking bounty and contentment from God and who help God and His Messenger—it is, they who are the truthful.

Rather than being used to further enrich the wealthy, the spoils of war are to be distributed among the poor (Q). Bounty indicates what the emigrants sought in this world, and contentment indicates what they sought in the Hereafter (Q). They help God and His Messenger by striving and fighting in the way of God (Q). Truthful translates ṣâdiqūn, which can also mean “sincere,” and here indicates those who act in accord with their beliefs, in stark contrast to the hypocrites, who are criticized in vv. 11–12.

And those who were settled in the land and in belief before them love those who emigrated to them and find in their breasts no need for that which they were given. They prefer others over themselves, even if they be impoverished. And whosoever is shielded from the avarice of his soul, it is they who shall prosper.

9 In the land refers to Madinah, and those who were settled . . . in belief before them refers to the Muslims of Madinah who had embraced Islam before the arrival of the Prophet and the Emigrants from Makkah. This verse was reportedly revealed in relation to an incident in which the Prophet entrusted one of the People of the Veranda (the poor who lived outside the Prophet’s Mosque in Madinah; see 2:273c) to a man from the Helpers. The Helper took the man to his family and asked his wife, “Do we have anything [to feed him]?” She said, “We do not have anything except the children’s food.” He said, “Put them to sleep, and then bring me the food. And when you put the food down, turn the lamp off.” He then offered what he had to his guest. The following morning he took him back to the Messenger of God. The Prophet said, “Truly the dwellers of the heavens are amazed at what you two have done.” This verse was then revealed (IK, W). They prefer others over themselves is related to those verses that praise giving wealth despite loving it (2:177; 76:8). Find in their breasts no need has broader implications, as it indicates removing this world from one’s heart, so that the heart is no longer attached to what passes it by (Aj). In this vein, a hadith states, “Abstain from the world, and God will love you; abstain from what pertains to other people, and the people will love you.” Whosoever is shielded from the avarice of his soul (cf. 64:16) thus describes those who feel no need for what is destined for others and are thereby protected, as in another hadith, “Your worst enemy is the soul between your two sides.” In this same vein, the Prophet warned his followers, “Be on your guard against committing oppression, for oppression is a darkness on the Day of Resurrection. Be on your guard against avarice, for avarice is what destroyed those who were before you. It made them shed blood and make lawful that which was unlawful for them” (IK).

10 And those who came after them say, “Our Lord! Forgive us and our brothers who preceded us in faith, and place no rancor in our hearts toward those who believe. Our Lord! Truly Thou art Kind, Merciful.”
10 Those who came after them refers to those who embraced Islam after the Prophet and his followers had emigrated from Makkah, in contrast to those Helpers who had embraced Islam before the emigration. It is thus seen as designating a third category of believers, alluded to in 9:100: [As for the foremost, the first among the Emigrants and the Helpers, and those who followed them with virtue, God is content with them, and they are content with Him* (IK). Their prayer indicates their desire that there be no discord between them and those who preceded them in religion. But it can also be understood to impart an attitude that all Muslims should have toward one another (R). Those who came after them can also be read as a reference to everyone who enters Islam until the Day of Resurrection, while our brothers who preceded us in faith can be read as a reference to the People of the Book, who preceded the Muslims in belief (Q). In this sense, the verse indicates that the preferred course with the Banū Naḍīr would have been reconciliation, but that once they had become resolute in their defiance, there was no alternative but banishment.

11 Hast thou not seen those who act with hypocrisy, saying to their brothers who disbelieve among the People of the Book, “If you are expelled, surely we shall go forth with you. And we shall never obey anyone against you. And if you are fought, we shall help you.” God bears witness that they are surely liars.

12 Were they expelled, they would not go forth with them, and were they fought, they would not help them. And were they to help them, they would surely turn their backs. Then they would not be helped.

11–12 In contrast to the different categories of believers mentioned above, these verses discuss the hypocrites of Madinah, chiefly ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy, who reportedly promised the Banū Naḍīr that he and his followers would support them in their fight against the Muslims. But when they could not muster sufficient forces, they reneged on their promise and watched as one of their allies was forced to leave the oasis. The hypocrites are here considered so cowardly and duplicitous that even if they did muster the promised forces, they would soon be driven away by the Muslim army; hence the Banū Naḍīr would still not

13 Truly you incite more intense dread in their breasts than God. That is because they are a people who do not comprehend.

13 The Banū Naḍīr are condemned here for breaking their pact and thus violating the principles of their religion, for, had they feared God, they would not have done so and would not now need to seek refuge from the Muslim army. That they fear human beings more than God indicates that they are focused upon this world rather than the Hereafter.

14 They will not fight you all together, save in fortified towns or from behind walls. Their might is fierce among themselves. You suppose that they are together; yet their hearts are divided. That is because they are a people who do not understand, 14 Their might is fierce among themselves has two meanings: first, the Banū Naḍīr believe that they are strong and courageous, though in reality they are not; second, “their enmity is great among themselves,” indicating that they appear united but are in fact at odds with one another (IK). You suppose that they are together; yet their hearts are divided refers to either the discord between the Jews of Madinah and the hypocrites (IK) or inner discord among the Jews of Madinah themselves. Although one might see them combining forces and think that these forces are harmonious, in reality they are severely divided (IK). The discord that people experience among themselves is a form of punishment sent by God, as in 6:65: He is the One Who has power to send a punishment upon you from above you or from beneath your feet, or to confound you as discordant factions and make you taste the might of one another. In contrast, it is a sign of God’s Mercy when the hearts of those who had been enemies are joined; see 3:103.

like those who shortly before them tasted the evil consequences of their affair—and theirs shall be a painful punishment—

15  Those who shortly before them refers to the Banū Qaynuqā’, another Jewish tribe which had been driven out of Madinah for similar treachery two years before the Banū Naḍr (IK). They tasted the evil consequences of their affair through the punishment imposed upon them in this life, and theirs shall be a painful punishment in the Hereafter (Bḍ).

like Satan when he says unto man, “Disbelieve!” Then when he disbelieves, he says, “Surely I am quit of you. Truly I fear God, Lord of the worlds.”

The end of both is that they will be in the Fire, abiding therein. That is the recompense of the wrongdoers.

16–17  These verses draw an analogy between the way the hypocrites betrayed the Jews and the way Satan betrays human beings (Bḍ), as in 8:48: Satan made their deeds seem fair unto them, and said, “None among mankind shall overcome you today, and I am indeed your defender.” But when the two hosts saw each other, he turned on his heels and said, “I am quit of you!” The manner in which Satan declares himself to be quit or innocent of what he entices the disbelievers to ascribe to him is most evident in 14:22: And Satan will say, when the matter has been decreed, “Verily God made you the Promise of truth; and I made you a promise, but I failed you. And I had no authority over you, save that I called you, and you responded to me. So do not blame me, but blame yourselves. I cannot respond to your cries for help; nor can you respond to my cries for help. Truly I disbelieved in your ascribing me as partner aforetime.”

O you who believe! Reverence God and let every soul consider what it has sent forth for the morrow; and reverence God. Truly God is Aware of whatsoever you do.
Let every soul consider what it has sent forth for the morrow indicates that everyone should reflect upon their deeds and evaluate how they may fare on the Day of Judgment. It is reported that upon seeing the impoverished state of some Muslims, the Prophet called the people together and then recited 4:1, O mankind! Reverence your Lord, Who created you from a single soul and from it created its mate, and from the two has spread abroad a multitude of men and women, followed by this verse, whereupon many Muslims brought food and clothes for the impoverished members of the community (IK).

And be not like those who forget God, such that He makes them forget their souls. It is they who are the iniquitous.

That God makes those who forget God forget their souls, or themselves, indicates that they cease to listen to what benefits the soul and to do what would purify it (Bḍ), and that they are therefore unable to prepare for the Day of Judgment. Some say this means that they forget the right of God and thus the right of their souls, or the share that is their due (Bḍ, Ṭ). From another perspective, those who forget God, such that He makes them forget their souls is an inversion of the famous saying, sometimes regarded as a ḥadīth, “He who knows himself knows this Lord.” Since forgetfulness of God is the cause of forgetfulness of self, remembering the self necessitates that God first remember the self, and God’s remembering the self will itself necessitate the self’s remembering itself, as in 2:152: Remember Me, and I shall remember you. From this perspective, whoever does not have self-knowledge does not know God and will be unfortunate in the next life. Thus 8:45 enjoins, Be firm and remember God much, that haply you may prosper.

Not equal are the inhabitants of the Fire and the inhabitants of the Garden. The inhabitants of the Garden—they are the triumphant.

This is one of several verses that indicate the disparity between believers and disbelievers (see 38:28). Elsewhere the chasm between the believers and disbelievers is likened to that between the seeing and the blind (see 35:19; 40:58) and to those who know and those who do not know (39:9).

(21) Had We made this Quran descend upon a mountain, thou wouldst have seen it humbled, rent asunder by the fear of God. These are the parables We set forth for mankind, that haply they may reflect.

21 Humbled can also be read as “brought low.” Most understand this verse as a reprimand to human beings whose hearts remain hard and unmoved in the face of the Quran (Aj, IK, Z), as if to say, “How is it that your hearts are so hard that they do not soften to the Quran, as even the mountains would?” (IK). This verse is thus an injunction for human beings to listen to and receive the Quran with fear and humility (IK, Ṭ). From another perspective, this verse exalts the potentiality of the human heart, which alone among all created things can contain the Quran, as alluded to in 33:72: Truly We offered the Trust unto the heavens and the earth and the mountains, but they refused to bear it, and were wary of it—yet man bore it (Aj). Seen in this light, the Divine Names presented in the verses that follow are an allusion to the Divine Qualities to which it is said the heart of God’s believing servants can attain. In this vein, a well-known ḥadīth qudsī states, “My heavens and My earth embrace Me not, but the heart of My believing servant does embrace Me” (al-Ghazzālī, Iḥyāʾ, III.1.5).

(22) He is God, other than Whom there is no god, Knower of the Unseen and the seen. And He is the Compassionate, the Merciful.

22–24 This passage is considered to be among the “Jewels of the Quran” and is often recited in both obligatory and supererogatory prayers. It provides the most extensive list of Divine Names in the Quran, seventeen in all—or eighteen, if one includes the pronoun He (huwa) with which the passage begins and which many consider a Divine Name pertaining to the Divine Essence. Many sayings extol the recitation of this sūrah, especially these last three verses (sometimes including v. 21 as well). According to one saying attributed to the early Ḥadīth specialist Fuḍayl ibn ʿIyāḍ (d. 187/803), “One who reads the end of the sūrah of ‘The Gathering’ [vv. 21–24] until the morning and then dies on that very day is stamped with the stamp of those who witness [God]. One who reads it in the evening and then dies that very night is stamped with the stamp of those who witness [God]” (Iḥyāʾ, K. Qirāʾāt al-Qurʾān).

22 For an explanation of the Islamic testimony of faith (shahādah), with which this passage begins, see 2:255c. The Name Allāh—“God”—is referred to as the all-comprehensive Name (al-ism al-jāmiʿ), because it is said to comprise all the particular qualities that each of the other Names conveys. It is also the most specific of the Names, since it cannot be used to describe any being other than God, whereas many other Divine Names, such as the Merciful or the Clement, can. Knower of the Unseen and the seen (cf. 6:73; 9:94, 105; 13:9; 23:92; 32:6; 39:46; 62:8; 64:18) indicates that God knows all that is hidden and all that is manifest on all levels of reality, in both this world and the Hereafter (Q, R). It can also mean that God knows all things before they become manifest in external existence, when they are “Unseen,” and after they come into external existence, when they can be seen (Aj). Regarding the Compassionate, the Merciful, see 1:3c.

23 He is God, other than Whom there is no god, the Sovereign, the Holy, Peace, the Faithful, the Protector, the Mighty, the Compeller, the Proud. Glory be to Him above the partners they ascribe.

23 According to Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī in his Commentary on the Most Beautiful Names of God, there is a progression in the first five Names listed here from those that pertain more closely to the Divine Essence to those that pertain more closely to Divine Action. The Sovereign is the One Who in both His Essence and His Attributes has no need of any other being, while all other things are in need of Him. The Holy is the One Who transcends utterly any quality that one might attribute to Him, thus indicating that His Perfection is beyond human conception. Peace translates ṣalām, which indicates being flawless, beyond all imperfections, and untarnished by any evil or inner contradiction. According to a ḥadīth, some Companions used to pray “Peace upon God,” until the Prophet corrected them, indicating that God was Himself Peace. The Faithful translates al-Muʿmin, the same word that is rendered “believer” when used to describe human beings. When said of God, al-Muʿmin refers to the One Who provides all safety and security. The Protector is the One Who watches over His creation, tending to their actions and their provision at every moment. The Mighty indicates the One Who is eminent, of Whom others have need and to Whom access is difficult. The Compeller is the One Whose Will prevails over the will of all others, the One Whose grasp nothing escapes, yet Whom nothing else can grasp. The Proud is the One Who is majestic to the exclusion of all else, so that nothing is worthy of being considered in relation to Him.

24 He is God, the Creator, the Maker, the Fashioner; unto Him belong the Most Beautiful Names. Whatsoever is in the heavens and the earth glorifies Him, and He is the Mighty, the Wise.

The Creator, the Maker, the Fashioner can be correlated to three stages in the unfolding of creation: the Creator indicates the Quality of God through which He measures things out before they come into existence in this world; the Maker indicates the manner in which God then brings things into being; and the Fashioner indicates the manner in which God then gives things form with various characteristics (Q). Alternately, these three Divine Names can be seen as referring more specifically to the three stages through which creatures, in particular human beings, develop in the womb (Q).

Regarding unto Him belong the Most Beautiful Names (cf. 7:180; 17:110; 20:8), a famous ḥadīth states, “God has ninety-nine Names—one hundred minus one—and whosoever enumerates them will enter the Garden” (IK), though many scholars maintain that God has more than ninety-nine Names, many of which are not revealed to human beings. In this vein, the Prophet is reported to have called upon God saying, “I implore Thee by every Name that is Thine, by which Thou hast named Thyself, or which Thou hast revealed in Thy Book, or which Thou hast taught to any of Thy creation, or which Thou hast assigned to Thyself in Thy knowledge of things unseen.”
A Madinan sūrah, al-Mumtaḥanah was most likely revealed sometime after the year 6/628. Some maintain that the first verse was revealed on the day Makkah was conquered by the Muslim army in 8/630. The sūrah takes its name from the injunction to examine them in v. 10. As translated, the title refers to the woman regarding whom several of its verses are said to have been revealed, Umm Kulthūm bint ʿUqbah (Āl, Q). It is also known as al-Imtiḥān, “The Examining” (Āl) or “The Examiner,” which describes the sūrah as one that examines and exposes the faults of human beings (Q), a quality that could also be attributed to the entire Quran. Some have also named this sūrah al-Mawaddah, “Affection” (Āl), most likely after the phrases you offer them affection (v. 1) and God will forge affection (v. 7), and because the entire sūrah clarifies where the affections of the believers should lie.

That there should be no affection for or alliances with an enemy party is made clear in vv. 1–3. The case of Abraham and his followers is then cited as an example to be followed (vv. 4–6) in this regard. The next passage (vv. 7–9) provides hope that better relations can be established with enemy parties and allows for good relations with those who do not oppose the Muslims. The last section (vv. 10–12) addresses the complex situation brought about by the emigration of women from Makkah to Madinah and the rules to be observed when women who are married to idolaters choose to embrace Islam.
Marriages between believers and disbelievers were henceforth considered invalid, but were to be dissolved in as equitable a manner as possible.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. O you who believe! Take not Mine enemy and your enemy as friends—you offer them affection, though they have indeed disbelieved in the truth that has come to you, expelling the Messenger and you for having believed in God your Lord—if you have gone forth striving in My way and seeking My good pleasure. You show them affection in secret, while I know best that which you hide and that which you disclose. And whosoever among you does so has indeed strayed from the right way. 2. Were they to come upon you, they would be enemies unto you and would stretch forth their hands and their tongues against you in evil. And they wish you to disbelieve. 3. Your family relations and your children will not benefit you on the Day of Resurrection; He will distinguish between you. And God sees whatsoever you do. 4. There is indeed a beautiful example for you in Abraham and those with him, when they said to their people, “Truly we are quit of you and of all that you worship apart from God. We have rejected you, and enmity and hatred have arisen between us and you forever, till you believe in God alone”; save for Abraham’s saying to his father, “I shall assuredly ask forgiveness for you, though I have no power to avail you aught from God.” “Our Lord, in Thee do we trust, unto Thee do we turn in repentance, and unto Thee is the journey’s end. 5. Our Lord! Make us not a trial for those who disbelieve, and forgive us. Our Lord! Truly Thou art the Mighty, the Wise.” 6. You have a beautiful example in them for whosoever hopes for God and the Last Day. And whosoever turns away—truly God is the Self-Sufficient, the Praised. 7. It may be that God will forge affection between you and those of them with whom you are in enmity. God is Powerful, and God is Forgiving, Merciful. God does not forbid you, with regard to those who did not fight you on account of religion and did not expel you from your homes, from treating them righteously and being just toward them. Truly God loves the just. God only forbids you, with regard to those who fought you on account of religion and expelled you from your homes and supported your expulsion, from befriending them; whosoever befriends them, they are the wrongdoers.

O you who believe! When the believing women come unto you as emigrants, examine them. God knows best their faith. Then if you know them to be believers, do not return them to the disbelievers. Those women are not lawful for those men; nor are those men lawful for those women. And give them what they have spent. There is no blame upon you if you marry them when you have given them their bridewealth. And hold not to the ties of disbelieving women. Ask for what you have spent, and let them ask for what they have spent. That is the Judgment of God; He judges between you. And God is Knowing, Wise.

And if any of your wives should go over to the disbelievers, and then you have your turn, give those whose wives have gone the like of what they have spent. And reverence God, in Whom you are believers. O Prophet! When believing women come unto thee, pledging unto thee that they will not ascribe any as partners unto God, nor steal, nor fornicate, nor slay their children, nor bring a slanderous lie that they have fabricated between their hands and feet, nor disobey thee in anything honorable, then accept their pledge and seek God’s Forgiveness for them. Truly God is Forgiving, Merciful.

O you who believe! Do not befriend a people with whom God is wroth; they who have despaired of the Hereafter, just as the disbelievers have despared of the inhabitants of graves.
O you who believe! Take not Mine enemy and your enemy as friends—you offer them affection, though they have indeed disbelieved in the truth that has come to you, expelling the Messenger and you for having believed in God your Lord—if you have gone forth striving in My way and seeking My good pleasure. You show them affection in secret, while I know best that which you hide and that which you disclose. And whosoever among you does so has indeed strayed from the right way.

1 Friends translates awliyā́, which could also be rendered “protectors,” “helpers,” or “allies” (Ṭ). This verse was reportedly revealed in relation to a member of the Muslim community who attempted to disclose the Prophet’s plans to the Quraysh. The Prophet sent several Companions to intercept the letter sent by Ḥāṭib ibn Abī Balta‘ah. After intercepting the letter, which had information about the Prophet’s plans to march upon Makkah, the Prophet asked, “What is this, O Ḥāṭib?” He answered, “Be not hasty [in judging me], I am a man who is merely allied with the Quraysh, for I am not myself a Qurayshite. All the Emigrants with you have relatives who will protect them. I have no relatives in Makkah; so I wanted to obtain some assistance from the Quraysh. By God, I did not do it because I doubt my religion, nor because I have turned to disbelief after choosing Islam.” The Prophet said, “He has spoken the truth!” But ʿUmar exclaimed, “Let me strike the neck of this hypocrite!” To which the Prophet responded, “He has taken part in the Battle of Badr. You do not know; perhaps God has looked upon those who took part in the Battle of Badr and said, ‘Do as you please, for I have forgiven you.’” Then this verse was revealed (Q, Ṭ, W). Despite the Prophet’s leniency, the verse indicates that to choose alliance with disbelievers over alliance with the Prophet and the Muslim community is to stray from the right way (sawāʾ al-sabīl), which literally means, “the middle way.”

Were they to come upon you, they would be enemies unto you and would stretch forth their hands and their tongues against you in evil. And they wish you to disbelieve.

Stretch forth their hands means that they would fight and try to kill the believers (JJ, T), while stretch forth . . . their tongues means that they will insult and revile them (JJ). They wish for derives from the same root as affection in v. 1, w-d-d, indicating that, while some believers still harbor affection for some of the disbelievers, many of the disbelievers only maintain their bonds in the hopes that the believers will revert to idolatry.

Your family relations and your children will not benefit you on the Day of Resurrection; He will distinguish between you. And God sees whatsoever you do.

Here your family relations and your children could be a specific reference to those who remain idolatrous (JJ) or a broader reference to the fact that each person stands alone before God on the Day of Judgment, which is thus described as the Day when neither wealth nor children avail, save for him who comes to God with a sound heart (26:88–89). For other references to this broad Quranic theme, see 3:10, 14, 116; 8:28; 9:24, 55, 69, 85; 18:39–40, 46; 23:55–56; 26:88; 34:35–37; 63:9c; 64:14–15; 68:14; 71:21. This verse could also be read, “Your family relations and your children will not benefit you. On the Day of Resurrection He will distinguish between you.” In both readings, that God will distinguish between you means that the believers and disbelievers will be divided from one another and judged separately.

There is indeed a beautiful example for you in Abraham and those with him, when they said to their people, “Truly we are quit of you and of all that you worship apart from God. We have rejected you, and enmity and hatred have arisen between us and you forever, till you believe in God alone”; save for Abraham’s saying to his father, “I shall assuredly ask forgiveness for you, though I have no power to avail you aught from God.” “Our Lord, in Thee do we trust, unto Thee do we turn in repentance, and unto Thee is the journey’s end.

4 Those with him refers to the prophets (T) or to those who followed Abraham (JJ, R). According to the first interpretation, the believers are told to look to the examples set by all previous prophets. When they said to their people thus refers to the manner in which all prophets sought to distance themselves from the disbelievers in their respective communities (T). According to the second interpretation, the believers are enjoined to follow the example of Abraham and his followers in rejecting the idolaters (R). According to both interpretations, Abraham’s seeking forgiveness for his father is not a beautiful example to be followed, because one should not seek forgiveness for disbelievers (JJ, R, Ṭ, Z). Thus 9:113 says of Abraham’s prayer for his father, But when it became clear to him that he was an enemy of God, he repudiated him. In other passages, Muhammad is told to seek forgiveness for his followers (3:159; 24:62), and Jacob agrees to seek forgiveness for his sons (12:97–8). But where there is no corresponding attitude of repentance on the part of those for whom forgiveness is sought, the Quran says, It is the same for them whether thou askest forgiveness for them or thou askest forgiveness for them not; God will never forgive them. Truly God guides not iniquitous people (63:6; see also 4:107; 9:80). The ability of prophets and angels (see 40:7; 42:5) to pray for the forgiveness of others is related to the heavily debated Quranic topic of intercession, regarding which see 2:48c; 2:255c.

5 Our Lord! Make us not a trial for those who disbelieve, and forgive us. Our Lord! Truly Thou art the Mighty, the Wise.”

5 The plea in this verse is, “Do not let the disbelievers defeat us such that they are fooled into thinking they are followers of the truth” (Bg, JJ, R), or “Do not let the disbelievers defeat us such that they will be punished on account of what they have done to us” (R); cf. 10:85; 25:20. It can also be seen as expressing the desire that evil not befall the disbelievers, since from a Quranic perspective that is the likely outcome of a situation in which the believers are a trial for disbelievers, as in 85:10: Truly those who persecute believing men and believing women, then do not repent, theirs shall be the punishment of Hell, and theirs shall be the punishment of burning. The verse could also be understood as a general prayer that trial and strife (fitnah) not arise between the two communities.

6 You have a beautiful example in them for whosoever hopes for God and the Last Day. And whosoever turns away—truly God is the Self-Sufficient, the Praised.

6 The example of Abraham and his people dissociating themselves from the disbelievers among their own tribe is the model for those who anticipate the meeting with God and hope for the reward of the Hereafter (R); see 43:26–27: Abraham said to his father and his people, “Truly I am quit of that which you worship, save Him who originated me, for surely He will guide me.” In the present verse, whosoever turns away refers to those who do not follow the injunctions of vv. 1–4 and maintain ties with the enemies among the disbelievers (JJ).

7 It may be that God will forge affection between you and those of them with whom you are in enmity. God is Powerful, and God is Forgiving, Merciful.

7 According to some accounts, after the revelation of vv. 4–6, extolling the example of Abraham and his followers, who shunned the idolaters among them, many Muslims declared their relatives among the idolaters to be their enemies. Knowing that this was hard on them, God revealed this verse (W). God “forged affection” between them through marriage, for example, when the Prophet married Umm Ḥabībah, the daughter of the Qurayshī leader Abū Sufyān (Q, W), and by guiding the disbelievers to belief (JJ). God is Powerful to do that, Forgiving of their past deeds if they repent, and Merciful to them by continuing to offer guidance.
God does not forbid you, with regard to those who did not fight you on account of religion and did not expel you from your homes, from treating them righteously and being just toward them. Truly God loves the just.

Muslims are here encouraged not to treat an entire people as enemies, if only some of those people are in fact enemies. In this context, God does not forbid you is understood as a positive exhortation meaning, “God wishes you to do so” (Q, R, Ṭ). This verse was reportedly revealed in response to a specific incident when Asmāʾ, the daughter of Abū Bakr, refused to meet her mother, who had come from Makkah to visit her in Madinah, because her mother had remained an idolater rather than embracing Islam. When the situation was brought to the attention of the Prophet, this verse was revealed. Asmāʾ then received her mother in her house (Q, Ṭ, W). In this context, that God loves the just (cf. 5:42) indicates that God loves those who are able to discern between those who are enemies and those who are not, thus avoiding indiscriminate animosity.

God only forbids you, with regard to those who fought you on account of religion and expelled you from your homes and supported your expulsion, from befriending them; whosoever befriends them, they are the wrongdoers.

Though Muslims are enjoined to not bear animosity toward an entire people, they are also not to befriend or make alliances with members of an enemy force. Such clarifications were crucial at the beginning of the formation of the Islamic community, because many Muslims still had relatives among the Quraysh of Makkah or had previously held alliances with other tribes that were allied with the Quraysh. Nonetheless, the injunctions of this verse have more general implications; see also 5:51c.
10 O you who believe! When the believing women come unto you as emigrants, examine them. God knows best their faith. Then if you know them to be believers, do not return them to the disbelievers. Those women are not lawful for those men; nor are those men lawful for those women. And give them what they have spent. There is no blame upon you if you marry them when you have given them their bridewealth. And hold not to the ties of disbelieving women. Ask for what you have spent, and let them ask for what they have spent. That is the Judgment of God; He judges between you. And God is Knowing, Wise.

10 This verse discusses the legality of marriage between Muslims and people of other communities, forbidding marriage between Muslims and disbelievers (see also 2:221). Examine them means that when women come to embrace Islam, the Muslims must first be sure that they have migrated to Madinah out of sincere belief, not out of enmity toward their husbands or because they were enamored of other men (JJ). God knows best their faith indicates that, once they have taken an oath, their word is to be trusted and the matter is between them and God. Though marriage between believers and disbelievers is forbidden, in 5:5, one of the last verses to be revealed, marriage between Muslim men and women from among the People of the Book (i.e., Jews and Christians) is permitted; see 5:5c.

This verse was reportedly revealed after the Treaty of Ḥudaybiyah in 6/628, which stipulated that the Makkans who fled to the Prophet should be returned to the Makkans, but that anyone among the Prophet’s Companions who fled to the people of Makkah would not be returned to Madinah. A Qurayshī man whose wife had joined the Muslims then went to the Prophet and said, “O Muhammad, return my wife to me, for you have agreed to return to us whosoever flees to you.” Then this verse was revealed stipulating that Muslim women could not be married to idolaters and that their return was excluded from the treaty. And give them what they have spent stipulates that any bridewealth that had been paid to the Muslim women before they left their disbelieving husbands in order to embrace Islam must be returned to their disbelieving husbands when they are removed from wedlock with them. The Prophet therefore allowed the believing women who had migrated to Madinah to stay and sent back to the Quraysh the men who had fled the Quraysh to join the Muslims in Madinah (Q, W).
And if any of your wives should go over to the disbelievers, and then you have your turn, give those whose wives have gone the like of what they have spent. And reverence God, in Whom you are believers.

Any of your wives may refer to the wives themselves, their bridewealth (JJ, Ṭ), or both. And then you have your turn can mean either when Muslim men succeed in battle against their adversaries (JJ) or when they are afflicted with the loss of their women, as were the disbelievers whose wives went over to the Muslims. As the disbelievers could not be expected to follow the Quranic injunction to pay back the bridewealth if a woman left her husband and returned to them from the Muslims (which is said to have happened six times during the life of the Prophet; Z), the Muslim community was then asked to spend from the treasury or the spoils of war to give those whose wives have gone the like of what they have spent on the woman’s bridewealth (Bg, Ṭ, Z). The Muslims carried out this command by way of paying back the disbelievers the bridewealth of their former wives, but the idolaters refused to do the same (IK, Ṭ).

O Prophet! When believing women come unto thee, pledging unto thee that they will not ascribe any as partners unto God, nor steal, nor fornicate, nor slay their children, nor bring a slanderous lie that they have fabricated between their hands and feet, nor disobey thee in anything honorable, then accept their pledge and seek God’s Forgiveness for them. Truly God is Forgiving, Merciful.

This verse is reported to constitute the elements of the oath that the Prophet would take from women who came to him to embrace Islam (IK, Q). Nor steal implies any acquisitions or gains made by unlawful means (R). Nor slay their children refers to the pre-Islamic Arabian practice of burying newborn girls to avoid shame and poverty (JJ). Some argue that it applies by extension to those who kill an unborn fetus (IK), though this issue is debated. A slanderous lie that they have fabricated between their hands and feet refers to a baby conceived in adultery whom a woman falsely claims was her husband’s child (IK, JJ, Z). When taking this pledge from women, the Prophet is reported to have added on one occasion that they not wail for the dead and on another occasion to have said, “Whosoever among you fulfills the pledge will be rewarded by God, and whosoever commits any of those sins and is punished [in this life], that will serve as expiation for the sin; and whosoever commits any of these sins and God covers that, then it is up to God to punish or to forgive” (Q). In this context, it is important to note that the Prophet took an independent pledge from women, indicating that women remain spiritually independent of their husbands and responsible for themselves before God and the Prophet, an issue revisited in Sūrah 66.

13 O you who believe! Do not befriend a people with whom God is wroth; they who have despaired of the Hereafter, just as the disbelievers have despairs of the inhabitants of graves.

13 This verse was reportedly revealed regarding some poor Muslims who would inform the Jews of the activities of the Muslims in exchange for provisions (Q, R, W, Z). In this sense, the sūrah ends with an injunction similar to the one with which it began—to not take God’s enemies as friends (Q). They have despaired of the Hereafter refers to the Jews of Madinah, who would be in despair for denying the prophethood of Muhammad (Q, R, T), or to the hypocrites, who would despair for conspiring against the Prophet (Q). It can also be seen as a reference to all those who despair of the Hereafter because they preferred and thus worked only for this world. That they despair as do the disbelievers, here referring specifically to the idolatrous Makkans, indicates that both will be punished in the Hereafter. That they despair of the inhabitants of graves is understood as a reference to the manner in which the disbelievers despair of seeing their deceased relations because they have no concept of a Hereafter (Q), or to the belief that no good will come to those who die as disbelievers (Q).

The Ranks

Most commentators consider al-Ṣaff to be a Madinan sūrah, although a small minority consider it to be Makkan (Āl). It takes its name from the mention of those who fight in His way in ranks in v. 4, but it is also known as al-Hawāriyyūn, “The Apostles,” after the discussion of Jesus’ apostles in v. 14, and as ´Īsā, “Jesus,” after the references to Jesus in vv. 6 and 14 (Āl). This is the third in the group of sūrahs known as “The Glorifiers” (al-Musabbiḥāt), sūrahs that begin with a reference to the glorification of God; the others are 57, 59, 62, and 64.

The previous sūrah enjoins striving in My way and seeking My good pleasure (60:1), but this sūrah begins by extolling those who fight in the way of God and chastising those who shrink from the task (vv. 1–4). Brief mention of the opposition encountered by Moses and Jesus (vv. 5–6) and condemnation of those who oppose God’s revelations (vv. 7–8) leads into a prophecy of the eventual triumph of Islam (v. 9) and a foretelling of the rewards that await those who strive in the way of God (vv. 10–14).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God, and He is the Mighty, the Wise. 2. O you who believe! Why do you say that which you do not do? 3. Grievously odious is it in the Sight of God that you say that which you do not do. Truly God loves those who fight in His way in ranks, as if they were a solid structure. And [remember] when Moses said unto his people, “O my people! Why do you hurt me, though you know well that I am the Messenger of God unto you?” So when they swerved, God caused their hearts to swerve; and God guides not iniquitous people. And [remember] when Jesus son of Mary said, “O Children of Israel! Truly I am the Messenger of God unto you, confirming that which came before me in the Torah and bearing glad tidings of a Messenger to come after me whose name is Aḥmad.” And when he came unto them with clear proofs, they said, “This is manifest sorcery.” Who does greater wrong than one who fabricates lies against God, while he is being called to submission? And God guides not wrongdoing people. They desire to extinguish the Light of God with their mouths, but God completes His Light, though the disbelievers be averse. He it is Who sent His Messenger with guidance and the Religion of Truth to make it prevail over all religion, though the idolaters be averse. O you who believe! Shall I direct you to a commerce that will save you from a painful punishment: that you believe in God and the Messenger and strive in God’s way with your wealth and your souls? That is better for you, if you but knew. He will forgive you your sins and cause you to enter Gardens with rivers running below, and goodly dwellings in Gardens of Eden—that is the great triumph—and something else that you love: help from God and a victory nigh. So give glad tidings to the believers. O you who believe! Be helpers of God, just as Jesus son of Mary said to the apostles, “Who are my helpers unto God?” The apostles replied, “We are helpers unto God.” Then a group from the Children of Israel believed and a group disbelieved. So We strengthened those who believed against their enemies, and they came to prevail.
Commentary

1 Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God, and He is the Mighty, the Wise.

    1 All that exists bears witness to God’s Lordship and Oneness. He is the Mighty in that He overcomes all that is other than Him and nothing can overcome Him (R); cf. 57:1; 59:1; 62:1; 64:1. For the meaning of the various modes in which God is said to be glorified in the Quran, see 64:1c.

2 O you who believe! Why do you say that which you do not do?

3 Grievously odious is it in the Sight of God that you say that which you do not do.

    2–3 It is reported that some Muslims would say, “If we knew the deeds most beloved to God, we would expend our wealth and souls to perform such deeds.” So God directed them to the works most beloved to Him, saying, Truly God loves those who fight in His way in ranks, as if they were a solid structure (v. 4). But when the Muslims were tested at the Battle of Uḥud (see 3:121c; 3:155c), they retreated, and so God chastised them by revealing, O you who believe! Why do you say that which you do not do? (Q, R, Ṭ, W), meaning, “Why did you claim that you would do what is most beloved to God, but then not do it?” These verses can also be seen as a reference to the hypocrites, who when fighting is enjoined upon them say, Our Lord! Why hast Thou prescribed fighting for us? (4:77; R). V. 2 can also be taken as a reference to all believers, as they have agreed to fulfill that which God has required of them through humility and surrender to God, but if they do not fulfill their promise, they can be accused of claiming falsely to do something that in fact they do not do (R). In this vein, the Prophet is reported to have said, “Whosoever claims for himself qualities that he does not have is not one of us; let him prepare his seat in Hell.” Regarding those who love to be praised for what they have not done, see 3:188: Do not suppose that those who exult in what they have brought about and love to be praised for what they have not done—do not suppose that they are delivered from the punishment; theirs is a painful punishment.

4 Truly God loves those who fight in His way in ranks, as if they were a solid structure.

4 In contrast to vv. 2–3, this verse praises those who heed God’s Command to strive in His way. That God loves those who fight in His way in ranks indicates both His Contentment with them and praise for them (R). Solid structure suggests a building made of bricks that are sealed together so that there are no cracks between them. Here it is a metaphor for the Muslim community, who are joined by bonds of love and brotherhood, as in 49:10: The believers are naught but brothers, and in a famous hadīth: “A Muslim believer is a mirror reflection of another Muslim. A believer is a brother to another believer; he safeguards him from destruction and prevents his annihilation during his absence.” In this regard, another hadīth states, “The entire Muslim group is like one single body. If the eye aches, then the whole body is in pain, and if the head aches, then the whole body is in pain.” For the importance of the brotherhood of Muslims, see commentary on 49:9–12.

5 And [remember] when Moses said unto his people, “O my people! Why do you hurt me, though you know well that I am the Messenger of God unto you?” So when they swerved, God caused their hearts to swerve; and God guides not iniquitous people.

5 The hurt Moses’ people caused him can be attributed to several events. The first was when they challenged Moses by saying, Show us God openly (4:153), and worshipped the golden calf (see 7:148–52; also 2:92–93; 20:88). Then, after they had been provided manna from Heaven, they said, O Moses, we will not endure one food (2:61). And finally they refused to enter Israel and fight with him, saying, O Moses! We shall never enter it, so long as they remain therein. So go forth, thou and thy Lord, and fight! We shall sit here (5:24). They swerved means that they inclined away from the truth (Q, R). Here their swerving can be read as referring to their deeds, as a result of which moral and spiritual “swerving” became manifest in their hearts. They thus came to be among the iniquitous, those whose outward actions manifest their inner iniquity, and for this they were left to wander astray. For God guides not iniquitous people (cf. 5:108; 9:24, 80; 63:6).

[6] And [remember] when Jesus son of Mary said, “O Children of Israel! Truly I am the Messenger of God unto you, confirming that which came before me in the Torah and bearing glad tidings of a Messenger to come after me whose name is Aḥmad.” And when he came unto them with clear proofs, they said, “This is manifest sorcery.”

A function of every Divine messenger is to confirm the revelations that have come before; thus 6:92 says of the Quran, This is a blessed Book that We have sent down, confirming that which came before it (cf. 35:31; 46:30). That the prophets would confirm one another is said to be part of the primordial covenant that they made with God in 3:81 and 33:7. The prophets’ confirmation of other messengers is also understood to refer to those who would follow them in time, and several verses are interpreted as references to the mention of the Prophet Muhammad in the Old and New Testaments (see 7:157c). The name Aḥmad means “most praised”; it derives from the same root as Muhammad—ḥ-m-d—and has long been recognized by Muslims as one of the many honorific names given to the Prophet by God Himself. This is based upon a saying of the Prophet: “I have several names: I am Muhammad; I am Aḥmad; I am al-Māḥī (the Effacer) by means of whom God eliminates unbelief.” Many other hadith simply refer to the Prophet as Aḥmad.

Some Muslims have likened Jesus’ reference to Aḥmad here in the Quran to the reference to the Paraclete (Gk. Paraklētos) or Advocate of whom Jesus speaks in the Gospel of John 14:15–16: “If you love me, you will keep my commandments. And I will ask the Father, and He will give you another Advocate, to be with you forever” (see also John 16:7–14; Āl, R). Such an interpretation is, however, complicated by the next verse, 14:17, where the Advocate or Paraclete is said to be “the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it neither sees him nor knows him. You know him, because he abides with you, and he will be in you,” and by 14:26, where the Advocate is again equated with the Holy Spirit.

The clear proofs refers to the many miracles that Jesus performed, such as breathing life into a clay bird, healing the blind and the leper, and raising the dead; see 5:110. The accusation that such evidentiary miracles are manifest sorcery is also brought against Moses (10:76; 27:13). It is also a charge the disbelievers are said to bring against the Prophet Muhammad, as in general those who disbelieve say to the Truth when it comes to them, “This is naught but manifest sorcery” (34:43).

7 Who does greater wrong than one who fabricates lies against God, while he is being called to submission? And God guides not wrongdoing people.

7 To fabricate lies against God (cf. 3:94; 6:21, 93, 144; 7:37; 10:17; 11:18; 18:15; 29:68) indicates seeking to lead others astray by falsely attributing words of revelation to God (see 6:93, 144), declaring what is lawful to be unlawful and what is unlawful to be lawful (see 16:116), and reverting to a false creed after being shown the truth (see 7:89). While he is being called to submission could also be read in the active voice, “while he [the Prophet] calls them to submission.” In both cases it expresses amazement that people could fabricate lies against God or deny God in any way while a prophet is present among them (Q).

8 They desire to extinguish the Light of God with their mouths by saying that it is sorcery, poetry, or soothsaying (JJ). This phrase is repeated in 9:32, where it is said of Jews and Christians who make human judgment a higher authority than the word of scripture. Light is frequently associated with the guidance that comes through the prophets and revelation (see 6:91; 7:157; 21:48; 42:52; 57:9, 28). That God completes His Light thus implies completing His Guidance. In this context, the Light of God is also interpreted as a reference to the Quran, Islam, or the Prophet (Q), who is referred to elsewhere as a luminous lamp (33:46). According to a Shiite interpretation, this verse refers to those who would seek to extinguish the walāyah/wilāyah, that is, the sanctity and rightful successorship of ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, though God completes his position as leader (imāmah). This light is believed to be the light referred to in 64:8: So believe in God and His Messenger and the light We have sent down (Kā); see 64:8c.

9 He it is Who sent His Messenger with guidance and the Religion of Truth to make it prevail over all religion, though the idolaters be averse.

9 He it is Who sent His Messenger with guidance and the Religion of Truth to make it prevail over all religion is repeated verbatim in 9:33 and 48:28. Guidance can here be seen as a reference to the Quran (Aj, Āl) or to the truth itself (Q). All religion is understood to mean all religions (Q); see 9:32–33c; 48:28c. Almost all classical commentators interpret Religion of Truth here and in 9:33 and 48:28 as a reference to Islam and thus see all three verses as a reference to the triumph of Islam over all other religions. But as the Quran attests to the veracity and salvific efficacy of other religions (see, e.g., 2:62c; 5:69c), the Religion of Truth can be more broadly understood to mean all revealed religions. From this perspective, the disbelievers’ aversion to the completion of God’s Light in v. 8, can be understood as a reference to the idolaters who desire to extinguish the light of all revelation and to the People of the Book, most of whom reject the completion of revelation in the Prophet Muhammad. V. 9 would then refer only to the idolaters, as they are opposed to all truthful religion, whereas the People of the Book still seek the Religion of Truth in one form or another. See the essay “The Quranic View of Sacred History and Other Religions.”

10 O you who believe! Shall I direct you to a commerce that will save you from a painful punishment:

that you believe in God and the Messenger and strive in God’s way with your wealth and your souls? That is better for you, if you but knew.

10–11 These verses can be seen as addressing the wish expressed by the Companions when they said, “If we knew the deeds most beloved to God, we would expend our wealth and souls to perform such deeds” (see 61:2–3c). The commerce that saves from a painful punishment is the one that is based upon the Hereafter rather than this world. When one strives in the way of God with one’s wealth and self or soul, it is then said, Truly God has purchased from the believers their souls and their wealth in exchange for the Garden being theirs. They fight in the way of God, slaying and being slain. [It is] a promise binding upon Him in the Torah, the Gospel, and the Quran. And who is truer to His pact than God? So rejoice in the bargain you have made (9:111). That is better for you thus means that faith or belief (īmān) and striving (jihād) are better for one than one’s wealth and one’s soul (Aj).

12 He will forgive you your sins and cause you to enter Gardens with rivers running below, and goodly dwellings in Gardens of Eden—that is the great triumph—

12 Attaining “the Garden” is referred to as the great triumph in over a dozen verses; for the blessings of Paradise, see commentary on 5:119; 44:51–57. Regarding God’s causing people to enter Gardens with rivers running below, see 2:25c; 3:195; 5:12; 48:5; 64:9.

13 and something else that you love: help from God and a victory nigh. So give glad tidings to the believers.

13 Something else that you love can be a reference to another commerce, thus referring back to v. 10 (Q, R, Ṭ), or to another “blessing” in addition to the forgiveness and Gardens mentioned in v. 12 (Āl, Z). The victory nigh is understood as a reference to the conquest of Makkah or the victories over Byzantium and Persia soon after the death of the Prophet (Q, Z). Victory translates fatḥ, which can also mean “opening” and can thus be seen as a reference to either opening the gates of nearness to God, opening the gates of the Unseen (Aj), or opening the heart to spiritual realities.

14 O you who believe! Be helpers of God, just as Jesus son of Mary said to the apostles, “Who are my helpers unto God?” The apostles replied, “We are helpers unto God.” Then a group from the Children of Israel believed and a group disbelieved. So We strengthened those who believed against their enemies, and they came to prevail.

14 Be helpers of God indicates being helpers for God’s religion and His Prophet (R), since God has no need of human assistance. As helpers is here a noun rather than a verb, as it is in 47:7, If you help God, He will help you, it implies that to be a believer is to be a helper of God at all times (R). Those who are helpers of God are then likened to Jesus’ apostles, whose name in Arabic, ḥawāriyyūn, is thought by some to indicate purity (R). While some maintain that ḥawāriyyūn is from the Ethiopic ḥawārya meaning “apostle,” others see it as deriving from the word ḥawwara, meaning “to transform” or “to whiten” (Iṣ). The title could thus refer to those who transform and purify the souls of people by guiding them in religion and knowledge (Iṣ). The ḥawāriyyūn are also said to be those who are fully devoted to a prophet and are thus purified from any faults (Ṭ’s). The Prophet is reported to have said, “Every prophet has his apostle (ḥawārī), and my apostle is Zubayr” (Iṣ).

A group among the Israelites then confirmed the prophethood of Jesus, while others disbelieved. According to many commentators, those who disbelieved includes not only those who rejected Jesus, but also those who maintained that Jesus was God as well as those who maintained that he was the son of God (R, Ṭs).

The Congregational Prayer

al-Jumu‘ah

Although a minority maintain that al-Jumu‘ah is a Makkan sūrah, internal indicators, such as the reference to the Jews in v. 6, affirm that it is from the Madinan period (Āl). It takes its name from the exhortation to gather for the Friday congregational prayer in v. 9 and is the fourth in the group of sūrah known as “The Glorifiers” (al-Musabbiḥāt), which begin with a reference to the glorification of God; the other sūrah are 57, 59, 61, and 64. This sūrah is connected to the previous sūrah by the manner in which both compare the commerce of this world with the affairs of the next. Some also liken the praise for those who fight in His way in ranks in the previous sūrah (61:4) to the call to attend the congregational prayer, as Muslims are also called to stand in ranks during prayer (Āl).

The Prophet is reported to have often recited this sūrah and the following sūrah, al-Munāfiqūn, together during the congregational prayer on Fridays (Āl). According to a ḥadīth, “The best day over which the sun has risen is the day of the congregational prayer (al-jumu‘ah); on it did God create Adam, and on it did Adam enter the Garden, and on it was he removed from the Garden. And the Hour will not come save on the day of the congregational prayer” (Q). According to another ḥadīth, “It is named ‘The Gathering’ [another translation for al-jumu‘ah], because that is the day on which Adam’s physical nature (khalq) was gathered together” (R) or

After extolling the Prophet as a blessing for his followers present and future (vv. 1–4), al-Jumuʿah warns of the afflictions that befell the Jews for having failed to uphold the Torah (vv. 5–8). It then calls the Muslims to take leave of worldly transactions for a time in order to observe the Friday congregational prayer (vv. 9–11).

Commentary

1 Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God, the Sovereign, the Holy, the Mighty, the Wise.

   1 Whatever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God is repeated in 59:1; 61:1; and 64:1 (see also 24:41; 57:1; 59:24); see 64:1c.

2 He it is Who sent among the unlettered a Messenger from among themselves, reciting unto them His signs, purifying them, and teaching them the Book and Wisdom, though before they were in manifest error,

   2 Unlettered (ummi) indicates those who can neither read nor write, but in this context can refer to the idolatrous Arabs, who had no scripture (T), or to anyone without a Divine book (R; cf. 3:20). Purifying them refers to purification from idolatry (JJ, T’s). This is one of several verses in which the Prophet is said to teach the Book and Wisdom (cf. 2:129, 151, 231; 3:164), the teaching of which is part of the primordial covenant made with all prophets, when God said to them, Should a messenger then come to you confirming that which is with you, you shall surely believe in him and you shall help him (3:81). The teaching of the Book and Wisdom is also mentioned in relation to Abraham (4:54), Jesus (5:110), and Muhammad (4:113). In this context, some interpret Wisdom as a reference to the prophetic wont (sunnah), though it also can be understood more broadly as a reference to all Divinely inspired knowledge pertaining to this world and the Hereafter (T’s).

3 and others among them, who have not yet joined them. And He is the Mighty, the Wise.
And others follows upon the unlettered, meaning those who are alive among them, and those who will come after them, who have not yet joined them (JJ). The verse may refer to everyone who will enter Islam from the time of the Prophet until the Day of Resurrection (Qm, R, Ṭs), in which case purifying them, and teaching them (v. 2) describes the Prophet’s function in relation to all later generations of Muslims in all lands (R). Given the precedence that the earliest generations of Muslims are afforded, this verse is seen by many as a reference to the generation immediately after the Companions of the Prophet, known as the Followers (tābiʿūn; JJ, R), who are noted especially by Sunni Muslims for their piety and credited with many significant developments in Islamic religion and intellectual life. From this perspective, v. 2 establishes the preeminence of the Companions and this verse establishes the merit of the Followers, as each generation of Muslims is believed to be better than the succeeding one (JJ).

That is the Bounty of God, which He gives to whomsoever He will. And God is Possessed of Tremendous Bounty.

That is the Bounty of God, which He gives to whomsoever He will is repeated verbatim in 5:54 and 57:21. In this context, the Bounty of God can also be taken as a reference to the Prophet or to prophethood in general (R).

The parable of those [who were] made to bear the Torah, then did not bear it, is that of an ass bearing books. How evil is the likeness of the people who denied God’s signs! And God guides not wrongdoing people.

Made to bear is understood to mean “enjoined to act in accord with it” (Q). That they did not bear it thus indicates that they do not implement the teachings of the Torah as enjoined upon them and thus derive no benefit from it. That they are as an ass bearing books means that they have no true knowledge of what their scripture contains (Q, Ṭ). That people recite their scriptures without acting upon them is the same charge brought against the priests by the prophets. of the Old Testament in the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, and others (see, e.g., Isaiah 24:5; 29:13; Jeremiah 8:5–9; Ezekiel 22:26; Hosea 4:6–7). This verse is not simply a condemnation of Jews for forgetting the tenets of Judaism; it is also a warning to Muslims that this is how human beings often treat revelation. In this vein, the Prophet once warned his community that many calamities would befall Muslims when religious understanding had been lost and falsified. When a Companion asked him how that could happen when Muslims would continue to teach the Quran generation after generation, the Prophet replied, “May your mother weep for you! Do you not see these Jews and these Christians? They read the Torah and the Gospel but do not act in accord with them.” Another ḥadīth states, “There will soon come upon the people a time in which nothing of the Quran remains save its trace and nothing of Islam remains save its name; their mosques will be full, though they will be devoid of guidance. Their scholars are the worst people under the sky; from them strife will emerge and spread.” For further development of this theme as it pertains to Jews and Christians in the Quran, see 2:75; 5:41, 65–69.

6 Say, “O you who are Jews! If you claim that you are friends unto God apart from [other] people, then long for death, if you are truthful.”

According to this verse, if the Jews are indeed favored by God above others, then they should prefer the Hereafter to the life of this world (JJ). Long for death (cf. 2:94) indicates that those who are sure of their standing before God would not fear the coming of death, but would welcome it, or that those who truly believe long to meet God, as in a ḥadīth, “Whosoever desires to meet God, God desires to meet him, and whosoever abhors meeting God, God abhors to meet him.”

7 But they will never long for it due to that which their hands have sent forth. And God knows the wrongdoers.
That which their hands have sent forth is understood as a reference to the Jews’ evil deeds, especially their denial of the prophethood of Muhammad (J) and distortion of the scriptures (see 4:47; 5:13, 41; R). The implication is that they are subtly aware of what awaits them in the next life for their transgressions and thus fear death. Elsewhere the judgment wrongdoers receive in the next life is said to result from that which their hands have sent forth (2:95; 4:62; 28:47; 30:36; 42:48; see also 5:80; 18:57; 36:12; 78:40), as does the evil that befalls them in this life.

Say, “Truly the death from which you flee will surely meet you; then you shall be returned to the Knower of the Unseen and the seen, and He will inform you of that which you used to do.”

In commenting upon this verse, Abū Ḥāimid al-Ghazzālī mentions human beings of four different dispositions with regard to death. There are those who are engrossed with this world, so that remembering death only increases their distance from God, as in 21:1: For mankind, their reckoning draws nigh, while they turn away heedless. Such people will have an unfortunate end because, as the Prophet has said, “Whosoever abhors meeting with God, God abhors the meeting with him.” Then there are those who are penitent, who do not abhor death, but fear the meeting with God because they are aware of their deficiencies and know that they will be held accountable for their sins. They thus busy themselves with preparing for death. Beyond this there are those with spiritual knowledge (al-ʿārifūn), who remember death constantly and yearn for it as a lover yearns for the meeting with the Beloved. Last, there are those of the highest spiritual rank, who yearn for neither death nor life but only for what pleases their Lord (Iḥyāʾ, Kitāb Dhikr al-mawt, 4:391); see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.” In this context, that God is Knower of the Unseen and the seen indicates that the intentions behind actions cannot be hidden from God. God then informs all human beings of the true nature of what they did while on this earth and requites those who do what is good with good and those who do what is evil with what their actions merit (Ṭ). This is one of several verses where it is said that at the Final Judgment, God will “inform” people about their actions in this life; see also 5:14, 105; 6:60, 108, 159; 9:94, “O you who believe! When you are called to the congregational prayer, hasten to the remembrance of God and leave off trade. That is better for you, if you but knew.

The day of the congregational prayer was also market day in Madinah; hence the Muslims are called to leave off trade during the time of the prayer. In Islam the day of the congregational prayer is not understood as a Sabbath day of rest as in the Jewish and Christian traditions. Thus the injunction to leave off trade does not apply to the entire day, but only to the period of time during which the congregational prayer is held. This verse is connected to the previous verses in that those who flee death do so out of preference for the attractions of this world; so God guides the believers to what will benefit them in the Hereafter, the remembrance of God (R), as that is a commerce that will never perish (35:29). Hasten renders asʿaw, which can also mean “endeavor,” indicating that one should leave off worldly endeavors for a time and focus upon religious endeavors, as in a ḥadīth, “When you come to prayer do not come while you are endeavoring [for this world], but come to it while you are at peace (ʿalaykum al-sakīnah)” (Q, R). In this sense, hasten or “endeavor” can refer to both the attitude in one’s heart and one’s deeds (Q, Ṭ), indicating that one should prepare for the congregational prayer outwardly by performing the ablutions and purifying one’s clothing and inwardly through humility (Q).

According to al-Qurṭubī, Asʿad ibn Zurārah (d. 1/623) and Muṣʿab ibn ʿUmayr (d. 3/625), who had been among the first Madinans to embrace Islam, began the practice of the congregational prayer so that Muslims would have a day for prayer and remembrance like the Jews and Christians. The Friday congregational prayer was thus begun by the Helpers in Madinah before the migration of the Prophet, then institutionalized by the Prophet when he arrived in Madinah, and later given Divine sanction in these verses. The Prophet first led the Friday congregational prayer himself during his migration to Madinah; he had stopped in Qubāʾ, just south of Madinah, for twelve days, then set out for Madinah on a Friday. When the time for prayer came, he prayed with the people in a seasonal riverbed that they used as a mosque. It was here that he delivered the first congregational sermon (khutbah; Q).

10 And when the prayer is completed, disperse throughout the land and seek the Bounty of God, and remember God much, that haply you may prosper.”

10 Disperse throughout the land is not a command, but a statement indicating permissibility (Q, R, Ṭ). Seek the Bounty of God can mean that people may now engage in commerce or that they should seek knowledge (Q). Ibn ʿAbbās is reported to have said that this injunction is not to disperse in order to seek worldly things, but rather to call upon the sick, attend funerals (which are often held after the Friday congregational prayer), and visit one’s brothers in God (Q, Sy, Ṭ). And remember God much implies at all times and in all that is done, that haply you may prosper in both this world and the Hereafter (Aj).

11 And when they see some commerce or diversion, they scatter toward it and leave thee standing. Say, “That which is with God is better than diversion and commerce; and God is the best of providers.”

11 According to a ḥadīth, the Prophet was delivering a sermon during the Friday congregational prayer when a caravan arrived from Syria. Many people left the mosque during his sermon to attend to the caravan until only twelve people remained. Then this verse was revealed (JJ, Q, Ṭ). This verse thus affirms the precedence of the prayer over commerce. Before this event the Prophet reportedly used to perform the Friday congregational prayer before delivering the sermon. But after that he would perform the prayer after the sermon (Q), as this would ensure that people would stay for both the sermon and the prayer. This is the practice that Muslims follow to this day. That which is with God is understood to mean the reward for performing the congregational prayer or that the provision that God will give those who attend the congregational prayer is better than what they would have attained through commerce (Q). Since *God is the best of providers (cf. 5:114; 22:58; 23:72; 34:39), believers should hasten to Him and seek provision from Him rather than from worldly activities, knowing that the provision given by God will not pass them by (Aj).

The Hypocrites

_al-Munāfiqūn_

A Madinan _sūrah, al-Munāfiqūn_ takes its name from the discussion of the hypocrites who attested to the prophethood of Muhammad and swore fealty to him, but continued to ally themselves with his enemies. It can be seen as a contrast to the previous _sūrah, al-Jumuʿah_, which addresses the believers. During the Friday congregational prayer, the Prophet is reported to have frequently recited these two _sūrah_ s together — _al-Jumuʿah_ in the first cycle of the prayer as encouragement for the believers and _al-Munāfiqūn_ in the second cycle as a rebuke to the hypocrites (Āl). Most of the _sūrah_ warns of the treachery of the hypocrites (vv. 1–8). Then, like the final verses of the previous _sūrah_ (62:9–11), the final verses of this _sūrah_ (vv. 9–11) enjoin the believers not to allow the responsibilities and desires of this world to distract them from remembering God. In this way, the placement of this _sūrah_ also serves as a reminder of the more subtle forms of hypocrisy that can distract those who believe from the proper fulfillment of their religious obligations.

1 When the hypocrites come unto thee, they say, “We bear witness that thou art indeed the Messenger of God.” Yet God knows that thou art indeed His Messenger, and God bears witness that the hypocrites are surely liars. They took their oaths as a shield and thus turned from the way of God. Evil indeed is that which they used to do. That is because they believed, and then disbelieved; so a seal was set upon their hearts such that they comprehend not. And when thou seest them, their bodies impress thee, and if they speak, thou listenest to their speech. [Yet] they are like leaning timbers. They suppose that every cry is against them. They are the enemy; so be wary of them. May God curse them! How are they perverted? And when it is said unto them, “Come! The Messenger of God will ask forgiveness for you,” they twist their heads, and thou seest them turning away in arrogance. It is the same for them whether thou askest forgiveness for them or thou askest forgiveness for them not; God will never forgive them. Truly God guides not iniquitous people. They are the ones who say, “Do not spend on those who are with the Messenger of God, that they may disperse.” Yet to God belong the treasuries of the heavens and the earth, but the hypocrites comprehend not. They say, “If we return to Madinah, the mightier will surely expel the weaker therefrom.” Yet unto God belongs the might and unto His Messenger and the believers, but the hypocrites know not. O you who believe! Let neither your property nor your children divert you from the remembrance of God. Whosoever does so, it is they who are the losers. And spend of that which We have provided you before death comes upon one of you and he says, “My Lord, wouldst that Thou grant me reprieve till a term nigh, that I may give charity and be among the righteous!” Yet God will not grant any soul reprieve when its term has come. And God is Aware of whatsoever you do.
Commentary

1 When the hypocrites come unto thee, they say, “We bear witness that thou art indeed the Messenger of God.” Yet God knows that thou art indeed His Messenger, and God bears witness that the hypocrites are surely liars.

This verse, along with vv. 2, 7, and 8, was reportedly revealed regarding ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy (d. 631), known as the leader of the hypocrites in Madinah, who said while on an expedition with the Prophet, “Do not spend on those who are with God’s Messenger, that they may disperse and go away. And if we return to Madinah, surely the mightier will expel the weaker therefrom” (cf. v. 7–8). When the Prophet heard of this utterance from ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy’s nephew, Zayd ibn Arqam, he sent for ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy and his companions, who swore that they did not say it. The Prophet did not believe Zayd and believed ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy. Then vv. 1–8 were revealed, after which the Prophet said, “O Zayd! God confirmed your statement” (Q, Ṭ, W). God bears witness that the hypocrites are surely liars indicates that faith is an affirmation with the heart, not only with the tongue, and that true speech comes from the heart (Q); see also 9:74.

2 They took their oaths as a shield and thus turned from the way of God. Evil indeed is that which they used to do.

In swearing that they had not said what Zayd reported to the Prophet, ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy and his companions took their oaths as a shield to protect their possessions and their lives (JJ), as in Islam the blood, property, and honor of Muslims were protected by their oath of allegiance to the Muslim polity. In this sense they swear by God that truly they are of you, but they are not of you (9:56). They thus sell . . . their oaths for a paltry price (3:77), because they are more concerned about the affairs of this world than those of the next. That they turned from the way of God indicates both that they turned believers away from observing God’s Decree by dissuading the disbelievers and the Jews of Madinah from entering Islam (Q) and that they themselves turned away. Regarding the nature of the hypocrite, the Prophet is reported to have said, “The signs of the hypocrite are four and whosoever possesses one of them possesses the characteristic of hypocrisy until he abandons it: when he is entrusted, he betrays his trust; when he speaks, he lies; when he makes a promise, he breaks it; and when he quarrels, he uses foul words.”

3 That is because they believed, and then disbelieved; so a seal was set upon their hearts such that they comprehend not.

3 This verse means either that the hypocrites first believed and then came to disbelieve or that they affirmed with their tongues, although they disbelieved with their hearts (Q). A seal was set upon their hearts (cf. 2:7; 6:46; 7:100–101; 9:87, 93; 10:74; 16:108; 17:46; 18:57; 30:59; 40:35; 41:5; 42:24; 47:16) implies spiritual insensitivity and ignorance, as the heart is considered the principle faculty of knowledge and understanding (see 6:25; 22:46). That a seal has been placed upon the heart as a barrier to religious understanding may be understood either as an inherent insensitivity toward revelation or as a Divinely imposed punishment in response to moral transgression and disobedience (see, e.g., 10:74; 42:24; 2:7c).

4 And when thou seest them, their bodies impress thee, and if they speak, thou listenest to their speech. [Yet] they are like leaning timbers. They suppose that every cry is against them. They are the enemy; so be wary of them. May God curse them! How are they perverted?

4 This first sentence is usually understood to describe ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy and some of his companions, who were said to be handsome and well spoken (Q). Like leaning timbers indicates that the hypocrites have no roots of their own to support them, but rely upon another structure for support. They are thus “like shapes without spirits, or bodies without minds” or like wood that has been eaten from the inside, so that the exterior seems strong but the interior is hollow (Q). The hypocrites are afraid every time they hear a battle cry, because they fear that their true nature, and in some cases their alliances with enemies, may have been discovered (JJ), in which case their oaths might be discovered to be false and thus no longer protect them. Believers are to be wary of them because their words may deceive (Q) or they may communicate believers’ secrets to the disbelievers (JJ). How are they perverted? means, “How can they turn from the truth and deviate from guidance, and how can their intellects be blind to the clarity of these proofs?” (Q).

5 And when it is said unto them, “Come! The Messenger of God will ask forgiveness for you,” they twist their heads, and thou seest them turning away in arrogance.

6 It is the same for them whether thou askest forgiveness for them or thou askest forgiveness for them not; God will never forgive them. Truly God guides not iniquitous people.

5–6 After verses such as vv. 1–4 were revealed, some Muslims enjoined the hypocrites to apologize and seek forgiveness from the Prophet. But the hypocrites mocked them and rejected their proposal (Q). Their failure to repent indicates a hardness of heart. Thus the Prophet is told in 9:80, Seek forgiveness for them, or seek not forgiveness for them. If thou seekest forgiveness for them seventy times, God will not forgive them (see also 9:113–15). For similar verses where warnings and guidance are said to be of no avail to disbelievers, see 2:7; 7:193; 26:136; 36:10. These verses remind the Prophet that he cannot guide those whom God has not guided and should leave them to God, as in 35:8: Truly God leads astray whomsoever He will and guides whomsoever He will; so let not thy soul be expended in regrets over them.

7 They are the ones who say, “Do not spend on those who are with the Messenger of God, that they may disperse.” Yet to God belong the treasuries of the heavens and the earth, but the hypocrites comprehend not.

7 These are the words of the hypocrites to the Helpers, those Muslims who had been residents of Madinah before the Prophet’s emigration from Makkah. Many hypocrites thought the spoils of war that the Muslims were now enjoying derived more from the strength of the Madinan forces than from anything the Prophet or God had done for them and thus sought to keep the spoils for themselves. When they first migrated to Madinah, many of the Emigrants had been completely dependent upon the generosity of the Helpers, who provided food, shelter, clothing, fertile land, and others forms of aid, without which many Emigrants might not have survived. The newly acquired spoils of war, however, made many of the Emigrants more self-sufficient and thus altered the balance of power within Madinah, to which some of the hypocrites took exception. To God belong the treasuries of the heavens and the earth thus reminds them that it is God Who has provided all of their wealth and who provides spiritual and material benefits to whomsoever He will, whether the hypocrites spend on those who are with the Messenger or not. Elsewhere the disbelievers are reported to have said of the Prophet, Why has no treasure been sent down upon him? (11:12; see also 25:8).

8 They say, “If we return to Madinah, the mightier will surely expel the weaker therefrom.” Yet unto God belongs the might and unto His Messenger and the believers, but the hypocrites know not.

8 The mightier will surely expel the weaker therefrom could also be rendered, “The more noble will expel the meaner therefrom.” ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ubayy is reported to have uttered these words, arguing that he and his companions were morally superior to and physically more powerful than the Prophet and his Companions (see 63:1c). But even his son saw the folly in this position and urged him to recant his statement before returning to Madinah from the expedition. He did not, and is reported to have died soon thereafter.
9 O you who believe! Let neither your property nor your children divert you from the remembrance of God. Whosoever does so, it is they who are the losers.

9 Elsewhere the Quran cautions: It is not your wealth or your children that bring you nigh in nearness unto Us, save those who believe and work righteousness (34:37); and Wealth and children are the adornment of the life of this world, but that which endures—righteous deeds—are better in reward with thy Lord (18:46). The Day of Judgment is thus described as the Day when neither wealth nor children avail, save for him who comes to God with a sound heart (26:88–89). Those who meet the challenge, dealing justly with their worldly possessions and responsibilities, shall be rewarded, but for those who disbelieve, neither their wealth nor their children will avail them aught against God (3:10, 116). In this vein, 9:55 and 9:85 caution: And let not their wealth or their children impress thee. God desires but to punish them thereby in the life of this world, and that their souls should depart while they are disbelievers (cf. 68:10–14); see also 2:212; 3:14; 8:28; 9:69; 26:88; 60:3; 64:14–15; 68:14; 71:21. As rendered, the remembrance of God refers to the practice of dhikr or remembrance of God (see 13:28c; 29:45c). It could also be rendered “the reminder of God,” in which case it would refer to the Quran (Q), since the Reminder is one of the names of the Quran, as in 6:90; 12:104; and 38:87, which say of the Quran: It is naught but a reminder for the worlds (see, e.g., 11:114, 120; 15:9; 16:44; 20:3, 99; 21:10, 24, 50; 36:69; 38:49; 43:44; 65:10; 68:51–52; 69:48; 73:19).

10 And spend of that which We have provided you before death comes upon one of you and he says, “My Lord, wouldst that Thou grant me reprieve till a term nigh, that I may give charity and be among the righteous!”

11 Yet God will not grant any soul reprieve when its term has come. And God is Aware of whatsoever you do.
These verses are understood to indicate the need to pay the zakāh (alms) with dispatch; likewise, there should be no delay in performing any obligatory religious duties (Q). According to Ibn ʿAbbās, “Every person who has fallen short in [paying] zakāh will ask to be returned [to this world] at the moment of death” (JJ, Q), ostensibly in order to make up for failing to pay the zakāh. When its term has come refers to the moment of death, at which point the door of repentance is closed. This discussion of Divine reprieve follows directly upon the central theme of this sūrah, that is, religious hypocrisy. Although every soul is granted reprieve until the moment of death to make sincere repentance, from a Quranic perspective one should not make a calculated decision to wait until that moment to repent, as in 4:18: Repentance is accepted from those who do evil deeds till, when death confronts one of them, he says, “Truly now I repent,” nor from those who die as disbelievers (see 4:17–18c). On the one hand, everyone is granted reprieve out of God’s Mercy and Forgiveness, as in 35:45: Were God to take mankind to task for that which they have earned, He would not leave a single creature upon the surface of the earth. But He grants them reprieve till a term appointed (see also 14:42; 16:61). On the other hand, those who deliberately wait until the moment of death to repent and perform good deeds are granted no reprieve when one’s term has come, as in the present verse, or respite, as in 2:162: The punishment shall not be lightened for them; nor shall they be granted respite (see also 3:88; 16:85; 21:40).

Mutual Dispossession

al-Taghābun

Al-Taghābun is considered by most to be Madinan, and by some to be Makkah (Āl, Q). According to a saying attributed to Ibn ʿAbbās, the entire sūrah was revealed in Makkah except the last verse (Q). Others are said to have maintained that all but vv. 14–16 are Makkān (IJ). It takes its name from the reference to the Day of Judgment as the Day of Mutual Dispossession in v. 9, a concept unique to the Quran. Al-Taghābun is the last in the group of sūrah known as “The Glorifiers” (al-Musabbihāt), which begin with a reference to the glorification of God; the other “Glorifiers” are 57, 59, 61, and 62. Just as the previous sūrah distinguishes between the hypocrites and the believers, calling upon the hypocrites to repent, so too does this sūrah distinguish between the believers and the disbelievers, warning the disbelievers of the fate that awaits them. Both sūrah end with a warning that property and children can be a source of diversion and thus of trial (63:9; 64:15) and with a reminder to spend in the way of God before being overcome by death (63:10; 64:16).

Commentary

1 Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God. His is the Sovereignty and His is the praise, and He is Powerful over all things.

   1 Whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God also appears in 59:1; 61:1; and 62:1 (cf. 57:1; 59:24). Here, as in 24:41, 59:24, and 62:1, glorifies appears in the present tense (yusabbi‘yu). In 57:1; 59:1; and 61:1, it is in the past tense (sabba‘a), and in 87:1 it occurs as an imperative: Glorify the Name of thy Lord. According to al-Rāzī, this is to indicate that the glorification of God should be and in reality is constant in the past, present, and future: the past tense conveys glorification from the beginning of time until the present moment, the present tense conveys glorification from the present moment into the future until the end of time (as the present tense can be used to indicate the future in Arabic), and the imperative indicates glorification at the present moment (R on 61:1).

2 He it is Who created you; among you are disbelievers and among you are believers. And God sees whatsoever you do.

   2 He it is Who created you; among you are disbelievers and among you are believers. And God sees whatsoever you do.

   2 The whole of this verse implies that only God knows those who are truly disbelievers and those who are truly believers. According to a ḥadīth, “People are born in various degrees (ṭabaqāt). A person may be born as a believer, live as a believer, and die as a believer. A person may be born as a disbeliever, live as a disbeliever, and die as a disbeliever. [Another] person may be born as a believer, live as a believer, and die as a disbeliever. And [another] person may be born as a disbeliever, live as a disbeliever, and die as a believer.” (Q). With regard to one’s actions, another ḥadīth states, “A person may act like the people of the Garden as it appears to the people, though he is among the people of the Fire. And a person may act like the people of the Fire as it appears to the people, though he is among the people of the Garden” (Q).
He created the heavens and the earth in truth and formed you, then made beautiful your forms, and unto Him is the journey’s end.

3 The final words of He created the heavens and the earth in truth (cf. 6:73; 14:19; 16:3; 29:44; 39:5; 45:22; 46:3) may also be rendered “for truth,” so that those who do evil and those who do good will be requited in accord with what they have done (Q); see 6:73c. That God made beautiful your forms can mean the human form; the inner reality of the human being, as in 95:4, Truly We created man in the most beautiful stature; or the forms of all things, as it is God Who made beautiful all that He created (32:7), and He formed you and made beautiful your forms (40:64); see 32:7c; 95:4c.

4 He knows whatsoever is in the heavens and the earth, and He knows what you hide and what you disclose; God knows what lies within breasts.

4 In this context, this verse indicates that God knows the actions, intentions, and inner thoughts of all believers and disbelievers and is able to distinguish sincerity from insincerity, as in 2:284: And whether you disclose what is in your souls or hide it, God will bring you to account for it (see also 3:29); cf. 2:77; 11:5; 16:19, 23; 36:76. That God knows what lies within breasts is repeated in 3:119, 154; 5:7; 8:43; 11:5; 29:10; 31:23; 35:38; 39:7; 42:24; 57:6; 67:13; see 5:7c.

5 Has not the account come to you of those who disbelieved aforetime such that they tasted the evil consequences of their affair, and theirs shall be a painful punishment?

5 That the disbelievers have tasted the evil consequences of their affair (cf. 5:95; 59:15; 65:9) indicates the afflictions that befell them in this life, while the painful punishment refers to the punishment that they will receive in the Hereafter. Those who disbelieved aforetime refers to all previous peoples who rejected the messengers that came to them with clear proofs (see 3:183–84; 7:101; 9:70; 10:13; 14:9; 30:47). Jesus, Moses, and Muhammad are most frequently cited as those who were sent with the clear proofs of revelation, but this can also be said of all the other prophets (see 9:70).

6 That is because their messengers brought them clear proofs, at which they said, “Shall a human being guide us?” So they disbelieved and turned away; yet God is beyond need. And God is Self-Sufficient, Praised.

6 People’s incredulousness at the idea that Divine messages would be sent through human messengers—reflected here in their question Shall a human being guide us?—is presented in the Quran as one of the constant barriers to belief, as in 17:94: And naught hindered men from believing when guidance came unto them, save that they said, “Has God sent a human being as a messenger?” (see also 6:6–9, 50, 91; 11:12, 27; 14:10–11; 21:3; 23:24, 33, 47; 26:154, 186; 36:15; 41:14; 50:2; 54:24; 74:25). This same objection is attributed to those who rejected the prophethood of Muhammad: And they say, “What ails this Messenger, who eats food and walks in the markets? Why is there not an angel sent down unto him to be a warner with him?” (25:7). That God is Self-Sufficient could indicate that God has no need of them or no need for them to believe in Him; thus He did not compel them to believe in Him despite His ability to do so (R, Z). That God is Praised indicates that being praised is intrinsic to the Divine Nature and not dependent upon anything to praise Him (Āl), thus it is often joined with the mention of God’s being Self-Sufficient (see 4:131; 14:8; 22:64; 31:12, 26; 35:15; 60:6).

7 Those who disbelieve claim that they will not be resurrected. Say, “Yea! By my Lord! Surely you shall be resurrected. Then you shall be informed of that which you did; and that is easy for God.”
7 They claim translates zaʿama, which refers to false claims of knowledge and thus indicates lying (Z). This is one of several verses where the disbelievers’ denial of resurrection is made explicit (see also 6:29; 23:37; 44:35). In other verses, their rejection takes the form of amazement or disparagement, as in 37:16–17: What! When we have died and are dust and bones, are we to be resurrected, and our fathers of old? (see also 17:49; 37:53; 50:3; 56:47; 79:11). That people will be informed of their past actions is central to the Quranic understanding of the Resurrection and the Final Judgment (see 5:14, 105; 6:60, 108, 159; 9:94, 105; 10:23; 24:64; 29:8; 31:15, 23; 39:7; 41:50; 58:6–7; 62:8; 75:13); see 6:60c.

8 So believe in God and His Messenger and the light We have sent down. God is Aware of whatsoever you do.

8 Here light refers primarily to the Quran (Q, R, Ṭ, Z), though it can also be understood as a reference to Divine Guidance in general. In the Quran, light is frequently associated with the guidance that comes through the prophets and revelation (see 6:91; 7:157; 21:48; 42:52; 57:9, 28), and in 9:32–33 and 61:8–9 the Quran mentions those who would try to extinguish the Light of God, which in relation to this verse could be read as an attempt to conceal Divine Revelation. According to a Shiite interpretation, in this verse light refers to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib as the leader of the believers after the Prophet (Kā, Qm), all of the Shiite Imams, or the Imam within the hearts of the believers (Qm).

9 The day that He gathers you for the Day of Gathering, that is the Day of Mutual Dispossession. And whosoever believes in God and works righteousness, He will absolve him of his evil deeds and cause him to enter Gardens with rivers running below, to abide therein forever. That is the great triumph.

9 The Day of Gathering (cf. 42:7) refers to the Day of Resurrection, when all human beings of all generations and all jinn will be gathered on a single open, barren plain for judgment (see, e.g., 3:25; 4:87; 6:128; 18:47; 20:106; 79:14), each community behind its prophet (see 17:71), as all living things are gathered unto their Lord in the end (6:38). It can also be seen as a reference to God’s gathering together one’s bones for resurrection, since one of the objections to resurrection posed by the disbelievers was to say, What! When we are bones and dust, shall we indeed be resurrected as a new creation? (17:49, 98; see also 23:35, 82; 36:78; 37:16, 53; 56:47; 75:3).

Mutual Dispossession renders taghābun, which derives from ghabana, meaning “to stint or shortchange another in a transaction” and implying an element of deception or subterfuge (Iṣ). It is most likely used as a reference to the Day of Resurrection because there is no way that human beings can fully repay the debt they owe to God. Although every soul will be paid in full for that which it has done (16:111; see also, e.g., 2:272, 281; 3:25, 57, 161, 185; 8:60; 11:15, 111), no soul can pay God in full for that which God has done. The believer is also said to be one who sells his soul seeking God’s good pleasure (2:207) and one who would sell the life of this world for the Hereafter (4:74). For those who have succeeded in making this transaction, 9:111 says, Truly God has purchased from the believers their souls and their wealth in exchange for the Garden being theirs (see also 35:29). Such a transaction is so completely one-sided that one could be said to have “stinted” (ghabana) God. In addition, those who sell God’s pact and their oaths for a paltry price (3:77) have stinted or shortchanged themselves by not honoring the agreement in which they were guaranteed that they would be paid in full. Thus 2:16 says of them, It is they who have purchased error at the price of guidance. Their commerce has not brought them profit, and they are not rightly guided (see also 2:175; 3:177). In contrast, those who sell their souls for God have their evil deeds absolved in this life and enter Paradise in the next; see 66:8c. Attaining the Garden is referred to as the great triumph in over a dozen verses; for the blessings of Paradise, see commentary on 5:119; 44:51–57. Regarding God’s admitting people into Gardens with rivers running below, see 2:25c; 3:195; 5:12; 48:5.

10 And those who disbelieve and deny Our signs, they are the inhabitants of the Fire, abiding therein. What an evil journey’s end!

11 No misfortune befalls, save by God’s Leave. And whosoever believes in God, He guides his heart. And God is Knower of all things.

10–11  Signs can also mean “verses,” in which case v. 10 would contain a direct reference to the Quran. Together, these verses along with v. 12 are a reminder to the Prophet and his followers that no matter what they do, there are some who will continue to reject revelation, since only God can guide, as in 17:97: Whomsoever God guides, he is rightly guided, and whomsoever He leads astray, thou wilt find no protectors for them apart from Him (see also 18:17).

12  Obey God and obey the Messenger. Then if you turn away—only the clear proclamation is incumbent upon Our Messenger.

12  Cf. 5:92. Regarding the relationship between obedience to God and obedience to the Messenger, see 3:32, 132; 4:59; 5:92; 8:1, 20, 46; 24:54, 56; 33:33; 49:14; 58:13 (see also 7:156–57; 59:7). From a Quranic perspective, to obey the Messenger is in fact to obey God, since whosoever obeys the Messenger obeys God (4:80); thus those who believe in him, honor him, help him, and follow the light that has been sent down with him, it is they who shall prosper (7:157). Prophets are only responsible for delivering the message (see 3:20; 5:92, 99; 13:40; 16:35, 82; 24:54; 29:18; 36:17; 42:48), meaning that their duty is to fulfill this responsibility; the salvation or damnation of human souls is for God alone to determine.

13  God, there is no god but He, and in God let the believers trust.

13  Regarding the virtue of trust in God (tawakkul), see 14:11–12c; cf. 3:122, 160; 5:11; 9:51; 12:67; 14:11–12; 39:38; 58:10.

14  O you who believe! Among your spouses and your children there is indeed an enemy unto you; so be wary of them. Yet if you pardon, forbear, and forgive, then truly God is Forgiving, Merciful.

14 This verse reportedly refers to those who were prevented by their families from migrating to Madinah after they had embraced Islam. Some took pity on their own families and did not emigrate or delayed their emigration (Q, Sy, T, W). Then this verse was revealed to instruct them to be on their guard against family members who did not support them in their religion, but also not to punish them for it. For other references to the manner in which family can serve as a distraction or even hindrance in religious matters, see 3:10, 14, 116; 8:28; 9:24, 55, 69, 85; 18:39–40, 46; 23:55–56; 26:88; 34:35–37; 60:3; 63:9; 64:15; 71:21.

15 Your property and your children are only a trial; and God—with Him is a great reward.

15 Cf. 8:28. Property and possessions are a trial insofar as one becomes overly attached to them, even a slave to them, rather than to God. In this vein a famous ḥadīth states, “Wretched is the slave of dīnārs. Wretched is the slave of dirhams. Wretched is the slave of fine dress. Wretched is the slave of fine cloth” (Q). Regarding the manner in which property and children can be said to be a trial, see 9:55c; 63:9c.

16 So reverence God as much as you are able. Listen, obey, and spend; that is better for your souls. And whosoever is shielded from the avarice of his soul, it is they who shall prosper.

16 According to some, Reverence God as much as you are able was later abrogated by Reverence God as He should be reverenced (3:102; Q), in which case this verse would be seen as an incremental step toward complete reverence for God. Nonetheless, the two phrases can be seen as complementary rather than contradictory. Together, listening and obeying indicate the two necessary dispositions toward revelation, first to contemplate it and understand it, and second to act upon it by refraining from what it forbids and doing what it enjoins. Thus listening must precede obeying as contemplation must precede action. Here spend means in charity, in alms (zakāh), or upon oneself (Q). It could also be rendered, “Spend what is better for your souls” (Q), which, in relation to vv. 9 and 17, would mean that those who spend what is best will not experience “dispossession” on the Day of Judgment, as they are those who lend unto God a goodly loan (v. 17). In this context, whosoever is shielded from the avarice of his soul (cf. 59:9) indicates both a general principle and that for those who do not succumb to the trials associated with family and property (see vv. 13–15) but are able to treat them in a just and equitable manner, it is they who shall prosper; see 59:9c.

17 If you lend unto God a goodly loan, He will multiply it for you and forgive you; and God is Thankful, Clement, 17 This verse follows upon the reference to the Day of Mutual Dispossession in v. 9. In contrast to the disbelievers, who have purchased error at the price of guidance, and punishment at the price of forgiveness (2:175), the believers sell their souls seeking God’s good pleasure (see 2:207) and thus lend unto God a goodly loan (cf. 2:245; 5:12; 57:11, 18; 73:20); see 57:11c; 57:18c. The manner in which God multiplies charitable offerings is best reflected in 2:261: The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of God is that of a grain that grows seven ears, in every ear a hundred grains. And God multiplies for whomsoever He will (see also 2:245; 4:40; 6:160). Regarding the manner in which God can be understood as Thankful, see 35:30c.

Al-Ṭalāq is a Madinan sūrah that takes its name from the guidelines it provides for divorce. It is also known as Sūrat al-Nisāʾ al-Qsurā, “The Shorter Sūrah Regarding Women,” in juxtaposition to Sūrah 4, al-Nisā’, “Women” (Āl, IJ). Although divorce is permitted in Islam, a ḥadīth states, “Verily, of that which is permitted, the most abhorred by God is divorce.” Nonetheless, in 33:28–29 the Prophet himself is permitted to divorce his wives.

The sūrah can be divided into two main sections. The first (vv. 1–7) provides details regarding the waiting period to be observed in cases of divorce, especially for women who are not menstruating, and the manner in which the husband is to provide for the wife, especially if she is pregnant or suckling. The second section (vv. 8–12) admonishes Muslims to observe these laws by providing reminders of previous peoples who failed to follow the laws revealed by God.

O Prophet! When you divorce your wives, divorce them for the waiting period and count well the waiting period, and reverence your Lord. Expel them not from their houses; nor shall they depart, unless they commit a flagrant indecency. These are the limits set by God, and whosoever transgresses the limits set by God has surely wronged himself. Thou knowest not: perhaps God will bring something new to pass thereafter. So when they have fulfilled their term, take them back in an honorable way or separate from them in an honorable way. And call two just persons among yourselves to witness and uphold the testimony for God. By this is exhorted whosoever believes in God and the Last Day. And whosoever reverences God, He will appoint a way out for him, and will provide for him whence he reckons not. And whosoever trusts in God, He suffices him. Truly God fulfills His Command. God has indeed set a measure for all things. As for those of your women who no longer await menstruation, if you are unsure, then their waiting period is three months, as it is for those who are yet to menstruate. But as for those who are pregnant, their term is until they deliver. And whosoever reverences God, He will appoint ease for his affair. That is the Command of God that He has sent down unto you. Whosoever reverences God, He will absolve him of his evil deeds and honor him with reward. Let them dwell where you dwell according to your means, and do not harm them so as to put them in straits. And if they are pregnant, then spend on them until they deliver. Then if they are suckling for you, give them their compensation, and consult together in an honorable way. And if you have difficulty with one another, then another will suckle for him. Let one who has abundant wealth spend from his abundance. And let one whose provision is measured spend from that which God has given him. God tasks no soul beyond that which He has given it. God will bring ease after hardship. And how many a town insolently defied the Command of its Lord and His messengers, such that We called it to a severe reckoning and punished it with a terrible punishment! Then did it taste the evil consequences of its affair, and the end of its affair was loss. God prepared a severe punishment for them. So reverence God, O possessors of intellect, who have believed. God has certainly sent down unto you a reminder: a Messenger reciting unto you the clear signs of God to bring those who believe and perform righteous deeds out of darkness into light. And whosoever believes in God and works righteousness, He causes him to enter Gardens with rivers running below, to abide therein forever. God has indeed prepared for him a beautiful provision. God it is Who created the seven heavens, and from the earth the like thereof. The Command descends among them that you may know that God is Powerful over all things and that God has encompassed all things in knowledge.
Commentary

O Prophet! When you divorce your wives, divorce them for the waiting period and count well the waiting period, and reverence your Lord. Expel them not from their houses; nor shall they depart, unless they commit a flagrant indecency. These are the limits set by God, and whosoever transgresses the limits set by God has surely wronged himself. Thou knowest not: perhaps God will bring something new to pass thereafter.

Although this verse is addressed to the Prophet in the second-person singular, it is meant for the entire community (JJ). Such double signification of the second-person singular is found in several verses, such as 4:79. It is reported that the Prophet divorced his wife Ḥafṣah, and so God revealed this verse. It was said to him, “Take her back, for she is one who fasts often and stands often in night vigil, and she is one of your wives in the Garden” (Q, Ṭ, W). The waiting period refers to the three courses of menstruation discussed in 2:228. If, however, the marriage were not consummated, no waiting period would be enforced, as stipulated in 33:49: O you who believe! If you marry believing women and then divorce them before you have touched them, there shall be no waiting period for you to reckon against them. But provide for them and release them in a fair manner. In the present verse, for the waiting period can also be read to mean “during the waiting period,” in which case it is understood to indicate that a man cannot divorce his wife while she is menstruating, but must wait until her menstruation is finished, as when the Prophet told ʿUmar regarding his son ʿAbd Allāh, who had declared divorce from his wife while she was menstruating, “Tell him to take her back and keep her until she is clean and then to wait till she gets her next period and becomes clean again, whereupon, if he wishes to keep her, he can do so. And if he wishes to divorce her, he can divorce her before having sexual intercourse with her; that is the prescribed waiting period that God has fixed for the women one intends to divorce” (Q). Expel them not indicates the rights that the wife continues to have over the husband, and nor shall they depart indicates the rights that the husband continues to have over the wife (Q; see 33:33), though they are no longer to engage in conjugal relations. Unless they commit a flagrant indecency indicates that a woman cannot be expelled from her house based upon a suspicion or an accusation of adultery; rather, any charges of infidelity must be properly substantiated (R) through the testimony of four trustworthy witnesses; see 4:15c. Perhaps God will bring something new to pass thereafter means that God may reconcile their hearts during the waiting period that was being observed after the first or second declaration of divorce and before the third (JJ, Q), since after the third declaration divorce is final and marital relations cannot be resumed; see 2:230c.

2 So when they have fulfilled their term, take them back in an honorable way or separate from them in an honorable way. And call two just persons among yourselves to witness and uphold the testimony for God. By this is exhorted whosoever believes in God and the Last Day. And whosoever reverences God, He will appoint a way out for him,

The first sentence of this verse is similar to that of 2:231. When the full period of three menstrual cycles required for a divorce to be final has passed, men may choose to reconcile with their wives and thus take them back in an honorable way, that is, out of a genuine desire to continue the marriage rather than harming them by taking them back just before the waiting period is over and then beginning the divorce process again (see 2:231c). Alternately, the divorce can be finalized in an honorable way, meaning that each party must fulfill its obligations to the other; see 2:228. If the hearts of the husband and wife are reconciled and they wish to retain the marriage bond after initiating the divorce process, they must call two witnesses; some say this is required, others that it is only recommended (Q). In this context, that God will appoint a way out for the reverent means that those who observe the requirements of divorce, despite the difficulties such requirements may entail, will be rewarded. More generally, the phrase indicates that anyone who endures an affliction patiently will be granted a way from the Fire to the Garden in the Hereafter (R).

3 and will provide for him whence he reckons not. And whosoever trusts in God, He suffices him. Truly God fulfills His Command. God has indeed set a measure for all things.

3 This verse and the last sentence of the preceding verse were reportedly revealed in connection with a poor man who had numerous children. When he asked the Prophet for help, the Prophet told him, “Fear God, and be patient!” Not long after this, a son of this man, who had been captured by the enemy, escaped and led away many of the enemy’s sheep, four thousand according to some (Q, W), one hundred according to others (R). The man went to the Prophet to ask him what he should do with the sheep. The Prophet said, “Keep them. They are yours” (Q, R, Sy, Ṭ, W), because they would technically have been spoils of war. The virtue of trusting in God is extolled throughout the Quran (see 14:11–12c). Here it is directly linked to God’s set measure for all things. In this specific context, it indicates that observing the waiting period (v. 1) for divorce is part of trusting in God and of observing the measure God has established (R). More generally, it indicates complete trust in the Divine qadar, or “measuring out,” as this is considered one of the tenets of faith: “Faith is to believe in God, His angels, His books, His messengers, the Day of Judgment, and al-qadar, the good of it and the evil of it”; regarding God’s “measuring out,” see 54:49c.

4 As for those of your women who no longer await menstruation, if you are unsure, then their waiting period is three months, as it is for those who are yet to menstruate. But as for those who are pregnant, their term is until they deliver. And whosoever reverences God, He will appoint ease for his affair.

4 It is reported that the Companion Ubayy ibn Ka‘b said to the Prophet, “People say that there remain women regarding whom nothing was mentioned in the Quran, the young and those who are pregnant”; then this verse was revealed (IK, Q, W). As the three courses (see 2:228) for women who no longer menstruate or who have not yet begun to menstruate cannot be determined, they are to wait three months until the divorce is complete. If, however, their spouses have died, they are to wait four months and ten days before they may remarry.
(see 2:234). But those who are pregnant are to wait until they have delivered before the divorce is considered complete. If you are unsure can be seen as a clarification related to v. 1, meaning, “Expel them not from their houses if you are unsure that the [waiting] period has concluded” (Q). That God appoints ease for those who reverence Him is here understood to mean that, if a couple are mindful of these conditions, God will make it easy for them to reconcile before the divorce is complete (Q). It could also be a general recognition of the difficulties divorce entails, especially during the waiting period when the estranged spouses might continue to have regular contact with one another.

5 That is the Command of God that He has sent down unto you. Whosoever reverences God, He will absolve him of his evil deeds and honor him with reward.

This verse is a reaffirmation that the above restrictions regarding the prescribed waiting period are part of the revealed Law. God covers over evil deeds through good deeds, which wipe away evil deeds (Aj); see 66:8c.

6 Let them dwell where you dwell according to your means, and do not harm them so as to put them in straits. And if they are pregnant, then spend on them until they deliver. Then if they are suckling for you, give them their compensation, and consult together in an honorable way. And if you have difficulty with one another, then another will suckle for him.

During the prescribed waiting period, men are to continue to provide for their wives as they provided for them while married. Some argue that this verse means only that shelter must be provided, while others maintain that the man must also continue to spend for the woman’s provision (Q). If the woman is pregnant and the divorce is irrevocable, the man must continue to provide for her until she gives birth and as long as she suckles the child, usually a period of two full years (for the conditions pertaining to suckling, see 2:233). Consult together in an honorable way regarding the care of the child, so that no mother be harmed on account of her child, nor father on account of his child (2:233). Some say that the present verse means that the man must pay for the provisions of the mother and the child, others that he must pay only for the provisions of the child (Q). If they are not able to reach an agreement because either the father withholds payment or the mother refrains from suckling, the mother should not be compelled to do so, and another woman can be chosen to suckle the child (JJ). Providing for the suckling child is said to be the responsibility of husbands, because they are legally obligated to provide for all of their children’s needs. Regarding the legal status of “milk relations,” see 4:23c.

7 Let one who has abundant wealth spend from his abundance. And let one whose provision is measured spend from that which God has given him. God tasks no soul beyond that which He has given it. God will bring ease after hardship.

Some interpret this verse to mean that the amount paid by the husband to his former wife depends upon both her needs and his circumstances, while others maintain that the amount the wife must be paid is to be limited to her immediate needs (Q). This verse is also viewed as evidence for the position that the husband is solely responsible for providing provisions for the child whether the couple is married or divorced (Q). The last sentence indicates that if one finds it difficult to meet these obligations, God will ease one’s circumstances, either in this life by providing additional means or in the Hereafter by easing one’s way into the Garden for striving to observe the Command of God even when it was difficult. Regarding the relationship between hardship and ease, see 94:5–6c.

8 And how many a town insolently defied the Command of its Lord and His messengers, such that We called it to a severe reckoning and punished it with a terrible punishment!

9 Then did it taste the evil consequences of its affair, and the end of its affair was loss.

8–9 Given the extent to which the rulings regarding the treatment of divorced wives outlined in vv. 1–7 and in 2:222–37 differed from those of pre-Islamic times, these verses remind the Muslims of the dire consequences of failing to follow God’s Law. The severe reckoning can be seen as a reference to the punishment they receive in this world and the terrible punishment as that of the Hereafter (Q). They tasted the consequences of disbelief (Q), and regretted their actions when regret was no longer of any benefit to them (IK). Similar warnings regarding following God’s Command and observing the limits He sets are issued after the revelation of the inheritance verses, which were also controversial for some because of the unprecedented rights they gave to women; see commentary on 4:11–14.

10 God prepared a severe punishment for them. So reverence God, O possessors of intellect, who have believed. God has certainly sent down unto you a reminder:

10 Possessors of intellect (2:179, 197, 269; 3:7, 190; 5:100; 12:111; 13:19; 14:52; 38:29, 43; 39:9, 18, 21; 40:54) indicates those who possess true knowledge of the inner essence of things; see 5:100c; 39:9c. A reminder is read by most as a reference to the Quran, but in relation to v. 11 it could also be seen as a reference to the Prophet (IK, Q).

11 a Messenger reciting unto you the clear signs of God to bring those who believe and perform righteous deeds out of darkness into light. And whosoever believes in God and works righteousness, He causes him to enter Gardens with rivers running below, to abide therein forever. God has indeed prepared for him a beautiful provision.

11 Bringing the believers out of darkness into light (cf. 2:257; 5:16; 14:1, 5; 33:43; 57:9) indicates bringing them from disbelief and ignorance to belief and knowledge (IK), a function ascribed to scripture in general in 42:52: Thou knewest not what scripture was, nor faith. But We made it a light whereby We guide whomsoever We will among Our servants (see also 5:16c ; 14:1c). Here the phrase can also be understood as a reference to the Prophet bringing people from darkness into light, as in 14:1: [This is] a Book that We have sent down unto thee, that thou mightest bring mankind out of darkness into light, by the leave of their Lord. Regarding God’s admitting people into Gardens with rivers running below, see 2:25c; 3:195; 5:12; 48:5; 64:9.

God it is Who created the seven heavens, and from the earth the like thereof. The Command descends among them that you may know that God is Powerful over all things and that God has encompassed all things in knowledge.

12 The creation of seven heavens is referred to elsewhere (e.g., 2:29; 17:44; 23:86; 41:12; 67:3; 71:15; 78:12), but this is the only verse to allude to seven earths or lands, which is supported by a ḥadīth: “Whosoever usurps a span of land unjustly, it will encircle his neck on the Day of Resurrection from the seven earths” (Q). When viewed in light of this ḥadīth, this verse is understood to mean seven lands “one upon another” (Mw, Q), just as the seven heavens are described in 67:3 and 71:15. But the seven earths or lands can also be understood as a reference not to seven levels, but to seven lands spread across the earth (Q), hence to the seven continents or climes. In this vein, Ibn ʿAbdās reportedly said regarding this verse, “Were I to tell you of the interpretation of it, you would disbelieve, and your disbelief would be your denial of it” (Ṭ). He is also reported to have said, “Seven lands: in each land there is a prophet like your prophet, and an Adam like Adam, and a Noah like Noah, and an Abraham like Abraham, and a Jesus like Jesus” (IK, Ṭ). In this sense, the Command descends among them can be seen as an allusion to the universality of revelation, as in 16:36: We indeed sent a messenger unto every community.

Forbiddance

Likely from the year 7/629, al-Taḥrīm is a Madinan sūrah, although a minority maintain that only the first nine verses are Madinan and that the last three are Makkān (Āl). It takes its name from the opening verse, in which the Prophet is told not to forbid for himself what God has permitted for him. Along these lines, it is also known as Limā tuḥarrimu, “Why Dost Thou Forbid?” (Āl), and as al-Mutaḥḥaram, “The Forbidden” (Suyuti, Itqān). Since it directly addresses the Prophet’s family situation, it is also known as Sūrat al-Nabī, “The Sūrah of the Prophet” (Āl, Z).

Whereas the first half of the previous sūrah provides details for divorce pertaining to all women, the subject of this sūrah is the relationship between the Prophet and his wives (vv. 1–5). This is followed by injunctions instructing the believers on how to protect themselves and repent (vv. 6, 8), warning the disbelievers of their fate (v. 7), and enjoining the Prophet to strive against those who do not accept the revelation (v. 9). The final verses (vv. 10–12) provide examples of believing and disbelieving women. In providing examples of women whose state of virtue stood in stark contrast to that of their husbands, it demonstrates that everyone, even the wives of the Prophet, is responsible for the state of his or her own soul. In this way it complements Sūrah 60, al-Mumtaḥanah, the last verses of which emphasize the manner in which women made their own pledge with the Prophet.
O Prophet! Why dost thou forbid that which God has made lawful unto thee, seeking the good pleasure of thy wives? And God is Forgiving, Merciful. God has already ordained for you the absolution of your oaths. And God is your Master. He is the Knower, the Wise. When the Prophet confided a certain matter to one of his wives, but she divulged it, and God showed it to him, he made known part of it and held back part of it. When he informed her of it, she said, “Who informed thee of this?” He replied, “The Knower, the Aware informed me.” If you both repent unto God . . . For your hearts did certainly incline, and if you aid one another against him, then truly God, He is his Protector, as are Gabriel and the righteous among the believers; and the angels support him withal. It may be that if he divorces you, his Lord would give him wives in your stead who are better than you, submitting, believing, devoutly obedient, penitent, worshipping, and given to wayfaring—previously married, and virgins. O you who believe! Shield yourselves and your families from a Fire whose fuel is men and stones, over which are angels, stern and severe, who do not disobey God in what He commands of them and who do what they are commanded. O you who disbelieve! Make no excuses this day! You are only requited for that which you used to do. O you who believe! Repent unto God with sincere repentance. It may be that your Lord will absolve you of your evil deeds and cause you to enter Gardens with rivers running below—the Day when God will not disgrace the Prophet and those who believe with him, with their light spreading before them and on their right, while they say, “Our Lord, complete our light for us and forgive us. Truly Thou art Powerful over all things.” O Prophet! Strive against the disbelievers and the hypocrites, and be harsh with them. Their refuge is Hell. What an evil journey’s end! God sets forth as an example for those who believe the wife of Noah and the wife of Lot. They were under two of Our righteous servants; then they betrayed them, and they availed them naught against God. And it was said unto both, “Enter the Fire with those who enter.” ¹¹ And God sets forth as an example for those who believe the wife of Pharaoh when she said, “My Lord, build for me a house near unto Thee in the Garden, deliver me from Pharaoh and his deeds, and deliver me from the wrongdoing people,” ¹² and Mary, the daughter of ʿImrān, who preserved her chastity. Then We breathed therein of Our Spirit, and she confirmed the Words of her Lord and His Books; and she was among the devoutly obedient.
Commentary

1 O Prophet! Why dost thou forbid that which God has made lawful unto thee, seeking the good pleasure of thy wives? And God is Forgiving, Merciful.

This verse was reportedly revealed after the Prophet had sworn to his wife Ḥafṣah that he would no longer have intimate relations with his Coptic slave girl, Māriyah. The Prophet had been intimate with Māriyah in Ḥafṣah’s apartment on Ḥafṣah’s day (the Prophet’s wives rotated, each having one day with him in turn). When Ḥafṣah became upset, the Prophet asked her to tell no one of it and then told Māriyah that she was forbidden to him, after which this verse and the following verses were revealed (Q, Sy, Ṭ, W), according to some after a period of twenty-one days (W). According to others, this verse was revealed after the Prophet forbade a certain beverage to himself that God had not forbidden, though it could apply to any instance in which the Prophet might have forbidden something that was permitted to him (Ṭ), an error that all Muslims are counseled to avoid, as in 5:87: O you who believe! Forbid not the good things that God has made lawful unto you (see also 6:140).

2 God has already ordained for you the absolution of your oaths. And God is your Master. He is the Knower, the Wise.

The absolution for breaking oaths is found in 5:89: the feeding of ten indigent people with the equivalent of that which you feed your own family, or clothing them, or fasting three days if one does not have the means to feed and clothe others. According to some commentators, in this instance the Prophet made expiation for going back on the oath to not be intimate with Māriyah by freeing a slave (JJ). Others maintain that, as God had absolved him of the oath, there was no need for expiation (JJ).
When the Prophet confided a certain matter to one of his wives, but she divulged it, and God showed it to him, he made known part of it and held back part of it. When he informed her of it, she said, “Who informed thee of this?” He replied, “The Knower, the Aware informed me.”

She divulged it refers to Ḥafṣah’s telling Ḥāʾishah, another of the Prophet’s wives, of the Prophet’s intimacy with Māriyah in Ḥafṣah’s apartment, though the Prophet had requested that Ḥafṣah say nothing of it. When he asked her if she had spoken of the matter, she denied doing so (W). The Prophet then informed Ḥafṣah of some of what she had divulged and passed over some of it out of kindness toward her (JJ, Ṭṣ), or else God informed the Prophet of some of it and passed over some of it.

If you both repent unto God . . . For your hearts did certainly incline, and if you aid one another against him, then truly God, He is his Protector, as are Gabriel and the righteous among the believers; and the angels support him withal.

You both is an address to Ḥafṣah and Ḥāʾishah. The response to the elided conditional phrase if you both repent unto God is understood to be “it will be accepted of both of you” (JJ). Their hearts inclined to the prohibition of Māriyah (JJ), thus to the Prophet’s prohibiting what God had made licit. That their hearts inclined is understood by some to mean that they swerved or deviated from the truth (Q, Ṭ). If the two wives were to aid one another in continuing to oppose the Prophet and thus failing to repent, this verse informs them, they would then be opposing the side of God, the believers, and the angels, all of whom assist the Prophet against those who harm him (Ṭ). The righteous among the believers is taken as a reference to ʿUmar and Abū Bakr, who were the fathers of Ḥafṣah and Ḥāʾishah, respectively; to the best among the believers (Ṭ, Ṭṣ, Ṭū); or to the prophets (Ṭ, Ṭṣ). In Shiite commentaries, it is understood as a reference to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib (Qm, Ṭṣ, Ṭū), and it is reported that the Prophet took ʿAlī by the hand and said, “O people! This one is the righteous among the believers” (Ṭṣ).
5 It may be that if he divorces you, his Lord would give him wives in your stead who are better than you, submitting, believing, devoutly obedient, penitent, worshipping, and given to wayfaring—previously married, and virgins.

5 This verse is addressed to the Prophet’s wives, chastising them for succumbing to jealousy and forcing the Prophet to forbid what God had permitted. It can also be taken in a broader sense as a reminder to all believers to honor their spouses. Submitting translates muslimāt, indicating submission and thus humility before God (Ṭ). Devoutly obedient (qānit) indicates spiritual and religious obedience and conveys constancy and serenity (see 4:34c). In the Quran, words derived from the root q-n-t relate exclusively to obedience toward and worship of God, not obedience to human beings (cf. 2:116, 238; 3:17, 43; 4:34; 16:120; 33:31, 35; 39:9). Given to wayfaring translates sāʾiḥāt, which in this context would refer to those given to emigrating for the sake of their religion (JJ, Ṭ). From another perspective, it could indicate those who travel the spiritual path. Sāʾiḥāt can also mean “given to fasting,” which in this context is interpreted to have a broader meaning, that of preserving one’s limbs from any disobedient acts (Iṣ). Although more commentators seem to interpret it to mean “given to fasting,” such interpretations may arise from later attempts to limit the roles of women; see 9:112c.

6 O you who believe! Shield yourselves and your families from a Fire whose fuel is men and stones, over which are angels, stern and severe, who do not disobey God in what He commands of them and who do what they are commanded.

6 Shield yourselves and your families by being obedient and reverent and enjoining obedience and reverence to God (Ṭ). This is the only verse in which believers are told to shield themselves from the Fire; in other verses it is the believers who call upon God to shield them from the punishment of the Fire (see 3:16, 191; 40:7). Here stones likely refers to the idols worshipped by the idolaters, as they were made of stone (JJ) or were in fact stones. The angels referred to here are the guardians of Hell, of whom the Quran says there are nineteen (74:30).

7 O you who disbelieve! Make no excuses this day! You are only requitied for that which you used to do.

7 This verse is a direct address to the disbelievers as they enter the Fire (JJ). This day thus refers to the Day of Resurrection (Ṭ). You are only requited for that which you used to do (cf. 52:16) indicates that God is just in punishing souls and wrongs no one, as in 45:22: God created the heavens and the earth in truth, and so that every soul may be recompensed for that which it has earned; and they shall not be wronged (see also 27:90; 34:33; 37:39; 83:36). When people see the reality of their deeds on the Day of Resurrection, it is said that they will know the truth and thus not try to make any excuses for their actions, as in 67:10–11.

8 O you who believe! Repent unto God with sincere repentance. It may be that your Lord will absolve you of your evil deeds and cause you to enter Gardens with rivers running below—the Day when God will not disgrace the Prophet and those who believe with him, with their light spreading before them and on their right, while they say, “Our Lord, complete our light for us and forgive us. Truly Thou art Powerful over all things.”

8 Repent unto God can also mean “turn unto God,” indicating turning from sin to obedience to God (Ṭ). Sincere repentance indicates that it is not a mere turning away from sin, but turning with true contrition, so that one never returns to the sin of which one has repented (Ṭ) and resolves not to commit the sin again. It may be translates ʿasā, which conveys a sense of hope. In line with this verse, a hadīth says, “O people! Repent unto your Lord before you die, and draw yourselves nigh unto Him with righteous deeds before you become preoccupied”; also see 3:193. That God will absolve human beings of their evil deeds is asserted in several verses. In some, as here, such absolution is linked to reverence for God (8:29; 5:65; 65:5); in others it is linked to faith and belief (29:7; 47:2; 48:5; 64:9). In 4:31 absolution from evil deeds is said to be the reward for repenting and then shunning major sins, while in other verses such absolution is linked with specific deeds, such as performing charitable acts in secret (2:271), fighting or being slain in the way of God (3:195), or performing prayer and giving alms (zakāh; 5:12). In general such absolution indicates the manner in which God shields those of faith from the evil consequences of their own actions in both this life and the Hereafter (see 40:9, 45; 42:25): God may absolve them of the worst of that which they have done and render unto them their reward for the best of that which they used to do (39:35; see also 9:121; 16:96; 24:38; 29:7; 46:16). Such absolution is thus linked with God’s admitting people into Gardens with rivers running below, see 2:25c; 3:195; 5:12; 48:5; 64:9.

Regarding their light spreading before them and on their right, see 57:12c. The supplication at the end of the verse is understood as the words uttered by the believers when they see God extinguish the light of the hypocrites (Q, R); see commentary on 57:13–14. According to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, God completes their light for them, but they continue to call upon God, seeking to draw nearer unto Him (R).

9 O Prophet! Strive against the disbelievers and the hypocrites, and be harsh with them. Their refuge is Hell. What an evil journey’s end!

9 This verse is identical to 9:73. In this context, strive against the disbelievers is understood to mean with the sword as well as through preaching and calling them to God (Q), while strive against . . . the hypocrites is understood to mean by applying the legal punishments for their transgressions (Q, T).

10 God sets forth as an example for those who disbelieve the wife of Noah and the wife of Lot. They were under two of Our righteous servants; then they betrayed them, and they availed them naught against God. And it was said unto both, “Enter the Fire with those who enter.”

10–12 These last three verses speak to the situation of the Prophet’s wives by providing examples of disbelievers from among the wives of previous prophets and examples of the most pious women in the history of the Judeo-Christian-Islamic tradition. They also provide an example for all believers by demonstrating that the righteousness of another does not benefit one who works corruption and the corruption of another does not harm one who is righteous (R).

10 They betrayed them; that is, they both betrayed their husbands. Lot’s wife’s betrayal of him is alluded to in several verses (7:83; 11:81; 15:60; 27:57; 29:32), but this is the only explicit Quranic reference to Noah’s wife’s betrayal. Their lives are an example because they demonstrate that marriage to a prophet did not assure salvation; and in the case of Lot’s wife it did not protect her from being punished with the other disbelievers when Sodom was destroyed (see 7:83; 11:81; 15:59–60; 26:170–71; 27:57; 29:32; 54:34; cf. Genesis 19:26). Noah’s wife is reported to have said to the people that he was a madman (JJ, R), while Lot’s wife is reported to have told the people the whereabouts of Lot’s guests, whom they sought to molest (JJ, R).

11 And God sets forth as an example for those who believe the wife of Pharaoh when she said, “My Lord, build for me a house near unto Thee in the Garden, deliver me from Pharaoh and his deeds, and deliver me from the wrongdoing people,”

11 In contrast to the wives of Noah and Lot, who were sinners despite being married to righteous men, Pharaoh’s wife Āsiyah was righteous despite being married to the greatest of sinners. Āsiyah is said to be one of four women who were pure of sin regarding whom the Prophet is reported to have said, “The best among the women of the Garden are Khadijah bint Khuwaylid, Fāṭimah bint Muhammad, Maryam bint ʿImrān, and Āsiyah bint Muzāhim, the wife of Pharaoh” (IK). According to commentators, Āsiyah was tortured by Pharaoh for believing in Moses, at which time she uttered the words attributed to her in this verse and was taken to Paradise (IK, JJ, R). The Prophet is also reported to have said, “Verily in the Garden God has married me to Mary bint ʿImrān, the wife of Pharaoh, and the sister of Moses” (Āl).

12 and Mary, the daughter of ʿImrān, who preserved her chastity. Then We breathed therein of Our Spirit, and she confirmed the Words of her Lord and His Books; and she was among the devoutly obedient.

12 And Mary follows upon the wife of Pharaoh from v. 11, meaning that she is also set forth as an example for those who believe (Āl). For the story of Jesus’ mother, Mary, see Sūrah 19. ʿImrān is the name of Mary’s father, who is not named in the Bible but is known in extra-Biblical literature as Joachim (see commentary on 3:33–35). She preserved her chastity (cf. 21:91) is in part a response to the accusations of being unchaste that Mary’s people made against her (R); see 19:27–28. Some read Our Spirit here and in 21:91 as a reference to the Angel Gabriel (IK, JJ, Ṭ), while others say Our Spirit refers to a spirit among the spirits God has created, which would here be the spirit of Jesus (Q; for the debates regarding this issue, see 4:171c). Taken most literally, it would refer to the Spirit of God. That she confirmed the Words of her Lord and His Books means that she believed in all previous revelations (R). Regarding devoutly obedient, see 66:5c; 4:34c. Here the last phrase could also mean “she was from the devoutly obedient,” thus indicating purity of lineage (Āl).
Although there are no definitive accounts as to when \textit{al-Mulk} was revealed, most consider it to be from the middle of the Makkian period. In the sayings attributed to the Prophet, it is called by the first word, \textit{Tabārak}, meaning “Blessed,” or by the first few words, \textit{Tabāraka al-ladī bi yadihi\textasciiacute;l-mulk}, “Blessed Is He in Whose Hand Lies Sovereignty.” It is also known as \textit{al-Māni\textasciiacute;c}, meaning “The Shield” or “The Protector,” after a famous \textit{ḥadīth}: “\textit{Sūrat Tabārak} is a shield (māni\textasciiacute;) from the punishment of the grave.” According to some it was also known as \textit{al-Munjiyyah}, “The Savior,” after another \textit{ḥadīth}: “Verily, there is a sūrah in the Quran which contains thirty verses that will intercede on behalf of one who recites it until he is forgiven: \textit{Blessed is He in Whose Hand lies sovereignty}” (IK, Ṭs). Another \textit{ḥadīth} states, “There is a sūrah of the Quran which is but thirty verses that will argue on behalf of its companion until it causes him to enter the Garden: \textit{Blessed is He in Whose Hand lies sovereignty}” (IK).

Based upon such \textit{ḥādīth} and upon several sayings of the Companions of the Prophet, it is believed that one who recites this sūrah will be spared from trials in both this life and the next. It is also reported that the Prophet said regarding \textit{al-Mulk}, “I would love for it to be in the heart of every person among my community” (IK, Sy). Consequently, this is one of the best-known and most frequently recited sūrahs of the Quran.

The sūrah begins with an attestation to God’s omnipotence and the perfection of creation (vv. 1–4), followed by an assertion of the inability of the jinn to penetrate the heavens (v. 5). The dreadful ends of those who deny God’s messengers (vv. 6–11) are contrasted with the final ends of those who fear God (v. 12). God’s omnipotence and omniscience is then reasserted through a series of interposed statements and rhetorical questions (vv. 13–24), and the sūrah concludes with a series of questions that the Prophet is told to pose to those who question him regarding the end of time (vv. 25–30).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1️⃣ Blessed is He in Whose Hand lies sovereignty, and He is Powerful over all things, 2️⃣ Who created death and life that He may try you as to which of you is most virtuous in deed, and He is the Mighty, the Forgiving, 3️⃣ Who created seven heavens one upon another; no disproportion dost thou see in the Merciful’s creation. Cast thy sight again; dost thou see any flaw? 4️⃣ Then cast thy sight twice again; thy sight will return to thee humbled and wearied. 5️⃣ Truly We have adorned the lowest heaven with lamps and made them missiles against the satans; and We have prepared for them the punishment of the Blaze. 6️⃣ And for those who disbelieve in their Lord is the punishment of Hell. What an evil journey’s end! 7️⃣ When they are cast therein, they will hear it blaring as it boils over, 8️⃣ well-nigh bursting with rage. Commentary

1 Blessed is He in Whose Hand lies sovereignty, and He is Powerful over all things, Sovereignty translates mulk, a word closely related to malakūt, which is rendered dominion in 36:83; they derive from the same root, m-l-k, which in verbal form means “to possess,” “to control,” “to rule,” or “to reign.” According to some, malakūt refers to God’s Lordship over the unseen realm, while mulk refers to God’s Lordship over the visible world. The Divine Name Mālik (“Master”) also derives from this root, as does the word for “king” (malik) and the most widely used word for “angels” (malāʾikah; sing, malak); for more on these terms and their use in Islamic cosmology, see 36:83c.

2 Who created death and life that He may try you as to which of you is most virtuous in deed, and He is the Mighty, the Forgiving, God’s creation of life and death is often understood as His granting existence to what is nonexistent, as in 2:28: How can you disbelieve in God, seeing that you were dead and He gave you life? (IK). That the mention of death precedes life in this verse can be seen as an indication that God has created death for human beings in relation to this world, for every soul shall taste death (3:185; 21:35; 29:57), and life in relation to both this life and the Hereafter (Q). As a ḥadīth states, “God has humbled the son of Adam with death, and has made the world an abode of life, then an abode of death, and made the Hereafter an abode of recompense (jazāʾ), then an abode of eternal abiding (baqāʾ)” (IK, Q, Sy). Regarding the second half of the verse, see 18:7: Surely We made whatsoever is on the earth an adornment for it, that We may try them as to which of them is most virtuous in deed (see also 11:7). That God tries human beings is not considered unjust, for as other verses say, God tasks no soul beyond its capacity (2:286; see also 2:233; 6:152; 7:42; 23:62), and thy Lord wrongs no one (18:49). Trials are considered an aspect of God’s Mercy, since they are an integral part of the process of purification. When asked which human beings suffer the greatest trials, the Prophet answered, “The prophets, then those most like them. A person is tested according to the level of his faith. If his faith is firm, his trials increase in severity, and if there is weakness in his faith, he will be tried accordingly.” With regard to trials faced by believers, another hadīth says, “No fatigue, disease, sorrow, sadness, hurt, or distress befalls a Muslim—even if he be pricked by a thorn—but that God expiates some of his sins thereby.” In this sense, affliction can be a blessing for the opportunities it presents; another hadīth says, “If God wants to do good to somebody, He afflicts him with trials.” Conversely, wealth can be a curse for those who do not manage it properly, as in 9:85: And let not their wealth or their children impress thee. God desires only to punish them thereby in this world, and that their souls should depart while they are disbelievers. Thus one is tried both by affliction, in the face of which one must be patient, and by blessings, for which one must be thankful, recognizing that God is Powerful over all things (v. 1). Several early commentators note the significance of the fact that the verse says most virtuous in deed rather than “most accomplished” or simply “most” (IK), a position that reflects the emphasis upon intention found throughout the Quran and Hadīth. As the Prophet says in one of the most famous of alḥadīth, “Deeds are only in accord with their intentions. And every person has only what he intended.” It is said that upon reciting this sūrah the Prophet stopped when he reached which of you is most virtuous in deed and said, “The most wary of what God has forbidden and the quickest to obey God” (Āl, Q).

3 Who created seven heavens one upon another; no disproportion dost thou see in the Merciful’s creation. Cast thy sight again; dost thou see any flaw?

4 Then cast thy sight twice again; thy sight will return to thee humbled and wearied.

3–4 The heavens can be seen as a reference only to the heavens, the whole of the created order, or the universal levels or grades of existence, the last of which serves as a basis for various hierarchical cosmological schemes in some commentaries. Disproportion translates tafāwut, which here indicates something that lacks proportion or balance such that parts of it fail to connect with other parts of it (R, Z); thus some say it has the same meaning as rifts in 50:6: Have they not looked upon the sky above them, how We built it and adorned it, and [how it] has no rifts? The lack of disproportion can be understood as the absence of rifts between the seven heavens or more generally as an indication that there are no gaps in God’s creation. As several verses indicate, all things are created in truth, as in 44:38–39: And We did not create the heavens and the earth and whatsoever is between them in play. We did not create them, save in truth. But most of them know not (see also 6:73; 10:5; 14:19; 15:85; 16:3; 29:44; 30:8; 39:5; 45:22; 46:3). That the eye returns humbled could also mean that an eye that tries to find defect returns “humiliated” or “debased” (IK). This verse is also related to 4:82, which maintains that for one who contemplates the Quran no discrepancy will be found in it.

5. Truly We have adorned the lowest heaven with lamps and made them missiles against the satans; and We have prepared for them the punishment of the Blaze.

5. According to a famous saying attributed to Qatādah, one of the foremost commentators from the third generation of Muslim scholars, “The creation of the stars is for three things: decoration of the nearest heaven, missiles to hit the satans, and signs to guide travelers” (IK, Ṭ). The first two functions are mentioned in this verse. It is said that the function of meteors or shooting stars is to bar the satans from listening to the secrets of Heaven, to which they had previously enjoyed access; see 15:16–18; 37:6–10c; 72:8–9c, as well as the introduction to Sūrah 72.

6. And for those who disbelieve in their Lord is the punishment of Hell. What an evil journey’s end!

6. This verse can be seen as a general warning against all forms of disbelief. But in relation to the discussion of satans in v. 5, it is said to apply to those who would seek information from fortune-tellers and sorcerers as an alternative to religion. As a ḥadīth says of this practice, “Whosoever comes to a fortune-teller (kāhin) or diviner (ʿarrāf) and considers what he says to be true has disbelieved in what was revealed to Muhammad.”

7 When they are cast therein, they will hear it blaring as it boils over, well-nigh bursting with rage. Whenever a group is cast therein, its keepers ask them, “Did not a warner come unto you?”

7–8 These verses refer to the hideous sound that Hellfire is said to make as the disbelievers are dragged into its depths. It is similar to the sound described in 25:12: When it sees them from a place far off, they will hear its raging and roaring. Its keepers refers to the angels serving as the gatekeepers of Hell, who are described elsewhere as angels, stern and severe, who do not disobey God in what He commands of them and who do what they are commanded (66:6). They number nineteen in 74:30–31, and the main keeper is identified as Mālik in 43:77–78: And they will call, “O Mālik, let thy Lord put an end to us.” He will reply, “You will surely remain. We did indeed bring you the Truth, but most of you were averse to the Truth.” Their question to the disbelievers, Did not a warner come unto you? is by way of reproach, for as 35:24 states, There has been no community but that a warner has passed among them.

9 They say, “Indeed, a warner came unto us, but we denied him and said, ‘God did not send anything down; you are in naught but great error.’”

9 As many verses attest, God promises that none will be punished unless they have been sent a clear warner, part of the test alluded to in v. 2. As 17:15 states, And never do We punish till We have sent a messenger.
They say, “Had we listened or had we understood, we would not be among the inhabitants of the Blaze.”

Thus do they admit their sin; so away with the inhabitants of the Blaze!

On the Day of Judgment, all will see the truth. Those who denied it in this life will thus realize that they had been astray and admit the error of their ways, though it will be of no avail against the punishment of the Fire; as 4:18 says, Repentance is not accepted from those who do evil deeds till, when death confronts one of them, he says, “Truly now I repent,” nor from those who die as disbelievers. For those We have prepared a painful punishment. In a similar verse, the disbelievers even bear witness that they deserve Hellfire, saying, “Yea, indeed!” But the Word of punishment has come due for the disbelievers (39:71). The door of repentance is thus open until the moment of death. As a ḥadīth states, “God will accept the repentance of His servant until his death rattle”; see 4:17–18c.

Truly for those who fear their Lord unseen there shall be forgiveness and a great reward.

Cf. 36:11; 50:33. Some verses indicate that the fear of God is incumbent upon all believers, as in 3:175: So fear them not, but fear Me, if you are believers. To fear God unseen can be interpreted as a reference to worshipping God, Who is unseen, or as a reference to worshipping God in seclusion (IK, Q, Sh, Ṭs). The former interpretation sees one as worshipping God because one fears the punishment, even though one does not see the punishment. The latter implies a deeper level of devotion and reverence in which one fears to displease God because of the depth of one’s love for God, and thus refrains from any acts of disobedience both in public and in private. In a famous ḥadīth, one of seven categories of people said to be “shaded by God on the Day wherein there will be no shade other than His shade” is “a person who remembers God while alone and his eyes flow [with tears]” (IK). The great reward refers to Paradise (Q, Sh) and is also taken to imply that the delights of this world become small in the Eyes of those who fear God (Bḍ).

Keep your speech secret or proclaim it; truly He knows what lies within breasts.

According to Ibn ʿAbbās, this verse was revealed about the idolaters who would slander the Prophet and say to one another, “Lower your voices, lest Muhammad’s God hear you” (Q, W). As God overhears all, the Prophet advised his followers, “Whosoever believes in God and the Last Day, let him speak well or be silent.” That God knows what lies within breasts (3:119, 154; 5:7; 8:43; 11:5; 29:10; 31:23; 35:38; 39:7; 42:24; 57:6; 64:4) indicates that God is aware of the intentions behind all deeds and all inner thoughts. It does not, however, mean that one is accountable for all that one thinks unless that thought is put into action. In this vein, another ḥadīth states, “For my community God passes over that which arises within their souls, so long as they do not speak of it or act upon it.”

Does He Who created not know? He is the Subtle, the Aware.

This verse could also be read, “Does He not know whom He has created, though He is the Subtle, the Aware?” (IK, Q). The idea expressed both in this reading and in the translation is further explained by 50:16: We did indeed create man, and We know what his soul whispers to him; and We are nearer to him than his jugular vein. If read as a reference to the disbeliever’s ignorance of God, a third reading could be, “Does he not know who creates, though He is the Subtle, the Aware?” Of the several Divine Names that refer to God’s Omniscience, the Aware refers in particular to God’s Knowledge of things before they come into existence (Q). In contrast, the Subtle refers to God’s Knowledge of the minutest details. The Subtle renders al-Laṭīf, which can also mean “the Kind”; see 42:19c.
15 He is the One Who made the earth tractable for you; so travel the open roads thereof and eat of His provision. And unto Him is the Resurrection.

15 The beginning of this verse is similar to part of what Noah says to his people in 71:19–20: And God made the earth an open expanse for you, that you may travel spacious paths therein (see also 20:53; 21:31; 43:10). The command to travel or journey upon the earth and reflect upon the nature of the created order is a frequent refrain in the Quran. It is usually mentioned in relation to the transience of life (cf. 3:137; 6:11; 12:109; 16:36; 27:69; 30:9; 30:42; 35:44; 40:21, 82; 47:10), but is also mentioned in relation to understanding the nature of God’s creative power, as in 29:20: Journey upon the earth and observe how He originated creation. Then God shall bring the next genesis into being. Truly God is Powerful over all things. The exhortation to travel or journey is thus an exhortation to reflect and contemplate, so that the heart may open to the truth, as in 22:46: Have they not journeyed upon the earth, that they might have hearts by which to understand or ears by which to hear? Truly it is not the eyes that go blind, but it is hearts within breasts that go blind.

16 Do you feel secure that He Who is in Heaven will not cause the earth to engulf you while it churns?

16 Cf. 16:45: Do those who have plotted evil deeds feel secure that God will not cause the earth to engulf them, or that the punishment will not come upon them whence they are not aware? (see also 17:68–69). In 28:76–82 and 29:39–40 the story is told of Korah, who possessed great wealth, but was nonetheless engulfed by the earth as a punishment for oppressing the people.

17 Or do you feel secure that He Who is in Heaven will not unleash a torrent of stones upon you? Soon shall you know how My warning is.

17 Cf. 17:68. This verse is an allusion to the punishment sent upon the people of Lot (see 29:40; 54:34), and upon the masters of the elephant (105:1), who are said to have attempted to destroy the Ka‘bah just forty years before the beginning of Islam; see the introduction to Sūrah 105. The last phrase could also be read “how my warner is,” as a reference to the Prophet, meaning that the disbelievers will know his truthfulness and the punishment they deserve for denying him, as did those mentioned in vv. 8–11.

18 And indeed those before them denied. How, then, was the change I wrought!

18 How, then, was the change I wrought! (cf. 22:44; 34:45; 35:26) could also be rendered, “How, then, was My reproach!” Both translations indicate that the punishment will be as severe as what befell the generations before; see 22:42–45c.

19 Have they not considered the birds above them, spreading and folding up [their wings]? None holds them save the Compassionate. Truly He sees all things.

19 Cf. 16:79: Have they not considered the birds, made subservient, in midair? None holds them save God. Truly in that are signs for a people who believe. In this vein, a hadīth states, “Were you to trust in God as He merits, He would provide for you as He provides for the birds; they depart with empty stomachs and return full” (IK).

20 Who is it that will be a host for you, who may help you, apart from the Compassionate? The disbelievers are in naught but delusion.

20 The idolaters of Makkah are said to have claimed that their gods would protect them from the punishments like those mentioned in vv. 17–18 and elsewhere. But as 36:75 says, They cannot help them, though they be a host made ready for them. Satan deluded them into thinking that they would be helped, but he then admits to this delusion on the Day of Judgment, saying, Verily God made you the Promise of truth; and I made you a promise, but I failed you. And I had no authority over you, save that I called you, and you responded to me. So do not blame me, but blame yourselves. I cannot respond to your cries for help; nor can you respond to my cries for help (14:22).

21 Who is it that will provide for you if He withholds His provision? Nay, but they persist in insolence and aversion.

21 This is similar to 16:73: And they worship, apart from God, that which has no power over any provision that may come for them from the heavens and the earth, nor are they capable [of such]. That God is the provider of all sustenance is a constant theme of the Quran. Human beings are thus enjoined to recognize that nothing truly belongs to them and to spend in charity from what God has provided them.

22 Is one who walks with his face stooped down more guided, or one who walks upright upon a straight path?

22 One who walks with his face stooped down is seen as a metaphor for disbelievers, who do not look at the path ahead, to the right, or to the left in this life (Q, Ts) and thus do not consider the full reality of their state; rather, they are focused only upon petty desires and immediate concerns. It is also seen as a reference to the state of disbelievers in the Hereafter; as 25:34 says, they are those who are gathered upon their faces to Hell, their place is worse and they are further astray from the way. In contrast, believers are said to walk upright, so that they see and are not beset by afflictions that would cause them to go astray.

23 Say, “He it is Who brought you into being and endowed you with hearing, sight, and hearts. Little do you give thanks!”

23 Cf. 23:78; 32:9. The gifts of hearing, sight, and heart are mentioned together in several verses, and human beings are exhorted to reflect upon these gifts (see 16:78); in 17:36 it is said that these three gifts will be called to account, meaning that one will be held accountable for their proper or improper use. The ingratitude stems from an illness in human beings’ hearts, for truly it is not the eyes that go blind, but it is hearts within breasts that go blind (22:46).

24 Say, “He it is Who multiplied you upon the earth, and unto Him shall you be gathered.”

24 God has distributed human beings throughout the various regions of the earth and given them different languages, colors, shapes, appearances, and forms (IK). Other verses also call upon human beings to reflect upon the diversity of races and tribes (see 5:48; 49:13). And although God has spread human beings, with their different creeds and colors, throughout the habitable earth, He will gather them all together on a single plain on the Day of Judgment, which is also known as the Day of Gathering (64:9).

25 And they say, “When will this promise come to pass, if you are truthful?”

26 Say, “Knowledge lies with God alone, and I am only a clear warner.”

26 That knowledge of the end of time lies only with God is mentioned in several Quranic verses (see 7:187; 31:34; 33:63; 41:47; 43:85; 79:42–46) and in Biblical passages such as Mark 13:31–32: “Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away. But about that day or hour no one knows, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but only the Father.” In this vein, the Prophet is told to say, I am only a clear warner, in several verses (22:49; 29:50; 38:70; 46:9; also see 27:92), while in other verses God addresses the Prophet, Thou art but a warner (13:7; 79:45), and Thou art naught but a warner (35:23).

27 And when they see it close at hand, the faces of those who disbelieved shall be stricken, and it shall be said, “This is that for which you called.”

27 It refers to the Final Hour or to the Day of Judgment. Their faces will be stricken because the evils of that which they have earned will appear unto them, and that which they used to mock will beset them (39:48). That for which you called is the promise of Judgment that they questioned in v. 25 and that they sought to hasten (Ṭ). Several other passages indicate that those who do not believe in the punishment seek to hasten the Judgment; e.g., 42:18: Those who do not believe in it would seek to hasten it (see also 6:57–59; 10:48–51; 26:200–207; 27:71–72; 29:53–54; 46:22–24; 51:12–14). In this vein, it is said that Qatādah related v. 27 to 8:32: And [remember] when they said, “O God, if this be the truth from Thee, rain down stones upon us from the sky, or bring us a painful punishment” (Ṭ).

28 Say, “Have you considered whether God destroys me and those with me or has mercy upon us? Who will protect the disbelievers from a painful punishment?”

28 The command say at the beginning of each of the last three verses (vv. 28–30) is taken by most as a command to the Prophet. Here it is as if to say, “How is it that you seek to hasten the punishment, when I and those with me will not be destroyed, but none will save you from the punishment?” (Ṭ).
29 Say, “He is the Compassionate; we believe in Him and trust in Him, and you will soon know who is in manifest error.”

This verse is read by the vast majority of commentators as a declaration of faith contrasting the manner in which believers trust in the Compassionate to the manner in which disbelievers trust in the things of this world. The verse can also be understood as an answer to the previous verse, meaning that the only one who can protect the disbelievers is the Compassionate. It is said that when the Judgment comes, the disbelievers will realize that they had been wrong. Of this event 26:96–97 states, They will say, as they dispute with one another therein, “By God, indeed we were in manifest error.”

The translation you will soon know follows that of most schools of recitation, sataʿlamūn. But in the school of al-kisāʾi, it is read sayaʿlamūn, meaning “soon they will know,” in which case what the Prophet is commanded to say stops after the second instance of “Him.”

30 Say, “Have you considered? Were your water to vanish into the ground, then who would bring you flowing water?”

Flowing translates maʿīn, which is understood by some to mean “clear” or “sweet” (ِ‫ث‬). In many verses, that water is sent down from the sky is used as an allusion to blessings from God (e.g., 35:27; 39:21; 41:39); in others the manner in which God brings forth life through water is cited as a sign for those who believe (e.g., 2:164; 6:99; 7:57; 80:25–30); and 21:30 says, We made every living thing from water. God’s removal of water (cf. 56:68–70) can thus be taken as an allusion to God’s removing His blessings or the gift of life; for the place of water in the Quran, see also 21:30–31c; 24:45c.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
The Pen

al-Qalam

Al-Qalam is generally thought to be from the early Makkan period (JJ). It is reported that the early commentators Ibn ʿAbbās and al-Qatādah (d. 117/726) maintained that vv. 1–16, 34–47, and 51–52 are Makkan, while vv. 17–33 and 48–50 are Madinan (Āl, Q). It takes its name from the mention of the pen in the first verse.

The first section of the sūrah (vv. 1–10) contrasts the natures of those who believe and those who disbelieve, indicating that many of the disbelievers will not know their true nature until the Day of Resurrection and Judgment. This is followed by a brief passage (vv. 11–16) cautioning the believers not to follow people of base character simply because of their worldly wealth. The third section (vv. 17–34) provides the parable of the owners of the garden, who lost their harvest because of their miserliness. The fourth section (vv. 35–47) returns to the contrast of the believers and the disbelievers, indicating the vacuity of the disbelievers’ position through a series of rhetorical questions. This is followed by a brief reference to the Prophet Jonah as an example of one who repented and was forgiven in full (vv. 48–50), a reminder to be wary of those who oppose revelation (v. 51), and an affirmation that the Quran (or the Prophet) is a reminder for all (v. 52).

Nūn. By the pen and that which they inscribe, thou art not, by the blessing of thy Lord, possessed. Truly thine shall be a reward unceasing. And truly thou art of an exalted character. So thou wilt see and they will see which of you is afflicted. Truly thy Lord knows best those who stray from His way, and He knows best those who are rightly guided; so obey not the deniers. They wish that thou might compromise and that they might compromise. So obey not any vile oath-monger— slanderer spreading calumny, hinderer of good, a transgressing sinner, churlish, surly, and ignoble withal— simply because he possesses wealth and children. When Our signs are recited unto him he says, “Fables of those of old.” We shall brand him on the snout. Truly We tried them, just as We tried the owners of the garden who vowed that they would harvest its fruit in the morning. And they made no exception. Whereupon a visitation from your Lord came upon it while they slept, such that it became like a garden plucked. Then they called to one another in the morning, “Go early to your tillage if you would harvest.” So they set forth while whispering to one another, “Surely no indigent shall come to you therein today.” And they set out early, strong in their purpose. Then when they saw it, they said, “Surely, we are astray! Nay! we are deprived!” The most moderate of them said, “Did I not say to you, why do you not glorify?” They said, “Glory be to our Lord! Truly we were wrongdoers.” Then they turned to one another, reproaching each other, saying, “Oh, woe unto us! Truly we were rebellious. Perhaps our Lord will give us something better in its stead. Truly we beseech our Lord.” Such is the punishment; yet the punishment of the Hereafter is surely greater, if they but knew. Truly for the reverent there shall be Gardens of bliss in the presence of their Lord. Are We then to treat the submitters like the guilty? What ails you? How do you judge? Or do you have a book wherein you learn that you shall have therein whatsoever you choose? Or do you have oaths binding upon Us until the Day of Resurrection that you shall have whatever you ordain? 40 Ask them which of them shall vouch for that. 41 Or do they have partners? Then let them bring their partners if they are truthful. 42 On the Day when the shank is laid bare and they are called to prostrate, yet are not able, 43 their eyes humbled, abasement shall overcome them; for they had indeed been called to prostrate while they were yet sound. 44 So leave Me with those who deny this discourse. We shall lead them on little by little, whence they know not. 45 And I shall grant them respite; truly My scheme is firm. 46 Or dost thou ask a reward of them, such that they are burdened with debt? 47 Or do they possess the Unseen, such that they write it down? 48 So be patient with thy Lord’s Judgment and be not like the companion of the fish, who cried out while choking with anguish. 49 Had not the blessing from his Lord reached him, he would surely have been cast upon the barren shore still blameworthy. 50 But his Lord chose him and made him among the righteous. 51 Indeed, those who disbelieve would well-nigh smite thee down with their glances when they hear the Reminder, saying, “Surely, he is possessed.” 52 Yet it is naught but a reminder for the worlds.
Commentary

Nūn. By the pen and that which they inscribe,

1 Nūn is the Arabic letter n and is among the separated letters (al-muqaṭṭaʾāt) at the beginning of several sūrahāt, whose meaning is not specified outwardly and, according to many, is known only to God (IK). This is the earliest sūrah in the chronological order of revelation in which the separated letters appear. Nūn is also an Arabic word for “fish”; some commentators thus relate it to an old Arab myth that holds that the earth is upon the back of a mythical fish (Bg, Q, Ṭ, Z).

In light of its cup-shaped form in Arabic script (ة), others say it refers to the “inkwell” from which the pen draws the ink with which it inscribes (Bg, Z). In Islamic metaphysics, the Pen is often taken as a symbol for the Divine Intellect or Logos, through which God brought all things into being. What is “written” by the Pen then means existiation of beings in the created order, and the nūn is seen to symbolize the reservoir that contains all the possibilities that are manifested in creation. In this regard, a famous ḥadīth qudsī states, “The first thing God created was the Pen. Then he said to it, ‘Write!’ It responded, ‘What shall I write?’ He said, ‘Write the decree (al-qadar) of what will be until the Hour is come’” (AH, Bg, IK, Q, Ṭ).

Here the nūn is also seen as an allusion to one of the Divine Names, because it points to the n (nūn) at the end of al-Raḥmān (“the Compassionate”) or at the beginning of al-Nūr (“the Light”) or al-Nāṣir (“the Helper”; Bg, Q). Others see it as a reference to God’s helping the believers (naṣr al-muʾminīn; Bg, Q), a phrase that occurs in 30:47. Some attribute to the Prophet the saying: “Nūn is a tablet of light” (Āl, IK, Q).

The pronoun they in that which they inscribe may be seen as a reference to the angels who record all human deeds (Bg, IK, JJ, Q); see 43:80; 50:17–18c; 80:15–16; 82:10–12; 86:4. According to al-Qurtubī, pens are of three principal types: the one that God commanded to write all that would be until the Day of Resurrection; those with which the angels record the deeds of human beings (see 18:49c); and those with which human beings write (Q on 96:4–5).

thou art not, by the blessing of thy Lord, possessed.

The blessing of thy Lord may be a reference to prophethood (Bg), and the verse’s assertion that the Prophet is not possessed can be seen as a direct response to the derogatory statement of the disbelievers in 15:6–7: O you unto whom the Reminder has been sent down, truly you are possessed. Why do you not bring us the angels, if you are among the truthful? (Bg, Q).

Truly thine shall be a reward unceasing.

A reward unceasing (cf. 41:8; 84:25; 95:6) indicates a reward that comes directly from God and is never cut off, as opposed to the rewards of this world, whose fleeting nature is discussed in the parable in vv. 17–34. In this context, it is understood as a reference to the reward the Prophet receives for carrying the burden of prophethood (Q).

And truly thou art of an exalted character.

This is among the most famous verses of the Quran. Some interpret exalted character as a descriptor of the religion of Islam (IK, Ṭ), but most associate it with the Prophet himself; his character is said to be exalted because he had no aspiration other than God (Q). The Prophet’s wife Āʾishah was once asked about the Prophet’s character and responded, “Do you not read the Quran? . . . His character was the Quran” (Āl, Bg, IK, Q, Z). Character translates khuluq, which is closely related to the primary Quranic word for “creation” (khalq). In this vein, it is reported that the Prophet used to pray, “O God you have beautified my created form (khalqī), beautify my character (khuluqī).” Another hadith states, “I was only sent to perfect the noble traits of character” (Bg, Q). The Prophet is also reported to have enjoined good character traits upon his followers, saying, “The best of you are those who are best in character traits” (Bg), and, “Reverence God wherever you may be; follow a bad deed with a good deed that will efface it; and comport with the people with good character” (Q).
Regarding the importance of good character for the Hereafter, he is reported to have said, “What admits people most into Paradise is beauty of character” (Bg, Q), and “Nothing is placed on the scales of a believer that is weightier than beauty of character; and one who has beauty of character will reach thereby the degree of one who prays and fasts” (Bg, Q). More generally, this verse can be understood to mean that those with beautiful character traits are far from the state of being possessed referred to in verse 2 (Āl).

5 So thou wilt see and they will see which of you is afflicted.

5–6 When the punishment comes upon the disbelievers, they will see which of the two parties, the believers or the disbelievers, has been tried with possession or madness (Bg, JJ, Z) or which of the two is to be tried (Bg, Z).

7 Truly thy Lord knows best those who stray from His way, and He knows best those who are rightly guided;

7 This verse is repeated with minor variation in 6:117 and 53:30 (see also 28:85). Here it indicates that God knows best which of the two parties is astray and afflicted and which is guided, as both parties claimed.

8 so obey not the deniers.

8 The deniers refers to the Makkan disbelievers who were bidding the Prophet and his followers to follow the religion of their forefathers rather than the religion revealed to the Prophet.
9 They wish that thou might compromise and that they might compromise.

9 Compromise translates the verb dahana, which can mean both “to demean” and “to deny” or “to take something lightly.” This verse can be read to mean either that the disbelievers will compromise when the Prophet and his followers compromise or that the disbelievers are already compromising; so they want the believers to compromise too (Z). According to the first reading, it means they want believers to be willing to give up part of their religion, so that they might then give up part of theirs, or that the believers worship their gods for a while and then they worship the believers’ God for a while (Bg). According to the second reading, it means that they are disbelievers; so they wish for believers to become disbelievers as well (Bg).

10 So obey not any vile oath-monger—

10–16 Most commentators agree that these verses refer to al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah, a leader among the Quraysh and one of the Prophet’s staunchest opponents (Z). Others propose that it may refer to his detractors in general, such as Abū Jahl, al-Aswad ibn ʿAbd al-Yahūth, and al-Akhnas ibn Shariq (Z).

10 Vile oath-monger refers to one given to frequent swearing by falsehood (JJ) or one who swears falsely by God’s Name (IK). Even in pre-Islamic Arabia it was considered a vice to be immoderate in taking oaths. Regarding the Quranic position on taking oaths, see 5:89c.

11 slanderer spreading calumny,

11 This verse is said to refer to one who spreads gossip in order to create discord and turn people against one another (Z). Several ḥādīth state that those who spread calumny (namīmah), which can also mean “gossip,” will not enter Paradise (IK); regarding the vices of calumny and backbiting, see 49:12c.
hinderer of good, a transgressing sinner,

12  Hinderer of good refers either to one who is miserly and encourages miserliness or to one who bars the way to Islam (Z).

churlish, surly, and ignoble withal—

13  Ignoble translates zanīm, which indicates one who is born illegitimately (Z). It may also be related to the word zanamah, which denotes the fleshy skin hanging below the ears of a goat. As these protuberances serve no apparent function, the word zanīm came to signify something that serves no positive function (Tāj al-ʿarūs).

14  This verse alludes to the Quranic teaching that one should not put stock in worldly wealth and outward appearances, but in those things that reflect the nature of the heart, for the Day of Judgment is the Day when neither wealth nor children avail, save for him who comes to God with a sound heart (26:88–89). For other references to this broad Quranic theme, see 3:10, 14, 116; 8:28; 9:24, 55, 69, 85; 18:39–40, 46; 23:55–56; 34:35–37; 60:3; 63:9; 64:14–15; 71:21. Alternately, vv. 14–15 can be read, “Is it because he possesses wealth and children that when Our signs are read to him he says, ‘Fables of those of old’?” (JJ, Z).

When Our signs are recited unto him he says, “Fables of those of old.”
15 Cf. 83:13. Referring to the Prophet’s revelations as fables of those of old was a common way for the disbelievers to dismiss the message and is repeated in eight other verses (6:25; 8:31; 16:83; 23:83; 25:5; 27:68; 46:17; 83:13).

16 We shall brand him on the snout.

16 Most commentators take this to be an idiomatic expression meaning, “We will stigmatize him with indelible disgrace” (Iṣ). Some believe that this promise was fulfilled when al-Walīd ibn al-Mughirah’s nose was cut off at the Battle of Badr (JJ). It could also mean that God will make his true nature apparent to all, so that he cannot hide it, as if he had been branded on the nose (IK, Ṭ), an interpretation that accords with 55:41, the guilty shall be known by their marks.

17 Truly We tried them, just as We tried the owners of the garden who vowed that they would harvest its fruit in the morning.

17–34 Most commentators maintain that these verses were revealed in Madinah and that the story refers to three either Christian or Jewish brothers in Yemen who had inherited a fertile garden from their father. Their father’s custom had been to leave some produce behind for the poor whenever he harvested. But when he died, his sons felt that, given the demands of their large family, it would no longer be prudent to leave the produce for the poor and thus set out to harvest the land when no one would know.

18 And they made no exception.

18 Made no exception is taken to indicate that they did not say, “If God wills” (Bg, IK, Z) and thus trusted in themselves rather than in God (R). It could also be a reference to the harvest, indicating that they left no portion for the poor (R).
Whereupon a visitation from your Lord came upon it while they slept, such that it became like a garden plucked.

20 Like a garden plucked translates kaʾl-ṣarīm, which can also mean “like the blackness of night” (IK, JJ). The Prophet reportedly said, “Avoid sins of disobedience. Verily, the servant commits sins, and the sustenance which he has is taken from him,” and then he recited, Such that it became like a garden plucked (AH, IK).

Then they called to one another in the morning,

21 “Go early to your tillage if you would harvest.”

So they set forth while whispering to one another,

22 “Surely no indigent shall come to you therein today.”

21–24 These verses represent a violation of ancient Near Eastern custom in which the poor are allowed to glean a share of the harvest and of the Quranic injunction to pay the poor the portion of a harvest that is due immediately: Eat of their fruit when they grow, and pay the due thereof on the day of its harvest (6:141).

And they set out early, strong in their purpose.
25 Strong in their purpose indicates that the brothers were determined or that they overestimated their own abilities, thinking that they could control who would get this produce, though in fact only God determines (JJ).

26 Then when they saw it, they said, “Surely, we are astray!”

26 Here we are astray indicates that they thought they had arrived at the wrong place (IK, JJ) or that they recognized the error of their ways. It can also be seen as an allusion to the distinction between the believers and the disbelievers mentioned in vv. 5–7, as those who oppose the Prophet Muhammad believe they are guided, but will eventually come to realize that they were astray. Like the owners of the garden mentioned here, the disbelievers will initially think that there has been some mistake, but will then realize that the recompense they receive on the Day of Judgment is what they had earned.

27 Nay! we are deprived!”

27 This verse is similar to 56:67; it reflects the broader application of this story to all manner of harvesting, as in 56:63–66: Have you considered what you reap? Is it you who sow it or are We the sowers? Had We willed, We would have turned it to chaff, such that you would remain bitterly jesting, [saying] “Truly we have suffered loss.” In both instances, the verse could also be rendered, “Nay! We are rendered destitute.”

28 The most moderate of them said, “Did I not say to you, why do you not glorify?”

28 The most moderate could also be taken to indicate the most equitable or most just among them (IK). Why do you not glorify? means, “Why do you not thank God and attribute these blessings to Him rather than to yourselves?”
They said, “Glory be to our Lord! Truly we were wrongdoers.”

They were wrongdoers for preventing the poor from receiving their due.

Then they turned to one another, reproaching each other,

The owners of the garden reproached one another for their failure to help the poor. Such mutual recriminations are part of the torment that afflicts wrongdoers in both this life and the next. In several Quranic passages, wrongdoers attempt to blame Satan, their forefathers, and even God for their ignorance or misguidance.

saying, “Oh, woe unto us! Truly we were rebellious.

Perhaps our Lord will give us something better in its stead. Truly we beseech our Lord.”

Woe unto us translates waylanā. Wayl is an exclamation of spiritual regret found elsewhere in the Quran (see 2:79c; 18:49; 21:14, 47, 97; 25:28; 36:52; 37:20), often when the certainty of Divine Punishment is realized. Having realized the error of their ways and repented, they then became aware that God is able to provide them with something better than anything they could have produced with their own hands. It is reported that they were indeed given a better garden in place of the one that they had lost (Bg, IK, JJ), which can be understood as a reference to a garden in this world or as an allusion to the Garden in the Hereafter.

Such is the punishment; yet the punishment of the Hereafter is surely greater, if they but knew.

33 Just as the owners of the garden were punished for failing to give some portion of their harvest to the poor, so too will the disbelievers be punished for their miserliness. That the punishment of the Hereafter is surely greater (cf. 39:26) is a reminder to the disbelievers that what befalls them in the Hereafter is greater than the disgrace they will encounter in this life.

34 Truly for the reverent there shall be Gardens of bliss in the presence of their Lord.

34 Gardens of bliss (naʿīm) indicates that the blessing (tanaʿʿum) is pure and unadulterated unlike the blessings garnered from the gardens of this world (Q, R). It is reported that when v. 34 was revealed, the disbelievers boasted to the Muslims that the favors they enjoyed in this world would continue in the next (Q, R). V. 35 was then revealed as a direct response.

35–36 Submitters translates muslimīn (“Muslims”) and is most likely the first use of the word “Muslim” in the chronological order of revelation. This verse is similar to 38:28: Or shall We make those who believe and perform righteous deeds like those who work corruption upon the earth? Or shall We make the reverent like the profligate? The rhetorical question in both verses reflects the one posed and answered in 32:18: Is one who believes like one who is iniquitous? They are not equal. Like v. 14, such verses reflect a broader Quranic theme regarding the differences between outward appearances and inward realities, which many human beings are unable to discern, as they judge by human standards instead of Divine principles. Other verses speak of the differences between the blind and those who see, as in 35:19: Not equal are the blind and the seeing; and 40:58: And the blind and the seer are not equal; nor are those who believe and perform righteous deeds and the evildoer. And in other verses, the comparison is related to knowledge: Are those who know and those who do not know equal? Only possessors of intellect reflect (39:9).

37 Or do you have a book wherein you learn that you shall have therein whatsoever you choose?

37–38 This verse asks, “Do they have a revealed scripture that they are able to study and use as a source of judgment?” (IK). This challenge is similar to that posed in 37:156–57, where the disbelievers are challenged regarding their belief in deities as the offspring of God: Or have you a manifest authority? Bring your Book, then, if you are truthful (cf. 34:44; 35:40; 43:21; 46:4). V. 37 could be read with a stop before v. 38. In which case the text would read, “Or do you have a book wherein you learn? Truly in it you find whatsoever you choose.” (Q).

Therein means in the Hereafter or, more specifically, Paradise. This is an indication that, even among those who have a book from God, there are some who read it to find whatever judgment they wish to find rather than the rulings of God, as in 2:78: And among them are the illiterate who know nothing of the Book but hearsay, and they only conjecture (see also 5:13c). It also implies that in choosing to judge by their laws rather than God’s laws, they have chosen the punishment of the Hereafter, as in 2:85: Do you, then, believe in part of the Book and disbelieve in part? And what is the recompense of those who do so but disgrace in the life of this world? And on the Day of Resurrection they shall be consigned to the most terrible punishment. And God is not heedless of what you do.

39 Or do you have oaths binding upon Us until the Day of Resurrection that you shall have whatever you ordain?

39 This verse asks, “Do you have a promise from God that things shall be as you wish and desire, so that you can reject the revelation of the Quran and the prophethood of Muhammad?” (see also 54:43).

40 Ask them which of them shall vouch for that.

40 Vouch for means “say they have received,” and what the disbelievers say they have received is thought to be either a revelation as implied in vv. 37–38, a promise from God as implied in v. 39, or a reward better than that of the believers (JJ).

41 Or do they have partners? Then let them bring their partners if they are truthful.

41 Partners may imply idols and other deities that they ascribe as partners to God or partners who will guarantee their claim (JJ). It may also indicate wise people (‘uqalāʾ) among them who they believe are able to substantiate their claims (R, Z). In 7:195, which was most likely revealed after this verse, the Prophet is enjoined to make a more direct challenge to the disbelievers: Say, “Call upon your partners, then scheme against me, and grant me no respite.” In this same vein, 28:64 says, It will be said, “Call upon your partners.” So they will call upon them, but they will not answer them. And they will see the punishment—if only they had been rightly guided!

42 On the Day when the shank is laid bare and they are called to prostrate, yet are not able,

42 The shank is laid bare is an idiomatic expression indicating something very serious and severe (Q, Sh). When a person wearing traditional Arab clothing engages in a strenuous endeavor (and sometimes in battle), he begins by rolling up his garment in such a fashion that his shank is exposed; hence the idiomatic Arabic phrase, “The war broke out upon the shank,” meaning “The war broke out with vehemence” (JJ, Sh). Some exegetes say that in this verse it is God Who exposes His own Shank to signal the beginning of the judgment process. In this vein, a variant reading is “We lay bare the shank” (nukshitū ʿan sāq), meaning God (Q). Others say the shank is laid bare refers to the secrets that will be unveiled. In relation to this verse, a ḥadīth states, “God will lay bare His Shank and then the believers, men and women, will prostrate before Him; and there will remain those who in this world used to prostrate themselves only in order to be seen and heard by others. Such a one will try to prostrate, but his back will be transformed into a stiff plate” (Āl, IK). In a third variant, this verse is read, “It lays bared the shank” (takshitū ʿan sāq), meaning that the Resurrection exposes great severities (Q).

their eyes humbled, abasement shall overcome them; for they had indeed been called to prostrate while they were yet sound.

Cf. 70:44. Some Arabs had objected that the position required for prostration, on one’s knees with one’s forehead on the ground, was humiliating, but in the Hereafter the disbelievers will find much greater humiliation and be unable to prostrate, as mentioned in v. 42. Some interpret the references to prostration in both vv. 42–43 as references to prostrating for prayer in this world, while others understand v. 42 as a reference to prostration on the Day of Judgment and v. 43 as a reference to those who did not heed the call to prostration, meaning to prayer, in this world (Q, Sh). According to the latter interpretation the disbelievers are not able to prostrate when they are called on the Day of Judgment (v. 42) because they did not prostrate when called during the life of this world (v. 43; Sh).

So leave Me with those who deny this discourse. We shall lead them on little by little, whence they know not.

This discourse indicates the Quran (JJ, Q). The implication is that the deniers’ punishment should be left to God. We shall lead them on little by little, whence they know not (cf. 7:182–83) indicates that they fall gradually into deception and delusion, continuing to commit even greater sins because they think their worldly success is an indication of favor with God. This theme is found in several other passages, most notably 23:54–56: So leave them in their heedlessness for a time. Do they reckon that, [on account of] the wealth and the children that We have provided them, We hasten unto good for them? Nay, but they are unaware! (see also 6:44). According to a ḥadīth, the Prophet said, “God grants the wrongdoer respite, but when He seizes him, there is no escape.” Then he recited: Such is the seizing of thy Lord when He seizes the towns while they are doing wrong. Surely His seizing is painful, severe (11:102; IK).

45 And I shall grant them respite; truly My scheme is firm.

45 Cf. 7:183. From a Quranic perspective, God grants respite to the disbelievers and thus they suppose that they have avoided or forestalled Divine Punishment; yet in fact they are moving little by little toward a gruesome fate, and if they do not repent, they will commit more sins for which they will be taken to account. This is stated most directly in 3:178: And let not those who disbelieve suppose that the respite We grant them is good for them. We only grant them respite that they may increase in sin, and theirs shall be a humiliating punishment (see 71:4c; 35:45c).

46 Or dost thou ask a reward of them, such that they are burdened with debt?

47 Or do they possess the Unseen, such that they write it down?

46–47 These verses are repeated in 52:40–41. See also 23:72: Dost thou ask any recompense of them? For thy Lord’s recompense is better, and He is the best of providers. The rhetorical question in v. 46 is answered by the Quran itself in 12:104: And thou askest of them no reward for it; it is naught but a reminder for the worlds. V. 47 is most likely the first mention of the Unseen in the chronological order of revelation; regarding the Unseen, see 2:3c. Here the disbelievers are asked whether they have direct access to the Preserved Tablet (85:22), which would make what they say of equal status to the revelation of the Quran (JJ, Sh). This line of questioning is similar to that in 52:37–38: Do they possess the treasuries of your Lord? Or are they in control? Or do they have a ladder whereby they listen? Then let their listener bring a clear warrant. This verse reflects the broader Quranic theme of humanity’s illusions of self-sufficiency vis-à-vis the Divine, as in 96:6–7: Nay, truly man is rebellious in that he considers himself beyond need.

48 So be patient with thy Lord’s Judgment and be not like the companion of the fish, who cried out while choking with anguish.

49 Had not the blessing from his Lord reached him, he would surely have been cast upon the barren shore still blameworthy.

50 But his Lord chose him and made him among the righteous.

48–50 These verses refer to the prophet Jonah, who is said to have fled from the task entrusted to him by God (37:140), but to have repented and been forgiven (cf. 21:87–88; 37:139–48). Still blameworthy indicates that, had not the blessing from his Lord reached him, he would have died in a state of sin. His Lord chose him for prophethood and made him among the righteous, meaning the prophets (JJ). For the Quranic account of Jonah, see 37:139–48.

51 It is said that the Quraysh were trying to attack the Prophet through the use of the evil eye, but that this verse was revealed as a means of protection (Q). According to one report, “There was a man among the Arabs who used to abstain from food for two or three days and then raise part of his tent as the cattle passed by and say, ‘There are no grazing camels or sheep today better than these,’ and the cattle would not proceed far before some of them would fall dead. The disbelievers asked this man to give the evil eye to the Messenger of God, but God protected His Prophet and revealed this verse” (Q, W). Although some attribute the evil eye, which afflicts people with misfortune through envy and jealousy, to legend, the Prophet is reported to have said, “Seek refuge in God, for the [evil] eye is real” (IK). In this vein, he enjoined his Companions, “If one of you sees something of his brother, or himself, or his wealth that he admires, then glorify God, for the [evil] eye is real” (IK). In general the last two sūrah of the Quran, known as “The Two Protectors” (al-muʿawwidhatān), are used by Muslims to this day for protection from many evils, including the evil eye and the casting of spells.

52 Yet it is naught but a reminder for the worlds.

52 A reminder refers to the Quran, as in 16:44: And We have sent down the Reminder unto thee that thou mightest clarify for mankind that which has been sent down unto them, that haply they may reflect (see also 15:9). To remind people of God is considered a primary function of all revelation; hence the Torah is also referred to as a reminder in 40:54. Alternately, this verse could be interpreted as a reference to the Prophet and translated, “He is naught but a reminder for the worlds.” The Prophet is referred to directly as a reminder in 65:10–11.
A late Makkan surah, al-Ḥāqqah is generally believed to have been revealed shortly after Sūrah 67, al-Mulk. It takes its name from the mention of the Undeniable Reality in the first three verses, a descriptive name for the Day of Judgment. This surah can be seen as connected to the previous surah both because the later verses provide a more complete response to the charge that the Prophet was possessed (68:2, 51) and because it provides a more complete description of the Day of Resurrection and Judgment, to which allusion is made throughout the previous surah.

The surah begins with a warning to avoid the fate of those who had denied religion before, using both Arabian tribes and Old Testament references as examples (vv. 1–12). The next section (vv. 13–17) describes some aspects of the Day of Judgment, followed by a contrast between those who receive the book of their deeds in the right hand and those who receive it in the left hand (vv. 18–37). As often happens in the Quran, this contrast between those who are believed to be destined for Heaven and those who are believed to be destined for Hell is followed by a reaffirmation of the revealed nature of the Quran (vv. 38–52).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful
The Undeniable Reality!

And what shall apprise thee of the Undeniable Reality? Thamūd and ṣĀd denied the calamity. As for Thamūd, they were destroyed by the overwhelming. And as for ṣĀd, they were destroyed by a howling, raging wind. He imposed it upon them for seven nights and eight days consecutively, so that thou might see the people felled as if they were hollowed palm trunks. So dost thou see any remnant of them? And Pharaoh and those before him, and those subverted brought iniquity. They disobeyed the messenger of their Lord, and He seized them with a devastating blow. Truly when the waters overflowed, We carried you upon the ship, that We might make it a reminder for you, and that attentive ears might take heed. Then when a single blast is blown in the trumpet and the earth and mountains are borne away and ground up in a single grinding, on that Day the Event shall befall, the sky shall be rent asunder; for that Day it shall be frail. And the angels shall be at its sides; that Day eight shall carry the Throne of thy Lord above them. That Day you shall be exposed; no secret of yours shall be hidden. As for one who is given his book in his right hand, he will say, “Here, read my book. Truly I knew for certain that I would meet my reckoning.” So he shall enjoy a life contenting, in a lofty Garden with low-hanging clusters. Eat and drink in enjoyment for that which you did in the past in days gone by. And as for one who is given his book in his left hand, he will say, “Would that I had not been given my book. And did not know of my reckoning. Would that it were the final end. My wealth availed me not. My power has passed from me.” Take him and shackle him. Then cast him in Hellfire. Then put him in a chain whose length is seventy cubits. Truly he did not believe in God the Magnificent, and did not urge feeding the indigent. So today he has no loyal friend here, nor food, save filth, which none eat, save the iniquitous. So I swear by what you see and by what you see not, 40) truly it is the speech of a noble messenger, 41) and not the speech of a poet. Little do you believe! 42) Nor is it the speech of a soothsayer.
Little do you reflect! 43) It is a revelation from the Lord of the worlds.
44) Had he ascribed any statements to Us, 45) We would have taken him by the right hand. 46) Then We would have severed his life vein.
47) And none among you could have shielded him from it. 48) Truly it is a reminder for the reverent. 49) And truly We know that among you are those who deny. 50) It is a source of regret indeed for the disbelievers. 51) It is indeed the truth of certainty. 52) So glorify the

Commentary

1 The Undeniable Reality!

2 What is the Undeniable Reality?

3 And what shall apprise thee of the Undeniable Reality?

1–3 Undeniable Reality translates ḥāqqah, which is an emphatic form of ḥaqq, meaning “truth” or “reality.” In this context ḥāqqah conveys the sense of the overwhelming and inevitable reality or truth that none can avoid. All commentators agree that the Undeniable Reality is a reference to the Day of Resurrection and Judgment, but they differ as to which aspect of that Day it refers (R). Some say it indicates that all that was rejected by disbelievers in this life will be realized and made evident (JJ) or that everyone will see the true nature of their deeds, as in 67:11: Thus do they admit their sin. The repetition of the question in vv. 2–3, which is similar to that in 101:2–3, is meant to emphasize that it is beyond mere rational comprehension.

4 Thamūd and Ād denied the calamity.

4 What is denied is the Day of Judgment. For the meaning of the calamity, see 101:1–3c. The triple affirmation of the Undeniable Reality followed by the mention of the pre-Islamic Arabian tribes Ād and Thamūd and what befell them as a consequence of rejecting their prophets serves as an admonition for the disbelievers of Makkah, to whom the stories of these tribes would have been familiar. For the story of the tribe of Thamūd, who rejected the Prophet Ṣāliḥ, see 7:73–79; 11:61–68; 26:141–58; 54:23–31. For the story of the tribe of Ād, whose prosperity led to their decadence and who rejected the Prophet Hūd, see 7:65–72; 11:50–60; 41:15–16.

As for Thamūd, they were destroyed by the overwhelming.

Overwhelming translates ṭāghiyah, which implies something that reaches the utmost severity, and can be taken to indicate one of the calamities that afflicted Thamūd: a cry (11:67; 54:31), an earthquake (7:78), or a thunderbolt (41:13; 51:44). It could also mean “rebellion” or “upheaval” (ṭughyān; R). The reference to some form of calamity indicates the manner in which the people of Thamūd were destroyed, while the reference to “rebellion” indicates that they were destroyed by their own sinfulness, though the two are not mutually exclusive. Finally, ṭāghiyah could mean “those who overwhelmed or oppressed,” indicating that the tribe of Thamūd was destroyed because they allowed themselves to be persuaded, or “overwhelmed,” by a powerful minority or a single individual who enjoined them to hamstring the she-camel of God (91:13) and leave her for dead (see 54:23–30; R).

And as for ād, they were destroyed by a howling, raging wind.

Howling translates ṣarṣar, which indicates either a wind that makes a severe noise or a wind so cold that it feels as if it burns (R). In this context, some say that it pierced through to their hearts (IK). Raging translates ʿātiyah, which indicates both that it overcame the people in such a manner that they could find no cover and that it was the utmost in strength and severity (R). The tribe of ād is also reported to have been destroyed by a howling wind in 41:16 and 54:19 and by the barren wind in 51:41.

He imposed it upon them for seven nights and eight days consecutively, so that thou might see the people felled as if they were hollowed palm trunks.

So dost thou see any remnant of them?

Consecutively translates ḥusūm, which most likely indicates “seven days and eight nights in a row,” but could also indicate one calamity following after another. Ḥusūm derives from the verb hasama, meaning “to sever.” Thus it is also interpreted to mean a wind that severs all good and demolishes all blessings (R). The people of Ād are also compared to felled palm trees in 54:20, where the howling wind is said to tear out people as if they were uprooted palm trunks.

9 And Pharaoh and those before him, and those subverted brought iniquity.

10 They disobeyed the messenger of their Lord, and He seized them with a devastating blow.

9–10 These verses mark a shift from the discussion of the afflictions that befell the disbelievers from pre-Islamic Arabian tribes to those who disbelieved in prophets of the Judeo-Christian tradition. Those before him indicates the generations before Pharaoh; if read with a different voweling (wa man qibalahu), however, it could be translated “those who were with him,” meaning those who followed Pharaoh (IK, R). Those subverted is most likely an allusion to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, to whom Lot had been sent as a messenger (R, T, Z); see 7:80–84; 11:77–83. The messenger of their Lord could refer to Moses, Lot, or both (R). In this context, some take messenger (rusūl) to mean “message” (risālah; Q), in which case the verse may refer to any of the disbelieving peoples mentioned in this sūrah. Devastating translates rābiyah, which indicates increase, suggesting either a punishment that surpasses that of all others (Q, R) or one that is devastating in this world but becomes more severe in the Hereafter, as with those who disbelieved in Noah: They were drowned, then made to enter a Fire (71:25; R).

11 Truly when the waters overflowed, We carried you upon the ship, 12 that We might make it a reminder for you, and that attentive ears might take heed.

11–12 These verses are taken as an allusion to Noah’s Ark, regarding which, see 7:64c. We carried you means We carried your forefathers while you were still in their loins (JJ, Q, R), as in 36:41: And a sign unto them is that We carried their progeny in the full-laden ark (IK). The it in make it a reminder in v. 12 can be taken as a reference to the ship in v. 11 or to the events of the Day of Resurrection and Judgment that this sūrah describes. V. 12 is similar to 50:37: Truly in that is a reminder for whosoever has a heart, or gives ear as witness. According to one account, the Prophet said to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, “God has commanded me to draw you closer to me and not exclude you, and that I teach you so that you understand; and God has taken it upon Himself that you understand,” and then this verse was revealed (W). According to a more widespread account, when this verse was revealed, the Prophet said, “I asked my Lord that He make it the ear of ʿAlī,” meaning make ʿAlī’s ear one that takes heed; and ʿAlī is reported to have said, “I never heard anything from the Messenger of God but that I remembered it” (AH, IK, Q, R, Ṭ).

13 Then when a single blast is blown in the trumpet

13 Here the single blast of the trumpet is understood by most commentators to be the first blast blown by the Archangel Seraphiel (Isrāfīl), which will herald the end of the world (Bḍ, Q, R, Ṭ), and by some to be the second blast, which will herald the Day of Judgment and Resurrection (IK, JJ; see also 6:73; 18:99; 20:102; 23:101; 27:87; 36:51; 39:68; 50:20; 74:8; 78:18). Regarding the two trumpet blasts, see 39:68c; 78:18c.

14 and the earth and mountains are borne away and ground up in a single grinding,

14 Several verses indicate that the mountains will be dispatched on the Day of Judgment, as in 27:88: And thou seest the mountains that thou dost suppose are solid, pass away like clouds—the work of God, Who perfects all things; see also 18:47; 52:10; 70:8–9; 73:14; 78:20; 81:3; 89:21; 101:5.

15 on that Day the Event shall befall,

15 The Event is the end of the world, which leads to the Day of Resurrection; see 56:1–2c.

16 the sky shall be rent asunder; for that Day it shall be frail.

16 The sky shall be rent asunder is repeated in 55:37; 73:18; 84:1; see also 82:1; 25:25; and 42:5, which refers to the heavens being rent asunder. This phrase refers to the sky, the heavens, or both. The sky being opened as if it were gates (78:19) is considered one of the marks of the Day of Judgment.

17 And the angels shall be at its sides; that Day eight shall carry the Throne of thy Lord above them.

17 At its sides could also mean “at its ends.” Based upon several ḥadīth, most take eight as a reference to eight angels who carry the Throne (IK, Ṭ; cf. 40:7); others say it could mean eight or eight thousand and could refer to individuals or rows (R, Z). According to a ḥadīth, “Today those carrying the throne are four, but when the Day of Resurrection comes, God supports them with four more; so they will be eight” (Bḍ, Q, R, Sy). The number eight has a symbolic value in Islamic geometry, as the octagon forms the transition from the square, which is seen to represent the earth, to the circle of the dome, which represents Heaven. In this sense, it is significant that this passage moves progressively from the lowest level, earth in v. 14, to the highest level, the Heaven of the archangels, in v. 17.

18 You shall be exposed translates tuʿradūn, which could also be rendered “you shall be brought forth,” as in 11:18: And who does greater wrong than one who fabricates a lie against God? It is they who will be brought before their Lord (yuʿradū ʿalā rabbihim). In this vein, a ḥadīth states, “The people are brought forth on the Day of Resurrection for three arraignments (ʿardāt): during the first two arraignments, they will argue and make excuses; at the third, the scrolls will be cast into their hands; so some will take with their right hand and others will take with their left” (IK, Q, R, Ṭ). No secret of yours shall be hidden indicates either that nothing is hidden from God, as in 40:16, the Day when they come forth with naught concerning them hidden from God, or that the inner states and thoughts of human beings will now be known, and the result will be that the believers will rejoice and the disbelievers will grieve (R). This phrase can also be translated, “None among you shall be hidden” (Q), meaning that no human being can evade God’s Judgment.

19 As for one who is given his book in his right hand, he will say, “Here, read my book.

19–29 For the symbolic distinction between right and left, see 56:8–9c; for the meaning of the book presented on the Day of Judgment in which one’s deeds are recorded, see 17:71; 18:49; 84:7. Also see 56:27, 38, where the righteous are referred to as the companions of the right.

20 Truly I knew for certain that I would meet my reckoning.”

19–20 Those who receive their book in the right hand have spent their life in this world conscious that the Day of Judgment would come and have prepared for it accordingly. When asked, “Who are the most intelligent of believers?” the Prophet replied, “The most frequent in recalling death, and the best prepared for what follows it; they are the most intelligent.” Here is in the second person plural, indicating that his words are addressed to a group. In other readings, it is the second person singular (Q). I knew for certain translates ẓanantu, a word that in some contexts indicates doubt. If read in this manner, the verse would indicate that one was not entirely certain of the final outcome, but nonetheless followed the commands of God and the Prophet and was rewarded accordingly.

21 So he shall enjoy a life contenting,

21 This verse is repeated in 101:7; regarding contentment, see 89:28c.

22 in a lofty Garden

23 with low-hanging clusters.

22–23 That the clusters are low-hanging indicates that they are readily accessible and no one will be turned away from them (T). Regarding the clusters of the Garden, a ḥadīth states, “Verily I saw the Garden and came upon a cluster of grapes. Had I taken it, you would have eaten of it so long as the world remained.” Also see 55:54, which speaks of fruits near at hand, and 76:14, which says of the Garden: Its shade shall be close above them, and its clusters shall be made to hang low.

24 Eat and drink in enjoyment for that which you did in the past in days gone by.

24 That which you did in the past indicates the good deeds one did while in the life of this world, as in 52:19 and 77:43: Eat and drink in enjoyment for that which you used to do. The phrase days gone by translates al-ayām al-khāliyah, which can also mean “empty days,” in which case it is interpreted as a reference to days of fasting (R, Sy).
And as for one who is given his book in his left hand, he will say, “Would that I had not been given my book.

And did not know of my reckoning.

Those given the book in the left hand will be cast into Hell for their deeds. About receiving this record, the Quran also says, but as for one who is given his book from behind his back, he will cry out for destruction, and will enter a Blaze (84:10–12). To reconcile v. 25 and 84:10, commentators say that the left hand will be tied behind the back (IK, Q, Ts, Z on 84:10–12). Would that I had not been given may imply a desire to avoid punishment altogether; or it may indicate that the shame at witnessing one’s deeds is worse than the pain of the Fire, and that it would be preferable to be cast into the Fire without being forced to endure the shame of judgment and reckoning (R).

Would that it were the final end.

This verse is understood to mean, “Would that death had been the final end, and there had been no Resurrection” (Q, R).

My wealth availed me not.

The negative particle mā in this verse could also be understood as an interrogative particle, in which case the verse is understood as a rhetorical question, “What has my wealth availed me?” Both translations echo the broader Quranic theme that the things that provide advantages in this world are usually of no avail in the next, as in 18:46: Wealth and children are the adornment of the life of this world, but that which endures—righteous deeds—are better in reward with thy Lord, and better [as a source of] hope.
29 My power has passed from me.”

29 My power translates sulṭāniyah, which indicates authority and warrant; that it has passed means that those who receive the book in their left hand no longer have any control over their own destiny and will regret all that they neglected to do to prepare for the Hereafter. Here and in other verses, sulṭān also connotes “argument” or “proof” (ḥujjah; Q, R, Ṭ), meaning that they no longer have any capacity to argue against the reality of the Resurrection or even to argue for themselves, as the true reality of how they lived their life will be clear when their very limbs testify against them on the Day of Judgment and Reckoning (see 24:24; 36:65; 41:20) and they are forced to admit their sin (see 67:10–11).

30 Take him and shackle him.

31 Then cast him in Hellfire.

30–31 These verses are a command to the angels who govern Hell (Q, Ṭ). Regarding the shackles that will be placed upon the disbelievers and made to course through their bodies in the Hereafter, see 36:8c.

32 Then put him in a chain whose length is seventy cubits.

32 This verse is most likely a reference to the chain of disbelievers who are shackled to one another, as in 14:49: On that Day thou wilt see the guilty bound together in fetters. In classical Arabic, seventy is used metonymically to denote “many.” Here it implies a large number known only to God (R, Ṭ). This chain is said to go directly through one’s body (Bg, IK, R).

33 Truly he did not believe in God the Magnificent, and did not urge feeding the indigent.

33–34 These verses indicate the corruption of intellect (v. 33) and action (v. 34; R) and not giving God (v. 33) and human beings (v. 34) their due (IK). V. 34 and 89:18, Nor urge you the feeding of the indigent, are related to the objection posed by the Quraysh in 36:47: Are we to feed those whom, if God willed, He would feed? You are in naught but manifest error. Both imply that one is not only to give charity oneself, but also to urge others to give charity and thus encourage social justice on a broader scale. See also 107:3c.

35 So today he has no loyal friend here,

35 Though all human beings stand together on the same plain for the Reckoning (see 18:47; 20:106; 79:14), the Quran also says that every human being shall come unto Us alone (19:80), indicating that the experience of the Reckoning is a solitary one. Everyone will be too consumed with his or her own state to ask about that of another, as in 70:10: And no loyal friend shall ask about a loyal friend, and 80:37: For every man that Day his affair shall suffice him. This will, however, be all the more severe for the disbelievers, who are said to have no one upon whom they can rely, since the folly of everything upon which they had relied is now exposed and all recourse will be cut off from them (2:166); thus 40:18 reads, The wrongdoers shall have no loyal friend; see commentary on 70:10–14.

37 which none eat, save the iniquitous.

36–37 Filth translates ghislīn, which appears in the Quran only this once and has received many different interpretations. Some commentators say it is the worst food endured while in the Fire (IK); others see it as a reference to the oozing pus or vile excretions that the denizens of Hell are said to eat in 14:16 (JJ).
So I swear by what you see and by what you see not,

38–39  I swear translates lā uqsim, which could also be rendered, “Nay, I swear” (R). By what you see and by what you see not refer, respectively, to what people witness and the mysteries that remain unseen (IK), that is, this world and the Hereafter (R).

truly it is the speech of a noble messenger,

40  This same verse is repeated in 81:19. Many commentators see both instances as references to the Archangel Gabriel, while others see both as references to the Prophet Muhammad. Others argue that in this instance, noble messenger most likely refers to the Prophet Muhammad, because the following verses (vv. 41–42) refute those who say that the Prophet was a poet, in the sense that pre-Islamic Arabs understood the term, or who say that he was a soothsayer. They then maintain that in 81:19 noble messenger most likely refers to the Archangel Gabriel, because 81:25 refutes those who say the revelation was received from a satan or a jinn: Nor is it the speech of a satan outcast (IK, R).

and not the speech of a poet. Little do you believe!

Nor is it the speech of a soothsayer. Little do you reflect!

41–42  Little do you reflect (cf. 7:3; 27:62; 40:58) could also mean, “Little do you remember,” in which case it is understood by some as a reference to the fact that the disbelievers remember only some of the Prophet’s positive qualities, such as good deeds, kindness toward kin, and abstinence, but not enough that it would benefit them, as they still did not acknowledge his prophethood (JJ). In both verses, little can also be taken to mean “not at all,” as in Arabic one can say,
“You visit us so little,” and it means, “You do not visit us at all.” It could also be interpreted to mean that a little bit of belief or reflection enters the hearts of those who oppose the Prophet, but that it leaves quickly (R). In other canonical readings of the text, you believe (tuʾminūn) and you reflect (tadhdhakkarūn) are read in the third person plural, “they believe” (yuʾminūn) and “they reflect” (yadhdhakkarūn; Q).

43 It is a revelation from the Lord of the worlds.

43 This verse is repeated in 56:80. In both instances, it is a rebuke to those who say that the Quran is fables of those of old (6:25; 8:31; 16:24; 23:83; 25:5; 27:68; 68:15; 83:13) or that it is the speech of a poet (v. 41) or the speech of a soothsayer (v. 42).

44 Had he ascribed any statements to Us,

44 This verse maintains that had the Prophet Muhammad fabricated the Quran, he would suffer the same fate as anyone else who falsely attributed words to God. Several Quranic passages condemn any who would dare to make such an attribution, as in 2:79: So woe unto those who write the book with their hands; then say, “This is from God,” that they may sell it for a paltry price. So woe unto them for what their hands have written and woe unto them for what they earn. From a Quranic perspective, to fabricate lies against God is among the greatest of sins, as in 6:93: Who does greater wrong than one who fabricates a lie against God, or says, “It has been revealed unto me,” though naught has been revealed unto him, and one who says, “I will send down the like of what God has sent down”? (see also 3:94; 6:21–24, 144; 7:37; 10:17; 11:18; 18:15; 29:68; 61:7c).

45 We would have taken him by the right hand.

45 Taken him by the right hand indicates that God would have removed all power from him (R).

46 Then We would have severed his life vein.

47 And none among you could have shielded him from it.

46–47 These verses indicate that none can be absolved from fabricating lies against God (23:38), including prophets, and that God could take their lives in an instant.

48 Truly it is a reminder for the reverent.

48 Here most understand it as a reference to the Quran, discussed in vv. 40–43, 50–52 (Bḍ, IK, JJ, Q, Ṭ). But it can also be understood as a reference to the Day of Resurrection and Judgment discussed in the preceding verses. The reference to the Quran as a reminder (tadhkirah) is more in line with other Quranic verses, such as 20:2–3: We did not send down the Quran unto thee that thou shouldst be distressed, but only as a reminder unto one who fears [God] (also see, e.g., 43:44; 74:49–54; 80:11). In this vein, 11:114 says of the Quran: This is a reminder for those who remember. In the present verse, reminder renders tadhkirah, which can also indicate “an admonition.”

49 And truly We know that among you are those who deny.

49 Most commentators appear to understand among you as a reference to the disbelievers among the Makkans, though others propose that it is addressed to Muslims in general, meaning that some of them will disbelieve in the Quran (Z). Al-Rāzī remarks that those who stay on guard against excessive love for this world will be reminded or admonished by the Quran and benefit from it, but that those who incline to the world will deny the Quran and not draw near to it.
50 It is a source of regret indeed for the disbelievers.

51 It is indeed the truth of certainty.

50–51 Most commentators see both of these verses as references to the Quran (JJ, Q, R). According to others, v. 50 first refers to the Day of Judgment and v. 51 refers to the Quran (Sy); still others see the first verse as a reference to the disbelievers’ denial of the Quran (R). The Quran can be seen as a source of regret indeed for the disbelievers since, as a ḥadīth states, “The Quran is a proof, either for you or against you.” In this vein, 17:82 states, We send down of the Quran that which is a cure and a mercy for the believers. And it increases the wrongdoers in naught but loss.

Al-Qurtubī writes, “The Quran is a source of regret for the disbelievers on the Day of Resurrection when they see the reward of those who believe in it . . . and it is their source of regret in this world when despite their opposition to it, they are not able to answer the challenge to bring a sūrah like it (2:23; cf. 10:38).

52 So glorify the Name of thy Lord, the Magnificent.

51–52 See commentary on the similar verses 56:95–96. V. 52 could also be rendered, “So glorify with (or through) the Name of thy Lord.”
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Taking its name from the ascending ways mentioned in v. 3, al-Ma‘ārij is from the middle Makkan period. It is also known as al-Mawāqi‘, which in this context indicates “Those Matters That Are Impending,” as taken from the reference to an impending punishment in v. 1. Another of its titles is Sa’ala, “Someone Asked,” which is taken from the first word of the sūrah. Some say it was revealed immediately after the preceding sūrah and can be seen as continuing the description of the Resurrection and the Fire in 69:18–37 (Āl).

The sūrah begins with a rebuke to those who ask mockingly about or even seek to hasten the Day of Judgment (vv. 1–7), followed by a description of that Day and how it will appear to those who did not believe in it and prepare for it (vv. 8–18). This is followed by three famous verses that speak of the anxious and fretful nature of human beings (vv. 19–21). The next passage describes how one can overcome this nature, listing eight responsibilities of being a Muslim (vv. 22–35). The final section (vv. 36–44) then speaks of those who reject these responsibilities and continue to deride the Prophet, having no real understanding of the message with which he was sent.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful
A questioner asked about an impending punishment upon the disbelievers which none can avert, from God, Lord of the ascending ways. Unto Him ascend the angels and the Spirit on a day whose measure is fifty thousand years. So be patient with beautiful patience. Truly they see it as far off, but We see it as nigh. On a day when the sky is as molten lead, and the mountains are as carded wool, and no loyal friend shall ask about a loyal friend, [though] they will be made to see them. The guilty would wish to ransom himself from the punishment of that Day at the price of his children, his spouse, and his brother, his kin who had sheltered him, and all who are on the earth, that it might save him. Nay, but it is a churning fire, ripping away the scalp, calling to those who turned their backs and fled, who amassed and hoarded. Truly man was created anxious; when evil befalls him, fretful; and when good befalls him, begrudging, save those who perform prayer, who are constant in their prayers, and in whose wealth is an acknowledged due for the beggar and the deprived, those who affirm the Day of Judgment, and who are wary of the punishment of their Lord— truly there is no security from the punishment of their Lord, those who guard their private parts, save from their spouses or those whom their right hands possess, for then they are not blameworthy; but whosoever seeks beyond that, they are the transgressors; those who abide by their trusts and their pact, who uphold their testimony, and who are mindful of their prayers, those shall be in Gardens, honored. So how is it that those who disbelieve scramble toward thee from the right and from the left in droves? Does every man among them desire to be admitted into a Garden of bliss? Nay! Truly We created them from that which they know. So I swear by the Lord of the easts and the wests that We are able to replace [them] with what is better than them; and none outstrips Us. So leave them to indulge in idle talk and play until they meet the Day that they are promised, when they come forth from their graves, hastening as if racing to a goal, their eyes humbled, abasement shall overcome them. That is the Day they have been promised.
Commentary

1 A questioner asked about an impending punishment

2 upon the disbelievers which none can avert,

1–2 The translation of v. 1 is based upon reading the preposition bi to mean about rather than “for,” meaning that someone asked the Prophet who would be punished and when (Q, T). Many commentators, however, read the verse “a supplicator supplicated for” or “a petitioner petitioned for.” In this sense, the verse would be similar to 22:47: They bid thee to hasten the punishment, which is said to have been revealed with regard to a certain Nadr ibn al-Ḥārith, who said, O God, if this be the truth from Thee, rain down stones upon us from the sky, or bring us a painful punishment (8:32; IK, JJ, Q); regarding those who seek to hasten the punishment, see 10:50–51; 16:1; 26:204–7; 29:53–54; 34:30; 37:176–77; 42:18; 51:14, 59. In seeking to hasten punishment, Nadr ibn al-Ḥārith is believed to have supplicated against himself and to have unknowingly requested the punishment he received at the Battle of Badr (2/624), when he was killed in captivity (W, Z). According to others, the verse was revealed in response to another of the Prophet’s adversaries among the Quraysh, Abū Jahl (Q).

3 from God, Lord of the ascending ways.

3 Ascending ways is understood to be the paths by which one ascends to Heaven (IK), and the verse indicates that none but God can determine who may or may not ascend. Ascending ways can also represent the degrees of favor and blessing that God bestows upon human beings (Q).

4 Unto Him ascend the angels and the Spirit on a day whose measure is fifty thousand years.
Most commentators interpret the Spirit as a reference to the Archangel Gabriel (IK, Q, Ṭ), who is referred to as the Trustworthy Spirit in 26:193. It may also refer to another angel or to the spirit of a dead person when the spirit is taken from the body (Q); regarding the many different interpretations of “spirit” (rūḥ), see 78:38c. A day whose measure is fifty thousand years is understood to be the Day of Resurrection, which will be as fifty thousand years for the disbelievers (IK, Q). When asked about the length of the Day of Resurrection, the Prophet is reported to have said, “He will lighten it for the believer so that it seems to him like less time than it took for him to perform the obligatory prayer in the life of this world” (IK, Q, Sy). Others say that fifty thousand refers to the distance between Heaven and earth (Q). The disparity between time in the Divine or spiritual realm and time in this world is indicated in several places in the Quran (see, e.g., 22:47; 32:5; 97:3).

So be patient with beautiful patience.

This verse, which echoes the words of the prophet Jacob, Beautiful patience! (12:18, 83), is addressed to the Prophet Muhammad, enjoining him to be patient with those who ask questions such as the one posed in vv. 1–4 (Aj), though it can also be seen as an exhortation to all believers to be patient when confronted with the disbelief of others or even as a response to the questioners who would seek to hasten the coming of the Hour. According to some commentators, the instruction to be patient with disbelievers was abrogated by later verses that instructed the Muslims to fight (JJ, Q), while others maintain that the command to be patient holds at all times in all situations (Ṭ) or that this verse is definitive (muḥkam) at all times and therefore is not abrogated (Aj). For the majority of scholars, abrogation only applies to specific legal rulings, not general principles; see 2:106c.

Truly they see it as far off,

It refers to the Hour, the Day of Judgment, or the punishment. Far off indicates that the disbelievers think it is impossible (Aj) or far away enough that they need not be concerned about it.

7 but We see it as nigh.

7 We is taken by most commentators to indicate God speaking in the first-person plural (Ṭ), while others allow that it could indicate the believers (IK), who fear the Day of Judgment as if it were at hand.

8 On a day when the sky is as molten lead,

8 Molten lead translates muhl, which some understand as referring to the dirty residue of boiled oil (IK, Ṭ), or oozing blood, or pus (Q). Elsewhere the food that sinners are given to eat in Hell is said to be like molten lead boiling in their bellies (44:45).

9 and the mountains are as carded wool,

9 This verse is repeated in 101:5. Elsewhere it is said that the mountains are scattered (77:10), for the Day of Judgment is a day when the mountains will be like heaps of shifting sand (73:14); for other verses that speak of the crumbling of mountains, see 18:47; 19:90; 20:105–6; 27:88; 52:10; 81:3.

10 and no loyal friend shall ask about a loyal friend,

11 [though] they will be made to see them. The guilty would wish to ransom himself from the punishment of that Day at the price of his children, 10–11 The Day of Judgment and the Resurrection will be so overwhelming that people will have no concern for anyone except themselves, even for their most loyal companions in earthly life, as in 80:37: For every man that Day his affair shall suffice him (Q, Ṭ); see also 23:101; 31:33; 35:18. They will be made to see them is taken to mean that, although they will ask about no one else, all human beings will see one another (Ṭ). It may also mean that God shows the believers the state of the disbelievers (Ṭ) or that God shows the angels the states of all human beings (Q).

12 his spouse, and his brother,

13 his kin who had sheltered him,

14 and all who are on the earth, that it might save him.

11–14 That the guilty, or elsewhere those who work evil (39:47), will seek to ransom themselves on the Day of Judgment is stated in several verses. Although this pericope provides a particularly visceral image, in which one seeks to ransom himself with all that is most dear, other verses declare, An earth full of gold would not be accepted from any one of them, were he to offer it in ransom (3:91); and Were they to possess all that is on the earth and the like of it besides, they would seek to ransom themselves thereby (13:18); see also 2:48, 123; 10:54; 57:15. Kin (faṣīlah) in v. 13 may also denote one’s tribe (IK, Ṭ) or more specifically one’s mother (IK, Q).

15 Nay, but it is a churning fire,

15 Nay denies the possibility of ransom mentioned in the previous verses. Alternately, the verse could be translated, “Truly it is a churning fire” (Q). Churning fire translates lazā, which is considered one of the names of Hell because it churns its flames (talalaẓẓā; JJ).
16 Ripping away the scalp means burning away the scalp completely (IK, Ṭ), burning away all of one’s skin (Ṭ), or burning away everything except one part, which is variously identified as the bones, fingertips, or the facial features, among body parts (IK). It is also taken by ḥasan al-Baṣrī to mean that the entire body will be burned away and only the heart will remain, and it will cry out (IK, Ṭ).

17 calling to those who turned their backs and fled,

17 The Fire will summon those who are destined for it, because during the life of this world they turned away from obedience to God and fled from belief in God’s books and God’s messengers or from the truth (Ṭ). Then the Fire will pick out those who turned their backs and fled from the truth in the life of this world (IK).

18 who amassed and hoarded.

18 For a similar verse see 104:1–2: Woe unto every slandering backbiter who amasses wealth and tallies it. Both passages point to those who refuse to pay the obligatory alms (zakāh). The punishment for hoarding is described most vividly in 9:34–35: [As for] those who hoard gold and silver and spend it not in the way of God, give them tidings of a painful punishment, on the Day when it will be heated in the Fire of Hell, and their foreheads, their sides, and their backs will be branded with it. “This is what you hoarded up for yourselves; so taste that which you hoarded.”
Truly man was created anxious;

19–21 The message in these verses is similar to that of 41:49–51: Man wearies not of supplicating for good, and if evil befalls him, he is despondent, despairing. And if We make him taste some mercy from Us after hardship has befallen him, surely he will say, “This is mine; I think not that the Hour will come. If I am returned unto my Lord, surely with Him shall I have that which is most beautiful.” . . . And when We bless man, he turns away and withdraws. Yet when evil befalls him, he is full of prolonged supplication. In both instances, man (insān) refers to human beings in general or, according to some, disbelievers in particular (Q, Ṭ).

19 This verse is similar to 21:37, Man was created of haste, and 17:11, Man is ever hasty. Each of these verses can be taken to refer to all human beings, though some interpret them as describing disbelievers in particular (Q, R). In this sūrah, the exception save those who perform prayer (v. 22) suggests that the broader interpretation is intended (R, Z). Anxious translates hulūʿ, which denotes greed and covetousness combined with severe anxiety (Q).

and when good befalls him, begrudging,

20–21 In this context evil and good can be understood as any form of misfortune or good fortune, respectively, or more specifically illness and poverty, on the one hand, and health and wealth, on the other (R). Fretful translates jazūʿ, which indicates both distress regarding one’s misfortune and a lack of forbearance. It is thus the opposite of the patience and forbearance enjoined in v. 5. According to al-Rāzī, to overcome the fret and anxiety described in vv. 19–20, one should realize that the circumstances that give rise to them are from God and be content with them, as one must be content with all that comes from God. Then when health and wealth are present, they should be expended for the sake of seeking gain in the Hereafter rather than gain in this life. Those characterized by the eight qualities mentioned in the following verses (vv. 22–35) are then not subject to the blameworthy state mentioned in these verses (R). Those are begrudging who, when provided with wealth, fail to acknowledge the right that God and others have to it and thus fail to expend any of it in charity (IK, JJ).

22) save those who perform prayer,

22–35 Similar to 23:1–11, which adds and who turn away from idle talk (23:3) to the list, this pericope is among the most thorough in listing the moral and ritual responsibilities of Islam; see also 33:35.

23) who are constant in their prayers,

22–23 The first of the ritual responsibilities of Islam is prayer. These verses can be taken to mean those who perform the rites as prescribed without neglecting any aspect, as in v. 34, those who are mindful of their prayers, or simply as those who pray all five daily prayers (Ṭ). It may also indicate those who maintain the prayer of the heart at all times (Aj).

24) and in whose wealth is an acknowledged due

25) for the beggar and the deprived,

24–25 These verses are repeated almost verbatim in 51:19. The second responsibility for Muslims is recognizing the rights of the other in regard to one’s wealth. An acknowledged due refers to the obligatory alms (zakāh) rather than supererogatory charity (ṣadaqah; Q, R, Ṭ), though some maintain that it indicates charitable giving beyond the obligatory alms as well (R, Ṭ). The beggar refers to those who request, while the deprived may refer to those who have need but do not ask (R); for other meanings of the deprived, see 51:19c. For a list of those who have an acknowledged due, or the right, to a share of one’s wealth, see 2:177.
those who affirm the Day of Judgment,

The third responsibility is belief in the Resurrection and the weighing of deeds and therefore leading a life focused on the Hereafter rather than this world.

and who are wary of the punishment of their Lord—truly there is no security from the punishment of their Lord,

To be wary of the punishment could be considered an extension of the third responsibility or as a fourth responsibility, since, in addition to believing in the Day of Judgment and what is to follow, believers must also fear the consequences of neglecting duties or committing acts of disobedience, as in 67:12: Truly for those who fear their Lord unseen there shall be forgiveness and a great reward (see also 13:21; 16:50; 21:49; 39:23; 98:8). There is no security from the punishment, because it is inescapable (25:65).

those who guard their private parts, save from their spouses or those whom their right hands possess, for then they are not blameworthy;

but whosoever seeks beyond that, they are the transgressors;

The fifth responsibility is refraining from illicit sexual activity. These three verses are repeated verbatim in 23:5–7. For a more extensive discussion of what it means to guard one’s private parts, see commentary on 24:30–31. According to a hadīth, “Whosoever is able to guarantee what is between his jawbones and what is between his legs, I will guarantee him Paradise.” Another hadīth cites the spread of illicit sexual intercourse as one of the signs of the end of time. Whom their right hands possess refers to slave women with whom one has sexual relations; see 4:3c; 4:25c.

(32) those who abide by their trusts and their pact,

(33) who uphold their testimony,

32–33 The sixth responsibility is to remain true to one’s commitments, both in relation to God, with whom all of humanity is said to have made an initial pretemporal covenant or pact (see 7:172c), and with people (see also 23:8), thus in both religion and the affairs of this world (JJ). The seventh responsibility, which follows from maintaining trusts, is to testify to God’s Oneness and to the other articles of faith (Q), though some say this verse indicates testifying to God’s edicts and remaining true to them (R). It can also be related to testifying to the truth in all matters, even if it is against one’s kin, as in 6:152: And when you speak, be just, even if it be [against] a kinsman. This issue is addressed more fully in 2:283 and 4:135. According to a ḥadīth, “The signs of the hypocrite are three: when he speaks he lies; when he makes a promise, he breaks [it]; and when he is entrusted, he betrays” (IK).

(34) and who are mindful of their prayers,

34 The eighth responsibility is to be among those who are mindful of their prayers (cf. 6:92; 23:9), which is interpreted to mean those who are careful to pray at the right time and to maintain all of the necessary and recommended aspects of prayer (IK), including being mindful and present when praying. The manner in which this extended pericope on the responsibilities of Islam begins with prayer in vv. 22–23 and ends with prayer in this verse indicates the centrality of prayer to all other religious acts. In this vein the Prophet said, “Establish [the prayer] and do not fall short. And know that the best of your deeds is prayer” (IK on 23:2). He is also reported to have found great solace in prayer, saying, “My comfort is in prayer.” In warning of the consequences of failing to pray, he is reported to have said, “The first thing for which one will be taken to account is prayer,” meaning for failing to pray. From one perspective, those who are constant in their prayers (v. 23) refers to those who always observe the appointed times for prayer, while those who are mindful of their prayers indicates those who remain focused upon every aspect of prayer, from correct time and direction, to the prescribed purification procedures and location, to the proper attitude (being completely present in prayer by ridding the heart of all distractions and avoiding any acts of disobedience; R on 70:23). Elsewhere the Quran enjoins, Be mindful of your prayers (2:238).

35 those shall be in Gardens, honored.

35 This promise is similar to that given at the end of the almost identical pericope in 23:10–11: It is they who are the heirs, who shall inherit Paradise, abiding therein.

36 So how is it that those who disbelieve scramble toward thee from the right and from the left in droves?

37 Does every man among them desire to be admitted into a Garden of bliss?

36–38 It is reported that these verses were revealed in relation to the disbelievers who gathered around the Prophet to listen to him, but derived no benefit from it. Instead, they would deny him and mock him, saying, “If these were to enter Paradise, we would certainly enter it before them, and we will have more wealth therein than they would ever have” (R, W). Others say that these verses refer to a group of hypocrites who would mock the Prophet (Q, R).

39 Nay! Truly We created them from that which they know.
39  Nay! is meant as a negation of the disbelievers’ expectation that they will enter the Garden (v. 38). That which they know refers to the dust and then the drop (35:11) from which God created human beings, of which 77:20 says, Did We not create you from a base fluid? (see also 86:5–7). In this context the reference to the mean substance from which human beings were created indicates that mere existence, which in and of itself is nothing without God, is not enough to merit the rewards of which God and His Prophet speak, as people cannot expect to enter the Garden without being reverent (JJ) or following the responsibilities outlined in vv. 22–34.

40  So I swear by the Lord of the easts and the wests that We are able 40  The easts, translating mashāriq, could also mean “the places from which the sun rises,” as the rising of the sun, sharaqa, derives from the same root, sh-r-q, as “east,” mashriq. The wests, translating maghārib, could also mean “the places in which the sun sets,” as the setting of the sun, gharaba, derives from the same root, gh-r-b, as “west,” maghrib. So the verse could be read as a reference to the sun, the moon, and the planets, as each has a different place where it sets and rises. If limited to the sun, this verse can also be understood as a reference to the succession of points on the horizon where the sun rises and where it sets throughout the year and thus to the whole of the horizon. Some also say that it refers to both the sun and the moon (Ṭ). It could also mean what is east of every location and what is west of every location and thus to the whole of the known world; see also 55:17c.

41  to replace [them] with what is better than them; and none outstrips Us.

41  This verse means either that God is able to give them new bodies in the Hereafter (IK) or that He can replace them with another people in this world (Ṭ), as in 47:38: And if you turn away, He will cause a people other than you to take your place, and they will not be the likes of you; see also 5:54; 36:81–82; 46:33;
56:60–61.

So leave them to indulge in idle talk and play until they meet the Day that they are promised, 42 This verse is repeated verbatim in 43:83, and both are reflected in the injunction of 6:91: Say, “Allāh,” then leave them to play at their vain discourse. Elsewhere those who indulge in idle talk or vain discourse are said to be in the Fire (52:11–13; 74:45–46). In general the missteps of the tongue are considered to be among those deeds that lead most quickly to the Fire; thus 50:18 warns, No word does he utter without a ready watcher beside him, and the Prophet advises, “Let whosoever believes in God and in the Last Day either speak well or be silent.” According to some commentators, the injunction to leave those who derided the Prophet to their own devices was abrogated by 9:5 (Q), though most commentators do not maintain that it is abrogated.

a day when they come forth from their graves, hastening as if racing to a goal, 43 The Day of Resurrection is when the earth is stretched out, and casts forth what is in it, emptying itself (84:3–4; see also 99:2), and people are ripped from their graves unawares: with their eyes humbled they emerge from the graves as if they were scattered locusts (54:7; see also 101:4).

their eyes humbled, abasement shall overcome them. That is the Day they have been promised.

44 Abasement and humiliation are commonly referred to as the consequences of disbelief: Truly those who oppose God and His Messenger shall be abased, just as those before them were abased (58:5; see also 58:20). Their eyes humbled, abasement shall overcome them (cf. 68:43) thus indicates their utter shame in the Hereafter, as in 10:27: And as for those who commit evil deeds, the recompense of an evil is one like it, and abasement shall overcome them.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Nūḥ is most likely from the middle Makkan period. It is one of four sūrahṣ named after an Old Testament prophet; the others are Yūnus, “Jonah,” Yūsuf, “Joseph,” and Ibrāhīm, “Abraham.” Although it takes the name of Noah, this sūrah does not tell his entire story. Other aspects of the story can be found in 7:59–64; 10:71–73; 11:25–48; 21:76–77; 23:23–30; 26:105–21; 29:14–15; 37:75–82; 54:9–15. Nonetheless, a complete chronicle cannot be patched together from these various fragments, since the function of Quranic accounts of the prophets and sacred history is not to provide a historical record, but to provide guidance, as stated in 11:120: All that We recount unto thee of the stories of the messengers is that whereby We make firm thine heart. And herein there has come unto thee the truth, and an exhortation and a reminder for the believers.

Although the Biblical account provides details about the construction of the Ark (Genesis 6:12–16) and Noah’s life after the flood (Genesis 9), the Quran focuses almost entirely upon Noah’s function as a warner who called his people to guidance and their subsequent rejection of him. The flood with which God punishes those who opposed Noah is mentioned or alluded to in most of the accounts, but it receives no more than one line in any of them. This indicates that God’s Punishment is not the focus of the Quranic account; instead, like accounts of other prophets, such as Abraham and Jesus, the Quranic account of Noah emphasizes God’s Mercy and Guidance. Despite the fact that Noah’s people refuse to respond to repeated calls to follow God, God continues to grant them respite and does not send the flood until they have completely rejected his calls. In this respect, the story can be seen both as a call to those who opposed the Prophet Muhammad to let them know that God’s Mercy remains open to them, but that they will perish if they do not avail themselves of the guidance He has sent, and as a reminder to the Prophet Muhammad that messengers before him, such as Noah and Lot, have met with even greater defiance than he encountered.

Along with Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, Noah is considered one of the resolute among the messengers (46:35), who are presented to the Prophet Muhammad as examples to follow and among whose ranks Muslims consider Muhammad to be. According to some, Noah was the first messenger sent by God (those before him are considered prophets rather than messengers; for this distinction see the essay “The Quranic View of Sacred History and Other Religions”), and he was sent, like Muhammad, to the entire world, rather than to a specific people (Q).

1. Truly We sent Noah to his people, “Warn thy people before a painful punishment comes upon them.” 2. He said, “O my people! I am a clear warner unto you, that you may worship God, reverence Him, and obey me, that He may forgive you some of your sins and grant you reprieve until a term appointed. Truly when the term of God comes, it will not be delayed, if you but knew.” 3. He said, “My Lord, I have called my people day and night. 4. Yet my calling has not increased them in aught but flight. 5. Truly whenever I call them, that Thou mayest forgive them, they put their fingers in their ears, cover themselves with their garments, persist, and wax most arrogant. 6. Then I called them openly. 7. Then I proclaimed to them and confided to them in secret. 10 I said, ‘Seek forgiveness of your Lord! Truly He is Forgiving. 11 He will send the sky upon you with abundant rains, 12 support you with wealth and sons, and make for you gardens and rivers. 13 What ails you that you do not hope for God with dignity, 14 seeing that He has created you in stages? 15 Have you not considered how God created the seven heavens one upon another, 16 and made the moon a light therein and made the sun a lamp? 17 And God made you grow forth from the earth like plants. 18 Then He will cause you to return to it and bring you forth again. 19 And God made the earth an open expanse for you, 20 that you may travel spacious paths therein.’” 21 Noah said, “My Lord they disobeyed me and followed those whose wealth and children increase them in naught but loss.” 22 And they devised a mighty plot, 23 saying, “Do not leave your gods; do not leave Wadd or Suwāʾ, or Yagūth, Yaʾūq, or Nasr.” 24 Many indeed have they led astray; and it increases the wrongdoers in naught but error. 25 Because of their iniquities they were drowned, then made to enter a Fire. And then they found no helpers for themselves apart from God. 26 Noah said, “My Lord, leave not a single disbeliever to dwell upon the earth. 27 Truly if you leave them, they will mislead Thy servants and will beget naught but disbelieving profligates. 28 My Lord, forgive me and my parents, whosoever enters my house as a believer, and the believing men and the believing women, and do not increase the wrongdoers in aught but ruin.”
Commentary

1 Truly We sent Noah to his people, “Warn thy people before a painful punishment comes upon them.”

The command given to Noah to warn his people is similar to that given to the Prophet Muhammad in 7:2; 14:44; 21:45; 26:14; 40:18. Noah also warns his people of the punishment in 7:59; 11:26, 39.

2 He said, “O my people! I am a clear warner unto you,

Just as Noah is commanded to declare, I am a clear warner unto you (cf. 11:25; 26:115), so too is Muhammad enjoined to say, I am only a clear warner (38:70; see also 15:89; 22:49; 29:50; 46:9; 67:26, as well as 51:49–50, the ambiguity of which allows it to be taken as a reference to either Noah or the Prophet Muhammad). Muhammad is also referred to as a clear warner in 7:184.

All prophets are sent as bearers of glad tidings and as warners (2:213; 4:165; 6:48; 18:56), and every human collectivity is said to have been sent a warner, as in 26:208: And never did We destroy a town save that it had warners.

3 that you may worship God, reverence Him, and obey me, Al-Rāzī observes that the three duties to which Noah calls his people—worship of God, reverence for God, and following God’s messenger—can be seen as comprising all of religion. This verse is similar to Noah’s call to his people in 23:23: O my people! Worship God! You have no god other than Him. Will you not be reverent?

4 that He may forgive you some of your sins and grant you reprieve until a term appointed. Truly when the term of God comes, it will not be delayed, if you but knew.”

4 Some of your sins could also be rendered “your sins,” implying all sins and thus indicating the manner in which embracing religion and following one of God’s messengers can expunge all previous sins (JJ). Grant you reprieve until a term appointed (cf. 14:10; 16:61; 35:45) means that they are given ample time to repent for their sins. Elsewhere, presumably some time after his people had rejected this initial offer, Noah is reported to have said, O my people! If my presence is grievous to you, and [so too] my reminding of the signs of God, then in God do I trust. So decide on your plan, you and your partners, then let there be no doubt concerning your plan, but carry it out against me, and grant no respite! (10:71). Until a term appointed may refer to the death of an individual, the moment when punishment comes in this world, the end of time, or the Day of Judgment. Regarding the end that every human collectivity will eventually meet, as does Noah’s, the Quran says, For every community there is a term appointed. When their term comes, they shall not delay it by a single hour, nor shall they advance it (7:34; 10:49; see also 16:61; 23:43; 34:30).

5 He said, “My Lord, I have called my people day and night.

5 Noah called his people day and night, that is, continuously without interruption (JJ). Day can also be seen as an allusion to calling them openly, and night to calling them privately (Q). Noah is said to have been the most steadfast of God’s messengers; he began his prophethood at the age of forty and continued until he was a thousand years, less fifty (29:14), even though he had few followers.

6 Yet my calling has not increased them in aught but flight.

6 The reaction of Noah’s people to his call is similar to that attributed to the pagan Arabs in 17:41: And We have indeed varied [Our signs] in this Quran, that they might reflect, though it increased them in naught but aversion. For other passages where the call of God’s messengers increases disbelievers’ opposition and other negative reactions, see 9:125; 25:60; 35:39, 42.

7 Truly whenever I call them, that Thou mayest forgive them, they put their fingers in their ears, cover themselves with their garments, persist, and wax most arrogant.

7 Putting their fingers in their ears indicates that the people are averse to hearing God’s message; covering themselves with their garments shows that they do not wish to see God’s signs; and waxing arrogant implies that their hearts are closed; in a Quranic context, hearing, sight, and hearts are the three faculties that are either open or closed to revelation; see 2:7; 6:25, 46; 7:100, 179; 16:108; 17:46; 18:57; 22:46; 41:5; 46:26.

8 Then I called them openly.

9 Then I proclaimed to them and confided to them in secret.

8–9 These verses indicate that Noah called to his people in many different ways, but they remained defiant. Many commentators take this to mean that Noah became ever more emphatic, first calling them in private, then openly, and then combining the two (Q, R, Z), a pattern also followed by the Prophet Muhammad, who, according to most accounts, did not preach publicly until three years after receiving the first revelation.

10 I said, ‘Seek forgiveness of your Lord! Truly He is Forgiving.

10–20 The promise given by Noah to his people in these verses is similar to that given by the Prophet Muhammad to his people in 61:10–14.
He will send the sky upon you with abundant rains,

10–11 Noah’s words repeat a portion of those of the Arab prophet Hūd in 11:52. The sky is often used as a metonym for “rain,” which in a desert environment is synonymous with great blessing, even with the gift of life itself. Abundance translates midrār, which indicates something that is sent again and again. Most interpret it as an indication of rain. But when viewed in relation to other verses, it can be taken as a reference to all manner of Divine Blessings, both material and spiritual, promised to the disbelievers elsewhere on the condition that they reverence God: Had the people of the towns believed and been reverent, We would surely have opened unto them blessings from Heaven and earth (7:96); and to the Jews and Christians if they observe their scripture: Had they observed the Torah and the Gospel and that which was sent down unto them from their Lord, they would surely have received nourishment from above them and from beneath their feet (5:66).

support you with wealth and sons, and make for you gardens and rivers.

What ails you that you do not hope for God with dignity, 13 This verse means, “How is it that you do not hope that God will honor you and magnify you [Q, R, Z] in this life, in the Hereafter, or both?” Some commentators read this to mean, “How is it that you do not fear God with dignity?” (Āl, Ṭs).

seeing that He has created you in stages?

14–18 These verses allude to all stages of human existence, which are cited as proof of God’s Power, as in 22:5: We created you from dust, then from a drop, then from a blood clot, then from a lump of flesh, formed and unformed, that We may make clear for you. And We cause what We will to remain in the wombs for a term appointed. Then We bring you forth as an infant, then that you may reach maturity (see also 23:12–15).

and made the moon a light therein and made the sun a lamp?

16 The mention of the moon and the sun alludes to the means of guidance that God has provided, as in 10:5: He it is Who made the sun a radiance, and the moon a light, and determined for it stations, that you might know the number of years and the reckoning [of time]. God did not create these, save in truth. He expounds the signs for a people who know. V. 16 could be read with “and that He” at the beginning with vv. 17 and 19, also beginning with “and that,” and thus as a continuation of the rhetorical question begun in v. 15.

And God made you grow forth from the earth like plants.

17 Like plants can mean “as growing things.” On the one hand, this alludes to the creation of human beings from dust, as in 3:59: Truly the likeness of Jesus in the Sight of God is that of Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him, ‘Be!’ and he was (R). On the other hand, it alludes to the manner in which all things are thought to emerge from a single source, God. Though the “growing things” are diverse, they remain attached to the one ontological Source, and Its substance is also within them.

Then He will cause you to return to it and bring you forth again.
18 When v. 14 is read as referring only to the stages of existence during this life, this verse would complete it by continuing to the stages of death and resurrection, as in 2:28: How can you disbelieve in God, seeing that you were dead and He gave you life; then He causes you to die; then He gives you life; then unto Him shall you be returned?

19 And God made the earth an open expanse for you,

20 that you may travel spacious paths therein.’’”

19–20 Elsewhere God is described as the One Who made the earth a cradle for you, and threaded paths for you therein (20:53). Like v. 16, which alludes to the guidance God provides through the sun and the moon, spacious paths indicates other means of guidance that God has provided (see also 21:31; 43:10).

21 Noah said, “My Lord they disobeyed me and followed those whose wealth and children increase them in naught but loss.”

21 Those whom the people followed are said to have been the notables among them (JJ), who elsewhere dissuade them from following Noah by saying, This is only a human being like yourselves, desiring to set himself above you. And had God willed, He would have sent down angels. We heard not of this from our fathers of old. He is but a man possessed. So wait concerning him, for a time (23:24–25; see also 11:27). The criticism of Noah’s people for following their notables because of their wealth and children is similar to the manner in which the Muslims are admonished in 9:55 and 9:85: And let not their wealth or their children impress thee. God desires but to punish them thereby in this world, and that their souls should depart while they are disbelievers (cf. 68:10–14). The relativity of the benefits that derive from wealth and children in this world is a recurring Quranic theme; see 34:35–37c; 64:15c.

And they devised a mighty plot,

Elsewhere it is said that the people threatened to stone Noah; see 26:116. According to the Prophet’s cousin Ibn ‘Abbās, when Noah preached to his people, they would beat him until he passed out, wrap him in a blanket, and throw him in his house, leaving him for dead. When he awoke, he would again go out to preach to them.

saying, “Do not leave your gods; do not leave Wadd or Suwāʿ, or Yagūth, Yaʿūq, or Nasr.”

The mention of the names of the idols draws an implicit parallel to the idols of the Makkans, al-Lāt, al-ʿUzzā, and Manāt, mentioned in 53:19–20 and said to be naught but names that they have named (53:23). According to a ḥadīth, the gods mentioned here were originally heroes who lived before Noah and had many followers. After their deaths, statues were built to commemorate them, but later generations took the statues as gods (IK); different tribes came to worship different gods based on the particular shapes of the carved statues (Z). Wadd was said to be in the form of a man; Suwāʿ, a beautiful woman; Yagūth, a bull or sometimes a lion; Yaʿūq, a horse; and Nasr, an eagle or sometimes another bird of prey (Z).

Many indeed have they led astray; and it increases the wrongdoers in naught but error.

As the practice of idol worship persisted for many generations, the worship of idols continued to lead people astray up to the time when the Quran was revealed. It can refer to either disobeying Noah (Z) or leading others astray.

Because of their iniquities they were drowned, then made to enter a 26 Noah said, “My Lord, leave not a single disbeliever to dwell upon the earth.

27 Truly if you leave them, they will mislead Thy servants and will beget naught but disbelieving profligates.

26–27 These are Noah’s harshest words in any of the Quranic accounts. Elsewhere he is commanded not to plead for the disbelievers to be saved: And address Me not concerning those who did wrong; surely they shall be drowned (23:27). V. 26 is the only verse in the many verses pertaining to the story of Noah to imply that the flood was a universal event, similar to Genesis 6:17: “I am going to bring a flood of waters on the earth, to destroy from under heaven all flesh in which is the breath of life; everything that is on the earth shall die.” All other Quranic discussions of the flood imply that it is specific and localized. In 7:64 and 10:73 the drowned are those who denied Our signs, in 11:37 and 23:27 they are those who did wrong, and in 21:77 they are an evil people. In this manner the Quranic account seems to be more isolated than that of Genesis 6:5–7: “The Lord saw that the wickedness of humankind was great in earth, and that every inclination of the thoughts of their hearts was only evil continually. And the Lord was sorry that he had created human beings on the earth, and it grieved him to his heart. So the Lord said, ‘I will blot out from the earth the human beings I have created—people together with animals and creeping things and birds of the air, for I am sorry that I have made them’” (see also Genesis 7:4, 20).

28 My Lord, forgive me and my parents, whosoever enters my house as a believer, and the believing men and the believing women, and do not increase the wrongdoers in aught but ruin.”
28 Noah’s parents were reported to have been among the believers (JJ). In 21:76 God states, We answered him and saved him and his family from great distress. Nonetheless, his son was drowned, and in response to Noah’s supplication on his behalf God says to Noah: Truly he is not from thy family; surely such conduct was not righteous (11:46). Though there is no mention of the Ark in this sūrah, it is mentioned by name in 7:64; 10:73; 36:41, discussed at length in 11:37–44, and referred to as the ship in 29:15 and as a thing of planks and nails in 54:13. The lack of any mention of the Ark in this sūrah may be seen to underline the severity of this particular account, since it does not emphasize the salvation provided by God in the way that other accounts do.
بِسْمِ اللَّهِ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِيمِ
Al-Jinn is a late Makkan sūrah that takes its name from the mention of jinn in the first verse and the report about a group of jinn who heard the Prophet’s recitation of the Quran, recognized it as Divine Revelation, and embraced Islam. This sūrah’s response to the travails of the last Messenger (rasūl) sent to humanity, Muhammad, connects it to the previous sūrah, which tells of the travails of Noah, widely regarded as the first messenger (Āl), although he had been preceded by other prophets (anbiyāʾ), who are thought to have had a less universal function, such as Adam. Some commentators also see a connection between the mention of the abundant rains promised to Noah’s people in 71:11 and the abundant water promised to the Quraysh in 72:16 (Āl, Sy).

This sūrah is said to have been revealed at a time of great difficulty for the Prophet, in the year 619, when he had lost the protection of his uncle Abū Ṭālib and was vulnerable to those in Makkah who opposed his mission. At that time, the Prophet traveled to the nearby town of Ṭāʾif seeking support from its leaders, but they reviled him and set a mob upon him. The Prophet and Zayd ibn Ḥārith (d. 629), who had traveled with him, sought refuge in an orchard, where the Prophet prayed to God for support. There he met Salmān al-Fārsī, an originally Zoroastrian slave from Persia, who helped him escape and later became one of his closest Companions. While traveling in the desert, still searching for a protector, the Prophet stood for prayer at Nakhlah. Some say that he was reciting al-Rahmān (Sūrah 55), when a group of seven or nine jinn came upon him and stopped to listen; enraptured, they repented and embraced Islam. In light of this account, this sūrah is seen as a gift of solace from God, letting the Prophet know that, despite his trials, the message continued to be heard and his mission continued to spread.

According to another account, al-Jinn was revealed at a time when the jinn were distraught that they were no longer able to intercept messages from Heaven. After consulting among themselves, the jinn realized that obstacles to their receiving messages could only have resulted from a momentous event, so they searched the globe. A group of them came upon the Prophet while he was leading his Companions in the morning prayer. When they heard the Quran, they listened to it attentively and said, “This is what has caused obstacles between us and the reports from Heaven.” They went back to their people and said, “O our people, we have heard a marvelous Quran which directs us to the right path; we affirm our faith in it, and we would never associate anyone with our Lord.” Then God revealed this sūrah.

To contextualize this account and the place of the jinn, one must consider the nature of the spiritual cosmology of the Quran. In Islamic cosmology, there is something both literal and symbolic about the heavens and the earth. God is not literally physically “above and beyond” the heavens; yet “up” is the reality in physical space that best symbolizes and communicates the meaning of “toward God.” In this sense, the heavens represent both higher physical levels and higher ontological planes. The jinn, as psychic beings unseen to most human beings, occupy an intermediate state between the material realm of our physical experiences and the angelic and spiritual realms. Nonetheless, they are also on the earth, and according to some occupied the earth before human beings. As witnesses to the cosmic order in ways to which most human beings are denied access, the jinn are said to have the ability to “eavesdrop” on angelic communications, inform people of what is to come, and grant special powers. It should be noted, however, that in Islamic spirituality knowledge that comes from the jinn carries no spiritual value, and the spiritual masters have always made a distinction between the forms of knowledge of the Unseen that are tantamount to magic and those that result from what is believed to be a Divine or angelic inspiration. Differentiating between these different kinds of “inspiration” is in fact an important traditional science.

Commentary

1 The jinn listened to the Prophet’s recitation of the Quran (JJ). Their response, the speech that begins here, in which they marvel at the Quran and affirm it (v. 2), is said to have been addressed to their own community of jinn upon their return (JJ). This event is also said to be the one referred to in 46:29–32. A wondrous Quran could also be rendered “an amazing Quran,” which is understood as a reference to an unparalleled eloquence that amazed the jinn (Bg), as it did human beings.

2 that guides to sound judgment; so we believe in it and will ascribe none as partner unto our Lord.

2 Sound judgment translates rushd, which can also mean “the right path,” as it denotes a way that is free of turns and bends and thus without ambiguity. Spiritually, it can be understood to mean a way of life that is free of iniquities.

3 And He—exalted be the Majesty of our Lord—has neither consort nor child.

3–13 Each of these verses begins with the same particle, which can be read in one of two ways: if read anna, each verse would follow upon it was revealed unto me that (v. 1) and represent the words of the Prophet; if read inna, each verse would follow upon a group of jinn listened, and said and relate the words that the jinn are reported to have said to their own kind after hearing the Quran (Bg, Q). The latter interpretation is favored here and has thus been followed in the translation.

3 This is one of many verses where the Quran criticizes the idea that God has sons or daughters (see also 2:116; 6:100; 9:30; 10:68; 17:40, 111; 18:4; 19:35, 88–93; 21:26; 25:2; 37:149, 153; 39:4; 43:16, 81–82; 52:39). It is similar to 6:100 and 37:158, both of which criticize human beings who identified jinn as sons and daughters of God. Elsewhere it is said that some human beings worship jinn, as in 34:41: They will reply, “Glory be to Thee! Thou art our Protector, apart from them!” Nay, they worshipped jinn, most of them believing in them.

4 Truly the fool among us has uttered outrages against God,

4 The fool among us refers to Satan (Bg, IK), who is said by some to have been originally one of the jinn (see 27:39). Fool could also be taken to mean “the impudent” or “the insolent.”

5 though we had thought that mankind and jinn would not utter lies regarding God.

5 According to this verse, until the jinn heard the Quran, they had believed the assertions made by men and other jinn that God had a consort and offspring, because they did not believe that anyone would tell such egregious lies (Bg, R), thus indicating that they had only fallen into such ignorance out of blind adherence (taqlīd) and that they now renounced that belief (R).

6 Indeed, individuals among mankind did seek refuge with individuals among the jinn, and so increased them in oppression.

6 In pre-Islamic Arabia it was a common custom for people to seek protection from the jinn when they were traveling in the desert (IK, R). But doing so reportedly increased the false opinion that the jinn had of themselves and thus led them to further misguide and oppress. Here oppression translates rahaq, which indicates a combination of sin, evil, transgression, and oppression (Bg).
They thought, as did you, that God would resurrect no one.

The failure of the Arabs to believe in Resurrection is a matter with which the Quran and the Prophetic aḥādīth are particularly concerned, as even some who confirmed the Oneness of God, still denied Resurrection; see 31:25–26c; 43:87c.

We reached out to Heaven and found it filled with mighty sentries and flaming stars.

We used to sit in places thereof to listen, but whosoever listens now finds a flaming star lying in wait for him.

According to several aḥādīth, these verses, along with 15:16–18 and 67:5, refer to the role that jinn are said to have played in facilitating fortune-tellers and sorcerers. As subtle beings, jinn are said to have more direct access to other realms of existence than do human beings, who are more closely bound to the form and matter of this world. And it is believed that jinn employ such powers to “eavesdrop” on angels, but that they then deceive human beings, leading them astray with half-truths. Regarding this matter, a ḥadīth states, “Some people asked the Messenger of God about the fortune-tellers. He said, ‘They are nothing.’ They said, ‘O Messenger of God, sometimes they tell us of a thing that turns out to be true.’ The Messenger of God replied, ‘A jinn snatches that true word and pours it into the ear of his friend, but then mixes a hundred lies with it.’” It is said that after the Prophet Muhammad began receiving revelations, the jinn ceased to be able to access true words from Heaven (see the introduction to the sūrah). Angels were then established as sentries to bar their access, and meteors were the means by which God repelled them. Regarding the transmission of such messages and the inability of the jinn to “eavesdrop” on the angels, another ḥadīth states, “As we were sitting during the night with the Messenger of God, a shooting meteor gave a dazzling light. The Messenger of God said, ‘What did you say in the pre-Islamic days when there was such a
They said, ‘God and His Messenger know best, but we used to say that that very night a great man had been born and a great man had died.’ Whereupon the Messenger of God said, ‘These [meteors] are shot neither at the death of anyone nor on the birth of anyone. God issues a command when He decides to do a thing. Then [the angels] supporting the Throne sing His Glory; then sing the inhabitants of Heaven who are near to them until this Glory of God reaches those who are in the Heaven of this world. Then those who are near the supporters of the Throne ask these supporters of the Throne, “What has your Lord said?” And they inform them of what He says. Then the dwellers of Heaven seek information from them until this information reaches the Heaven of this world. In this process of transmission [the jinn snatches] what he manages to overhear and carries it to his friends. And when the angels see the jinn, they attack them with meteors. If they narrate only what they manage to snatch, that is correct, but they combine it with lies and make additions to it.’”

We do not know whether evil is desired for those upon the earth, or whether their Lord desires guidance for them.

10 Here the jinn admit that they cannot listen to God’s secret converse and have no knowledge of the Unseen, which indicates that the advice of fortune-tellers and soothsayers, both of whom claimed to receive their wisdom from the jinn, is ultimately not founded upon real knowledge; rather, the jinn seek to inspire each other with flowery discourse in order to deceive (6:112).

Some among us are righteous, and some among us are otherwise; we are on paths divided.

11 Some jinn are believers and others disbelievers (Bg, Ṭ), thus indicating that jinn are just like human beings in relation to God and that there is therefore no basis for the exalted status that some human beings attribute to them. In this vein, 51:56 states, I did not create jinn and mankind, save to worship Me.
We knew for certain that we could never thwart God on earth; nor could we ever thwart Him by fleeing.

The pre-Islamic Arabs were given to calling upon jinn and idols for help. Some thus thought that they could thwart or evade God, to Whom the Prophet was calling them. But here the jinn are made to say that they themselves cannot thwart God, with the implication that they cannot assist anyone else in doing so either. The idea that one can thwart God or His signs is criticized in over a dozen verses (6:134; 8:59; 9:2–3; 10:53; 11:19–20, 33; 16:46; 22:51; 24:57; 29:22; 34:5, 38; 39:51; 42:31; 46:32), since from a Quranic perspective naught in the heavens or upon the earth can thwart God (35:44; see also 52:8).

And when we heard the guidance, we believed in it, for whosoever believes in this Lord shall fear neither detraction nor oppression.

Here the guidance refers to the Quran (Bg, JJ, Q, R), which is referred to as such in several verses (see 2:2, 97; 3:138; 6:157; 7:52, 203; 10:57; 12:111; 16:64, 89; 27:2, 77; 41:44). The Torah and the Gospel are similarly referred to as “guidance” (see, e.g., 3:3–4; 5:46; 40:53–54c); and “The Guide” (al-hudā) is one of the names of the Quran. That believers shall fear neither detraction nor oppression is understood to mean that the good deeds they perform will not decrease and their evil deeds will not increase (IK, Ṭ).

Some among us submit and some among us are unjust; those who submit seek guidance; and as for the unjust, they are kindling for Hell.’’”

These are the only two verses where qāsit is used to describe the disbelievers. Here translated unjust, it indicates those who have deviated from the right course and is thus the direct opposite of those who seek guidance. Qāsit derives from the same root (q-s-t) as muqṣīt and qīṣt, meaning “just” and “justice,” respectively. Al-Qurṭubī explains that the qāṣīt is one who “turns away from the truth” and the muqṣīt is one who “turns toward the truth.” The idea that the jinn are also liable to punishment in Hellfire is stated most emphatically in God’s declaration: I shall surely fill Hell with jinn and men all together (11:119; 32:13).

16 And [say], “[It was revealed unto me] that if they hold firm to the path, We shall give them abundant water, 16 Although the preceding verses clearly refer to the jinn, this verse can be seen as a reference to either the jinn (R) or the Quraysh (Bg). According to many commentators, this verse refers to a seven-year drought that would be relieved, were the disbelievers to accept Muhammad as a messenger of God (Bg). Abundant water can be seen as an allusion to Divine Provision (rizq; Bg, IK, Q, R), all manner of benefit and good, (Bg, R), a life of ease and abundance (Bg, Ṭ), or Paradise, which is often described as having Gardens with rivers running below (see 2:25c; 3:195; 5:12; 48:5; 64:9; R). Conversely, this verse can be understood as a reference to the wealth and provision by which God allows those who are astray to continue fooling themselves, going further astray “little by little” (cf. 7:182; 68:44; Ṭ).

17 that We may try them therewith, and whosoever turns away from the remembrance of his Lord, He leads him to a grievous punishment,

17 When v. 16 is viewed in a positive manner, as a reference to those who hold firm to the path of Islam, this verse refers to the manner in which belief must be manifested by dealing properly with those things over which God has appointed human beings as trustees (see 57:7), for example, by paying the necessary alms tax on wealth and spending it in the way of God (2:195, 261–62; 8:60; 47:38; 57:10). But if v. 16 is viewed in a negative manner, as a reference to those who hold firm to the path of disbelief or opposition, this verse indicates that God allows disbelievers to fall further into deception and delusion, continuing to commit even greater sins because they think that wealth and apparent success in this world demonstrate their favor with God. But from an Islamic perspective, the wealth of this world can in fact result from the exact opposite of Divine Favor, as in 6:44: So when they forgot about that whereof they had been reminded, We opened unto them the gates of all things, till, as they exulted in what they were given, We seized them suddenly, whereupon they came to despair; and in 15:3: Leave them to eat and enjoy themselves and to be beguiled by hopes, for soon they will know (see also 7:182–83; 16:55; 23:54–56; 68:44). The remembrance can refer to the Quran (Aj, Ṭ), being a servant of God (Aj, R), testifying to the Oneness of God (Aj), or simply remembering God and His message. A grievous punishment is literally “an ascending punishment,” said to be ascending because it only increases in severity (Bg) or because there is no relief from it (Ṭ).

and that places of worship are for God; so do not call upon another alongside God, 18 Places of worship translates masājid, the plural form of both masjid (place of prostration) and masjad (instrument of prostration; Bg). Masjid is the standard word used by Muslims for “mosque,” from which this English word derives, and is translated as such in most of its occurrences, but here is taken as a reference to all houses of worship for all religions (Bg) or to the whole of the earth (Bg, Q, Ṭ) in accordance with a famous saying of the Prophet: “The earth has been made a place of prostration (masjid) for me, and has been purified” (Q). If taken as the plural for masjad, it refers to the seven parts of the body that should all touch the ground in the formal prostration position for Muslim prayer: the forehead, the hands, the feet, and the knees (Bg).

and that when the servant of God rises to call upon Him, they well-nigh swarm upon him.”

19 The servant of God (ʿabd Allāh) is one of the seven names by which the Prophet is called in the Quran (see 73:1–2c) and one of the most common names by which the Prophet is known in the Islamic tradition. To be the servant of God is one of the highest spiritual stations, as it represents complete surrender to God. Overall, this verse can be taken as a reference to the jinn, who were amazed at the Quran and nearly piled upon one another to hear it (Bq, T). Or it can be seen as a reference to the jinn reporting to their own companions how amazed they were to see the devotion of the Prophet’s Companions (Bq). Finally, it can be seen as a reference to the disbelievers among the Quraysh and among the jinn who would put obstacles in the Prophet’s way and press in upon him when he prayed at the Ka‘bah (Bq). The verses before this verse support the interpretation of it as a reference to the jinn, while those after it support its interpretation as a reference to the disbelievers among the Quraysh.

20 Say, “I call only upon my Lord, and I ascribe none as a partner unto Him.”

20 I call only upon my Lord is a response to the objections of the Quraysh, who accused the Prophet of infringing upon the people and demanded that he abandon the message he was preaching (Q, R).

21 Say, “I have no power over what harm or guidance may come to you.”

22 Say, “None will protect me from God, and I shall never find refuge apart from Him

21–22 Here the Prophet is being told to deny that he has any power beyond that of delivering God’s message faithfully, a frequent Quranic theme (see 67:26c). Given the tendency of the Arabs toward idol worship, this theme recurs throughout the Quran, as in 3:79–80: It is not for any human being, God having given him the Book, judgment, and prophethood, to then say to the people, “Be servants of me instead of God.” Rather, “Be sages, from having taught the Book and from having studied.” And he would not command you to take the angels and the prophets as lords. Would he command you to disbelief after your having been submitters?

If I do not convey from God and His messages. And whosoever disobeys God and His Messenger, his shall be the Fire of Hell, abiding therein forever,

If I do not convey from God and His messages could have two different grammatical functions. In this translation, if . . . not renders illā as a contraction of in lā (R, T), meaning, “None will protect me from God if I do not convey His messages” (T), or “If I do not convey . . . I shall never find refuge” (R). Illā could also be read as a clause of exception related to v. 21 (R, T, Z), meaning, “I have no power over you . . . except to convey to you what God has commanded me to convey from God and His messages” (T), or “I have no power over what harm or guidance may come to you (v. 21), only to convey from God” (Q, R). It could also be understood as a clause of exception related to the last phrase of v. 22, meaning, “I shall never find refuge apart from Him, save in conveying from God and His messages” (Q, R).

such that when they see what they are promised, they will know who is weaker in helpers and fewer in number.”

What they are promised refers to either the Day of Judgment (Bg), which is referred to elsewhere as the Day that they are promised (43:83; 51:60; 70:42), or the punishment (Bg), or both. Some also understand it as a reference to the Battle of Badr (JJ). This verse is similar to 19:75: Whosoever is in error, the Compassionate will extend his term till, when they see that which they have been promised, be it the punishment or the Hour, they will know whose position is worse, and whose host is weaker (see also 25:42). For this reason the Day of Judgment is also known as the Day of Division (37:21; 44:40; 77:13–14, 38; 78:17), since when the ambiguities of this world are cast aside, the distinction between truth and falsehood becomes clear to all.

Say, “I know not whether that which you are promised is nigh or whether my Lord has appointed a term;

In both the present verse and 21:109, that which you are promised refers to the Day of Judgment (IK), the punishment the disbelievers will receive, or both. Both verses can be read as a response to the question posed by disbelievers in other verses: When will this promise come to pass, if you are truthful? (10:48; 21:38; 27:71; 34:29; 36:48; 67:25); see 36:48c.

Knower of the Unseen, He does not disclose His Unseen to anyone, save to the one whom He approves as a messenger. Then He dispatches before him and behind him a guard,

Elsewhere God is referred to as Knower of the Unseen and the seen (6:73; 9:94, 105; 13:9; 32:6; 39:46; 59:22; 62:8; 64:18), usually taken to mean that He has knowledge of this world, the Hereafter, and all that exists on all levels of reality. V. 26 and 34:3 are the only verses in which God is referred to simply as Knower of the Unseen. In this context, the Unseen can be taken as a reference to all that is unseen, to that which you are promised from the previous verse (R), or to revelation (Ṭ). The reference to God’s disclosing His Unseen indicates the manner in which God teaches the prophets revelation (Ṭ). The caveat that God only reveals to the one whom He approves reaffirms the denunciation of sorcerers and fortune-tellers in vv. 8–9 (R). Some also take it as refutation of the possibility that miracles could be performed by anyone other than prophets (Z), though Sunnis and Shiites generally accept the reality of “lesser miracles,” which are known as karāmāt, while miracles performed by prophets are known as mu‘jizāt, or “evidentiary miracles.” The guards are angels who ensure that none of the jinn who attempt to gain knowledge of the Unseen hear the revelation before it reaches the prophet for whom it is intended (Ṫ); they are said to be four in number (IK).

28 that He may know that they have indeed conveyed the messages of their Lord. And He encompasses whatsoever is with them and keeps a numbered count of all things.”

28 As translated, this verse indicates that God sends the angels, so that God Himself may know that the prophets have conveyed the messages with which He sent them (JJ). But it can also be rendered “that he may know,” indicating that it is for the Messenger to know that the angels have conveyed the messages to the prophets (Bg, Q, Ṭ), or else to know that the angels have received the message (Ṭ). In this latter sense, it may refer to the particular covenant that God makes with the prophets in 3:81 and 33:7, that they will confirm or bear witness to the revelations sent to one another. That He may know translates li-yaʿlama, which could also be read li-yuʿlima, meaning “to inform,” thus indicating that God dispatches the angels as guards to inform the people that the prophets have indeed conveyed the messages of their Lord (Bg, Q).
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Al-Muzzammil is among the earliest Makkan sūrah. Many commentators maintain that v. 20 was revealed about one year later than the remainder of the sūrah (Āl, IK), while others believe that v. 20 is from the Madinan period (Āl, JJ). In either case, all of the verses except v. 20 are said to have been revealed immediately after the first five verses of Sūrah 74, al-Muddaththir. This sūrah takes its name from God’s addressing the Prophet as thou enwrapped (al-Muzzammil) in the first verse.

The main theme is the injunction to perform night vigil (tahajjud), which was made obligatory before the five daily prayers had been established (Āl); however, the modification of the injunction to perform night vigil in the last verse made it henceforth voluntary. The direct address to the Prophet, which tells him of the weighty Word (v. 5) of revelation, follows upon the mention of the messengers in the last verses of the previous sūrah (Āl), all of whom received a weighty Word in one form or another.

The first section (vv. 1–9) establishes the supremacy of night vigil and the obligation to perform it, and the second section (vv. 10–14) counsels the Prophet not to worry about those who do not heed the revelation. The third section (vv. 15–19) shifts the address to those who deny the Prophet, likening Muhammad to Moses, and alludes to the apocalyptic inversions (see Sūrahs 81 and 82) that will occur on the Day of Judgment. The last verse then removes the obligation of night vigil imposed in the first section, although it enjoins prayer and paying alms.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 O thou enwrapped! 2 Stand vigil at night, save a little, 3 half of it or reduce it a little, 4 or add to it; and recite the Quran in a measured pace. 5 Truly We shall soon cast upon thee a weighty Word. 6 Truly the vigil of the night is firmest in tread and most upright for speech. 7 For truly by day you have lengthy affairs. 8 So remember the Name of thy Lord and devote thyself to Him with complete devotion— 9 Lord of the East and the West, there is no god but He, so take Him as a guardian. 10 Bear patiently that which they say and take leave of them in a beautiful manner. 11 Leave to Me the deniers living in luxury, and be gentle with them for a while. 12 Truly with Us are fetters and Hellfire, 13 food that chokes and a painful punishment— 14 on a day when the earth and the mountains shake, and the mountains will be like heaps of shifting sand. 15 We have indeed sent you a messenger as a witness concerning you, just as We sent unto Pharaoh a messenger. 16 But Pharaoh disobeyed the messenger, so We seized him with a torrential seizing. 17 So if you disbelieve, how will you guard against a day that would make children gray-haired? 18 The sky shall be rent asunder thereon. His Promise shall be fulfilled. 19 Truly this is a reminder; so let him who will, take a way unto his Lord. 20 Truly thy Lord knows that thou dost stand vigil well-nigh two-thirds of the night, or a half of it, or a third of it, as do a group of those who are with thee; and God measures out the night and the day. He knows that you will not keep count of it and has relented unto you; so recite that which is easy for you of the Quran. He knows that some of you will be sick, while others travel upon the earth, seeking God’s Bounty, and others fight in the way of God. So recite that which is easy of it, perform the prayer, give the alms, and lend unto God a goodly loan—whatever good you send forth for your souls, you will find it with God better and greater in reward. And seek God’s Forgiveness. Truly God is Forgiving, Merciful.
Commentary

1 O thou enwrapped!

2 Stand vigil at night, save a little,

1–2  Enwrapped refers to the Prophet’s wrapping himself in his cloak after the first revelation; see the introduction to Sūrah 96. According to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, thou enwrapped (al-Muzzammil) is one of the seven names by which the Prophet said he was called in the Quran; the others are Muhammad (3:144; 33:40; 47:2; 48:29), Ahmād (61:6), Ṭā Hā (20:1), Yā Sīn (36:1), thou who art covered (al-Muddaththir; 74:1), and servant of God (ʿAbd Allāh; 72:19; IA, Q). Thou enwrapped is understood by most as a reference to the Prophet’s wrapping himself in his cloak in awe of the new revelation that had come upon him (see 74:1c). But in the context of this sūrah, it can also be seen as an injunction from God to throw off one’s bedding and stand in prayer, as in 17:78–79, as if God were calling, “O thou who art sleeping” (IK).

Before the five daily prayers were revealed, night vigil was the common practice of the Prophet and his small group of followers, who would reportedly stand in prayer until their feet swelled. The practice was then eased in v. 20 and was made explicitly supererogatory in 17:79: And keep vigil in prayer for part of the night, as a supererogatory act for thee. Regarding the benefits of night vigil, a famous ḥadīth says, “Every night during the last third of the night, our Lord descends to the Heaven of this earth and says, ‘Who calls upon Me that I might answer him? Who asks of Me that I might give to him? Who seeks My Forgiveness that I might forgive him?’” Night vigil is also a supererogatory practice that the Quran attributes to the upright among the People of the Book: Among the People of the Book is an upright community who recite God’s signs in the watches of the night, while they prostrate (3:113); for other references to night vigil see 11:114; 21:20; 20:130; 25:63–64; 50:40; 52:49; 73:6, 20; 76:26.

3 half of it or reduce it a little, or add to it; and recite the Quran in a measured pace.

3–4 These are the first verses in the chronological order of revelation to explicitly enjoin reciting the Quran as a form of worship, an injunction that appears frequently (e.g., 18:27; 27:92; 29:45). The command to recite the Quran in a measured pace can be seen as an injunction for all Muslims or as one that applies specifically to the Prophet, indicating that he is to deliver the revelation to others in a measured pace. In this way the Prophet’s manner of recitation reflects the manner that God ascribes to Himself in 25:32: And We have recited it unto thee in a measured pace. Regarding the Prophet’s manner of recitation, his wife Umm Salamah is reported to have said, “He used to divide his recitation verse by verse” (IK), meaning that he would pause at the end of each verse.

The Prophet enjoined his followers to recite the Quran, saying, “Adorn the Quran with your voices” (IK), and “Whosoever does not chant the Quran is not one of us” (IK). Many ḥadīth speak of the benefits of reciting the Quran, among them, “Whosoever recites the Quran fluently is with the honorable and obedient scribes [i.e., the angels], and whosoever recites it with difficulty shall receive a double reward”; “Never does a group gather in one of the houses of God, reciting the Book of God and contemplating it, but that peace descends upon them, mercy surrounds them, the angels encircle them, and God remembers them in His gathering.” Regarding the different levels of recitation, a famous ḥadīth states, “The believer who recites the Quran is like a citrus fruit; its fragrance is pleasing and its taste is sweet. The believer who does not recite the Quran is like a dried date; it has no fragrance, but its taste is sweet. The hypocrite who recites the Quran is like basil; its fragrance is sweet, but its taste is bitter. The hypocrite who does not recite the Quran is like bitter apple [colocynth]; it has no fragrance and its taste is bitter.”

Truly We shall soon cast upon thee a weighty Word.

A weighty Word refers to the Quran itself. The Word of God is said to be weighty both in the obligations that it entails for the Prophet and his followers (IK, Sy) and in the weight of good that will be placed in the scales on the Day of Judgment for one who follows it and recites it (Sy). According to several accounts, the weight of the Quran was not merely figurative. The Prophet’s wife ʿĀʾishah reported that the Prophet would perspire when the revelation came upon him, even on a cold day (IK). On another occasion she said, “When the revelation came upon the Prophet while he was on his mount, it was like a blow to the camel’s neck” (IK).

6 Truly the vigil of the night is firmest in tread and most upright for speech.

6 Vigil of the night translates nāshiʿat al-layl, which literally means “rising at night” (Ṭ). In this sense, it could also refer to the ascension of the spirit or the heart. That night vigil is firmest in tread means that it leaves the strongest impression on the heart (Ṭs) and is most conducive to establishing harmony between the hearing and the heart for the purpose of comprehending the Quran (JJ). It can also be understood to mean “firmer in tread,” meaning that the night is better than the day for vigil, recitation, and memorization of the Quran (Ṭ). Others understand the verse to mean, “The one who rises at night” (Ṭ), meaning one who prays at night. Tread translates waṭaʿ, which in variant readings is read wiṭā, meaning “agreement,” “cooperation,” or “congruence.” This is understood to mean that night is the best time for realizing agreement, cooperation, and congruence between the heart, ear, and tongue (Ṭ). That night is most upright for speech means that it is the best time for recitation of the Quran (Q, Ṭ).

7 For truly by day you have lengthy affairs.

7 Lengthy affairs refers to the responsibilities that prevent one from having time for extensive devotions during the day (JJ) or to God’s granting an extensive expanse of time for worldly matters, thus implying the responsibility to devote a part of the night to prayer (IK).

8 So remember the Name of thy Lord and devote thyself to Him with complete devotion—

8 Once believers have finished with their affairs, they should devote themselves to God, as in 94:7: So when thou art free, exert thyself (IK). Some say the command remember the Name of thy Lord means to recite the basmalah (In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful), at the beginning of Quranic recitation (JJ), while others see it as an exhortation to remember God at every moment of every day (Aj), since the remembrance of God is surely greater (29:45). Devote translates tabattal, which literally means “to sever” or “to cut off.” It is thus interpreted to mean cutting oneself off from everything other than the remembrance of God (Aj).

9 God is also referred to as Lord of the East and the West in 26:28; see also 2:115, 142; 37:5; 55:17; 70:40. One is to take Him as a guardian because only God suffices as a Guardian (4:81, 132, 171; 33:3, 48; see also 17:65), indicating that in the end one can only entrust one’s affairs to God.

10 Bear patiently that which they say and take leave of them in a beautiful manner.

10 This is similar to other verses that counsel the Prophet to be patient (e.g., 16:127; 20:130; 38:17; 46:35; 50:39; 52:48; 70:5; 86:17). If at the time of this revelation the Prophet had not yet begun to preach publicly, as most commentators maintain, it most likely refers only to the few individuals whom he had approached in private. Take leave of them in a beautiful manner indicates taking leave for the sake of God (Ṭ).
Leave to Me the deniers living in luxury, and be gentle with them for a while.

Truly with Us are fetters and Hellfire,

11–12 Leave to Me the deniers (cf. 68:44; 74:11) indicates that it is not for the Prophet to be concerned about those who do not accept God’s message once he has delivered it to them, as God will deal with them properly in time. Be gentle with them for a while is a command to grant them respite, indicating both that they should be granted the opportunity to embrace Islam and follow the Prophet and that, if they do not, God will soon requite them for their disbelief, both in this life, through the victory of the Muslims over the Quraysh, and in the Hereafter with fetters and Hellfire. It could also indicate that they should be allowed to continue in their ways, as they will be requited for their deeds in the end, as in 31:24: We grant them enjoyment a little, then We compel them toward a grave punishment (IK).

Food that chokes and a painful punishment—

13 Food that chokes may refer to any of the forms of vile and unpleasant food that are provided for the people of Hellfire, including the tree of Zaqqūm (44:43; cf. 37:62; 56:52), a vile thorn (88:6), filth, which none eat, save the iniquitous (69:36–37), and thorns of fire, which can be neither vomited nor ingested (JJ), or else to all of them collectively.

14 That the earth and the mountains will shake and be destroyed on the Day of Judgment is one of the apocalyptic inversions mentioned in several verses, such as 69:14, where the earth and mountains are borne away and ground up in a single grinding, and 70:9 and 101:5, where the mountains are likened to carded wool (see also 18:47; 52:10; 56:5–6; 81:3); see 56:5–6c.

15 We have indeed sent you a messenger as a witness concerning you, just as We sent unto Pharaoh a messenger.

16 But Pharaoh disobeyed the messenger, so We seized him with a torrential seizing.

15–16 In this verse, the pronoun you may refer to the disbelievers (Āl), the people of Makkah (JJ), or humanity in general. That the Messenger is sent as a witness concerning you indicates that he will bear witness concerning human beings, either for them or against them on the Day of Judgment (T). It can also be understood to mean “as a witness against you,” meaning that he will bear witness to their disbelief and opposition on the Day of Resurrection (Aj, Āl, Bḍ, Z). That Muhammad is likened to Moses implies that the Quraysh are likened to Pharaoh’s people, thus indicating that they will suffer the same fate (IK). Given the early date of this sūrah, this reference also shows that the pre-Islamic Arabs were familiar with the story of Moses and Pharaoh or at least its general outline. A torrential seizing indicates one that is severe or evil (T); elsewhere it is said of Pharaoh and his people that God seized them with a devastating blow (69:10), and such is the seizing of thy Lord when He seizes the towns while they are doing wrong. Surely His seizing is painful, severe (11:102).

17 So if you disbelieve, how will you guard against a day that would make children gray-haired?

17 This verse could also be read, “How will you reverence on a day that would make children gray-haired?” (R, Z), indicating that those who disbelieve will not have the opportunity to turn their hearts from disobedience to reverence on the Day of Resurrection. The hair of children turns gray from fear and awe (T), indicating that the events of this day would make the young old. This is an example of apocalyptic inversion (see sūrahs 81 and 82), in which the order of this world is inverted on the Day of Resurrection. Here the inversion relates to the human order, as children’s hair turning gray implies the loss of the strength and vitality associated with youth, while in the next verse, the inversion applies to the created order in general.

So let him who will indicates human beings who choose the path of faith in God and obedience to Him (T). The phrase could also be interpreted with God as the subject of the verb will, meaning, “So let whomsoever He wills, take a way,” since you do not will but that God wills (76:30; IK). \( \text{20} \) Truly thy Lord knows that thou dost stand vigil well-nigh two-thirds of the night, or a half of it, or a third of it, as do a group of those who are with thee; and God measures out the night and the day. He

And seek God’s Forgiveness. Truly God is Forgiving, Merciful.

20 The form of night vigil mentioned in the first sentence relates to that enjoined in vv. 1–8 (JJ). Most likely revealed some twelve months after those verses, the present verse revoked the obligatory status of the night vigil and made it voluntary (Ṭ). A group of those who are with thee refers to the small group of Companions who emulated the Prophet’s practice at that time, standing in prayer until their feet were swollen (JJ, Ṭ). After the first sentence, this verse changes from addressing the Prophet in the second-person singular to addressing the Prophet and his Companions in the second-person plural. You will not keep count of it indicates that the Prophet’s Companions would not all be able to perform the obligation in full (Ṭ). Therefore, He has relented unto you by lessening the requirement to stand in vigil and allowing them to recite as much of the Quran as is easy for them in prayer (JJ, Ṭ). According to some, those who know the Quran should still recite a minimum of fifty or one hundred verses (Ṭ), or even just five (IK).

For those who are sick, traveling, or fighting, performing the night vigil is difficult, so they need only perform that which is easy of it, that is, whatever is not too taxing. The mention of fighting in this verse has caused some to surmise that it is from the Madinan period, as fighting did not begin until then. Others see it as foreshadowing the travails that the early Muslim community would face (IK). Perform the prayer refers to the obligatory daily prayers (Ṭ). This verse contains the first mention of alms (zakāh) in the chronological order of revelation. Some interpret it as a reference to the obligatory alms (zakāh; Ṭ), but since the specific form of zakāh was not institutionalized at this time, it may refer to charity in general. Some say that the requirement to pay alms was established during the Makkan period, but that the specifics were not established until the Madinan period (IK); for an explanation of zakāh, see 23:4c. To lend unto God a goodly loan (2:245; 5:12; 57:11, 18; 64:17) indicates expending effort and wealth for the cause of religion; see 57:11c; 57:18c. Here and in 5:12 lending a goodly loan is connected with the duties of prayer and almsgiving. Whatever good you send forth for your souls refers to all good deeds performed by believers in this life (Ṭ); see 5:80; 75:13c; 82:5c. You will find it with God better and greater in reward indicates that what one spends in the way of God in this life is better than what one keeps for oneself or leaves behind as an inheritance (IK). It also alludes to the manner in which good deeds are increased in the Hereafter, as in 2:261: The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of God is that of a grain that grows seven ears, in every ear a hundred grains. And God multiplies for whomsoever He will (see also 2:245, 4:40; 6:160; 10:26; 64:17).
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Among the earliest Makkan sūrah, al-Muddaththir is, according to some commentators, Makkan in its entirety (Bg), but others maintain that the last section (vv. 31–56) is from the Madinan period (Āl). It is closely connected to the previous sūrah, as both are said to respond to the Prophet’s covering himself when the experience of the revelation began. Whereas the first verses of Sūrah 73 instruct the Prophet regarding the practices that he and his Companions must follow, this sūrah focuses more upon his function as a warner to those who do not as yet follow him.

Although most commentators agree that 96:1–5 constitutes the first revelation of the Quran, according to an account from one of the Companions, Yaḥyā ibn Abī Kathīr, the first five verses of this sūrah constitute the first revelation. Ibn Abī Kathīr asked Abū Salamah ibn ʿAbd al-Rahmān what the first sūrah of the Quran to be revealed was, and Abū Salamah replied, “O thou who art covered.” Ibn Abī Kathīr then said to him, “They say it was, Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created! [96:1].” Upon hearing that, Abū Salamah said, “I asked Jābir ibn ʿAbd Allāh about that, saying the same as you have said, whereupon he said, ‘I will not tell you except what the Messenger of God had told us. The Messenger of God said, “I passed a month at Mt. Ḥirā, and when my stay came to an end, I came down. While I was walking, I heard a voice from the sky. I looked up toward the sky, and behold! I saw the same angel who came to me in the cave of Ḥirāʾ, sitting on a stool between the sky and the earth. I was so terrified by him that I fell down on the ground. Then I went to my wife and said, ‘Cover me! Cover me!’ They covered me, and then God revealed [74:1–5]”” (Bg, W).

Ibn Kathīr proposes that the reference to “the same angel who came to me in the cave of Ḥirāʾ” indicates that this narration pertains to the second experience of the revelation, thus making the first five verses of this sūrah the first revelation after 96:1–5. Others propose that this account provides the first command to warn, thus to go forth as a Messenger, while 96:1–5 marks the beginning of the revelation as a whole (Āl).

After the opening exhortation to the Prophet in vv. 1–7, vv. 8–10 warn of the Day of Judgment, serving as the segue into a polemic against those who deny the prophethood of Muhammad (vv. 11–25) and an allusion to the punishment they will encounter in the Hereafter (vv. 26–31).

Truly he sets himself against Our signs. 17. I shall constrain him to endure a steep ascent. 18. Truly he reflected and determined. 19. May he perish for how he determined; 20. then may he perish for how he determined! 21. Then he beheld. 22. Then he frowned and scowled. 23. Then he turned his back, and waxed arrogant, and said, “This is naught but sorcery handed down; this is naught but the speech of a human being.” I shall cast him into Saqar. And what will apprise thee of Saqar? It spares not, nor leaves behind. It scorches the human being! Over it are nineteen. And We have appointed none but angels as wardens of the Fire; and We have not appointed their number save as a trial for those who disbelieve, to grant certainty to those who have been given the Book and increase in faith those who believe; and that those who were given the Book and the believers will not doubt; and that those in whose hearts is a disease and the disbelievers will say, “What does God desire by this as a parable?” Thus does God lead astray whomsoever He will and guide whomsoever He will. And none knows the hosts of thy Lord but He. It is but a reminder for the human being. Nay! By the moon, by the night as it withdraws, and by the morning as it brightens, truly it is one of the greatest, as a warner to the human being, for those of you who wish to go forth or stay behind. Every soul is held in pledge for what it has earned, save the companions of the right, in Gardens, questioning one another about the guilty, “What led you into Saqar?” They say, “We were not among those who prayed; nor did we feed the indigent, and we engaged in vain discourse with those who do the same, and we denied the Day of Judgment, until certainty came upon us.” Thus the intercession of the intercessors will avail them not. So what ails them that they turn away from the Reminder, as if they were frightened asses fleeing from a lion? Rather, every man among them desires to be given pages unfolded. Nay! But they fear not the Hereafter. Yea! Truly it is a reminder. So let whosoever will, remember it. And they remember not, save as God wills. He is most worthy of reverence and most worthy of granting forgiveness.
Commentary

1. O thou who art covered,

   Like 73:1, this verse refers to the Prophet’s enfold ing himself in a cloak (dīthār) when he first experienced the revelation. As with thou enwrapped (73:1), thou who art covered is taken as one of seven names by which the Prophet is called in the Quran; see 73:1–2c.

2. arise and warn!

   Arise and warn indicates that this is the first call to the Prophet to deliver the new revelation, to propagate the prophetic message, while 96:1–5 is seen as the first call to prophethood (IK). From a spiritual perspective, vv. 1–2 can be understood as a call to all human beings to remove what separates them from God, arise through God, and drop everything other than God (My).

3. Thy Lord magnify!

4. Thy garments purify!

   This verse can refer to the purification of both one’s garments and one’s character and heart before prayer (Bg, IK). In Arabic, to say that one’s garments are pure is to imply that one “is free from faults and vices” (Z). Regarding ritual purification, the Prophet said, “Whosoever performs ablution, and does so in a beautiful way, his sins shall leave his body, and will even leave from under his fingernails.” In another account, the Prophet said, “When a person washes his face, the sins of his eyes will be washed away, and when he washes his hands, the sins of what his hands have done will be washed away, and when he washes his feet, the sins of where he walked will be washed away, and with the last drop of water, he will be free of sin.” Some also take this verse as a command to shorten one’s garments rather than wearing them in the ostentatious manner of the pre-Islamic Arabs in which the hems would drag on the ground (JJ).

5 And defilement shun!

5 Defilement translates rujz, which is also understood to mean “idols” (Bg, JJ) or misdeeds (Bg), both indicating that one must shun all that would lead to punishment (Bḍ, Bg).

6 Grant not favor, seeking gain!

6 Similar to 92:18–21, this verse indicates that charity should be given freely for the sake of God, not to curry favor or seek material gain. It can be seen as a general command for all believers or as a particular command for the Prophet (Bg, JJ).

7 And for the sake of thy Lord be patient.

7 This verse can mean either that the Prophet should be patient in implementing and following the commands of God or that he should bear patiently the harm that he would receive from his opponents, since God’s religion will ultimately prevail (Bg). Viewed in the context of the following verse, it may also mean that one must bear patiently the trials of the Day of Judgment (Bḍ).

8 For when the trumpet is blown,

8 The blowing of the trumpet on the Day of Judgment is mentioned in several verses (see 6:73; 18:99; 20:102; 23:101; 27:87; 36:51; 39:68c; 50:20; 69:13; 78:18c). Here it is understood as a reference to the second trumpet blown by the Archangel Raphael (Ḅg), which heralds the gathering of all humanity on a single open, barren plain for judgment (see 18:47; 20:106; 79:14).

9 That Day shall be a difficult day

10 for the disbelievers, not of ease.

9–10 Those who disbelieve shall find no respite or reprieve on the Day of Resurrection. This may be the first occurrence of kāfir, or “disbeliever,” in the chronological order of revelation. Only in later revelations did kāfir come to be juxtaposed to muʾmin, or “believer.” In earlier revelations it is juxtaposed to gratitude. Kāfir must thus be understood not simply as a disbeliever, but rather in the more literal sense as “one who covers over,” implying that one covers over the truth by denying it and that this is the root of both disbelief and ingratitude.

11 Leave Me alone with the one whom I created,

11–25 These verses are believed to refer to al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah, a staunch opponent of the Prophet in Makkah. Ibn ʿAbbās related that al-Walīd went to the Prophet, who recited the Quran to him, and his heart seemed to soften to it. News of this reached Abū Jahl, another of the leaders of the Quraysh; so he said to al-Walīd, “O uncle, your clan wants to collect money to give to you, for you went to Muhammad and exposed yourself to his message.” He said, “The Quraysh know well that I am among their wealthiest.” Abū Jahl said, “Then say something about him that will let your people know you condemn and dislike him.” He said, “What shall I say? By God, there is not a man among you who is more knowledgeable about poetry and its composition than I. By God, what he says does not resemble any poetry. By God, the speech he utters is sweet and graceful, fruitful at the top, copious at the bottom; it has the upper hand, and nothing has the upper hand over it. But let me think about what I shall say about it.” Then he said, “This is naught but sorcery handed down [v. 24], which he has simply learned from others.” Then God revealed Leave Me alone with the one whom I created and the verses that follow it (W).

11  Alone refers either to God, thus emphasizing His Uniqueness as Creator, or to the human being, who begins and ends life alone before God (see 6:94; 19:80, 95). Alone translates al-walīd, which is also said to be one of the epithets by which al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah was known (Bg).

12 and to whom I gave vast wealth,

13 and sons at his side,

14 and made smooth the way for him.

15 Yet he desires that I give more.

12–15  These verses are said to refer specifically to the great fortune that God had bestowed upon al-Walīd, who was among the wealthiest men in Makkah; he had either seven or ten sons and was also considered among the most learned and eloquent of the Quraysh. These verses can, however, also be taken in a general sense as a reference to the human tendency to want ever more, as in a well-known ḥadīth, “If the son of Adam had a valley of gold, he would wish for it to be two valleys” (IK, Q); see sūrah 102; 102:1c.

16 Nay! Truly he sets himself against Our signs.

16  In the context of the story of al-Walīd, this verse suggests that, due to his opposition to the Prophet, God would cut off the blessings He had bestowed upon him (Bg). Our signs means the verses of the Quran (JJ); all the proofs of God, such as the revealed books and the prophets (Ṭ); or the blessings provided by God (Āl, IK).
17 I shall constrain him to endure a steep ascent.

17 This verse means that al-Walīd will be burdened with a severe punishment that continues to increase (Ṭ), or one from which there is no respite (Bg, Ţ). Steep ascent translates ʿuʿūdah, which is also said to be the name of a mountain of fire in Hell that al-Walīd will be made to ascend and fall from forever (Bg, JJ, Ţ).

18 Truly he reflected and determined.

18 It is reported that al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah called together all of the leaders of the Quraysh and asked them about the Prophet. After reflecting upon the Prophet’s nature and the Quran, al-Walīd determined that, as he was not possessed, a fortune-teller (kāhin), a poet, or a liar, he must then be a sorcerer (sāhir; Bg, Q).

19May he perish for how he determined;

20 then may he perish for how he determined!

19–20 Perish translates qutila, which literally means “slain,” indicating that, though he was still alive, al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah had been “spiritually slain.” Qutila is thus glossed as “accursed” or “punished” (Bg, JJ). The verse can also be read as a reference to the fact that al-Walīd determined his own fate by the manner in which he sought to determine the nature of the Prophet, and the repetition can be seen as emphasis (Bg) or to mean that al-Walīd would be punished, perish, or be slain in both this life and the next.

21 Then he beheld.
Then he frowned and scowled.

21–22 These verses tell of al-Walīd’s reaction to the Quran. That he beheld may allude to his having had the intelligence to discern its nature, but to have nonetheless frowned and scowled, searching for a way to deny it. Others take beheld as a reference to his looking at the faces of the leaders of the Quraysh while searching for a way to refute the Quran (JJ).

Then he turned his back, and waxed arrogant,

23 Al-Walīd turned his back, that is, on faith and the verification of the Quran (Ṭ). Waxed arrogant translates istakabara, which when combined with the preposition “from” (ʿan) means “disdained” or “scorned.” Although the preposition does not occur here, many consider it to be implied, thus meaning, “He disdained to confirm the truth” (Ṭ), or he scorned the Prophet (JJ).

and said, “This is naught but sorcery handed down;

24 Discounting the other possible ways to denigrate the Prophet and the Quran, al-Walīd decided upon sorcery (siḥr) as his final “determination.” Elsewhere those who opposed Muhammad and other prophets say of the various revelations, This is naught but manifest sorcery (see 5:110; 6:7; 11:7; 34:43; 37:15).

this is naught but the speech of a human being.”

25 Naught but the speech of a human being means it is not from God. See also 16:103, where the accusation against the Prophet is that he has merely been taught by a human being (JJ). Alternately, this verse can be understood to echo the contention of the disbelievers that, were God to send a messenger, he would have sent an angel, as in 25:7: And they say, “What ails this Messenger, who eats food and walks in the markets? Why is there not an angel sent down unto him to be a warner with him?” (cf. 6:8–9, 50; 11:12; 14:10–11; 17:94–95; 23:24, 33–34, 38, 47; 26:154, 186; 36:15; 54:24; 64:6c).

26 I shall cast him into Saqar.

27 And what will apprise thee of Saqar?

28 It spares not, nor leaves behind.

26–28 According to some Saqar is one of the names of Hell (Bg, T); according to others, the name of one of the gates of Hell (T). Some say it has no derivation, while others say it derives from saqarathu al-shams, meaning, “the sun melted or scorched it” (Tāj al-ʿarūs). Spares not, nor leaves behind indicates that it spares no one by leaving them alive, nor does it leave anyone behind dead (Bg, T; see also 87:12–13), since all are burned and then restored, only to be burned again (Bg; see 4:56); or it means that it leaves nothing of the bones, skin, and blood; it burns them all (Q).

29 It scorches the human being!

29 Scorching indicates that it burns the skin until it becomes black (Bg, T). Scorching translates lawwāḥah, which can also indicate something that makes clear, indicating that Saqar is made clear to human beings, as in 26:91: And Hellfire will become apparent to the errant (Bg, Q; see also 79:36).

30 Over it are nineteen.

30 Most exegetes interpret this verse as an allusion to nineteen angels who are the keepers of Hell. The angels of punishment are called zabāniyyah (96:18), and their king is named Mālik (43:77). Nineteen is one of several numbers occurring in the Quran with symbolic numerological significance. Some of the factors taken to indicate its importance are: the number of letters in the basmalah is nineteen; the number of words in what is most commonly held to be the first revelation, 96:1–5, is nineteen; the number of words in what is most commonly held to be the last revelation, Sūrah 110, is nineteen; in the science of the numerical symbolism of the letters, known as al-jafr, where each letter is assigned a numerical value, the numerological value of the Divine Name al-Wāḥid (the One), is nineteen; and the total number of sūrah(s) in the Quran is 114, which is 19 multiplied by 6.

31) And We have appointed none but angels as wardens of the Fire; and We have not appointed their number save as a trial for those who disbelieve, to grant certainty to those who have been given the Book and increase in faith those who believe; and that those who were given the Book and the believers will not doubt; and that those in whose hearts is a disease and the disbelievers will say, “What does God desire by this as a parable?” Thus does God lead astray whomsoever He will and guide whomsoever He will. And none knows the hosts of thy Lord but He. It is but a reminder for the human being.

31 Upon hearing that there were only nineteen over it, Abū Jahl, one of the leaders of the Quraysh, is reported to have boasted that there would be no problem in overcoming them; so this verse clarifies that they are angels, not human beings (Bg, Q, Ṭ). God appoints their number as a trial, meaning either that they are something that will lead some people astray when they ask why there are nineteen (JJ) or that they are a source of punishment in the Hereafter (Q). In contrast, the believers and the People of the Book are said to increase in faith and certainty. That the appointment of the nineteen is to grant certainty to those who have been given the Book is understood by most to mean that nineteen was also the number known to the Jews and Christians; therefore, the similar enumeration in the Quran should give them greater certainty in the prophethood of Muhammad (Bg, IK, Q, Ṭ). Those in whose hearts is a disease indicates those who have hypocrisy in their hearts (Q, Ţ; see 2:8–11; 5:52; 24:47–50; 33:12, 60; 47:20, 29) or those who opposed the Prophet (Q). The disbelievers’ question, What does God desire by this? likely refers to the meaning behind this particular number, nineteen (Q, Ţ). In this context, God leads astray whomsoever He will and guides whomsoever He will (cf. 13:27; 29:21; 35:8) indicates the manner in which the questions posed by revelation lead some to certainty and faith and others to greater disbelief. None knows the hosts means that none knows their true number (Q, Ţ), for although the guards are nineteen, they are only the leaders. Their full numbers are alluded to in a hadīth: “Hell will be brought on that Day [the Day of Judgment] with seventy thousand bridles, every bridle being held by seventy thousand angels” (Q). It is but a reminder most likely refers to the hosts of thy Lord, but may instead refer to Saqar or the Quran (Q). If taken as a reference to Saqar, reminder (dhikrā) could be rendered “admonition” (Q).

32 Nay! By the moon,

33 by the night as it withdraws,

34 and by the morning as it brightens,

32–34 Nay! expresses a rejection of those who suppose that they can know the number of God’s hosts or that they can overcome them (Āl, Ţ). This is one of several passages in which an oath is taken on the moon (cf. 84:18; 91:2) and on the alternation of night and day (see also 81:17–18; 84:16–17; 89:1–4; 91:1–4; 92:1–2; 93:1–2).

35 truly it is one of the greatest,

35 Here it refers to Saqar (Q, Ţ), meaning that Saqar is one of the greatest calamities (JJ). Some understand the assertion that it is only one of the calamities to mean that such calamities will be endless (Āl). It could also refer to the disbelievers’ denial of the prophethood of Muhammad, meaning that such denial is one of the greatest sins (Q).

36 as a warner to the human being,

36 According to some exegetes, v. 36 may be a distant adverbial clause that continues the command in vv. 1–2, meaning, “O thou who art covered, arise and warn . . . as a warner to man” (Q). Most, however, view it in relation to the previous verse, indicating that the gravity of Saqar should serve as a warner (Q, Ṭ). In this context, warner may also be viewed as an Attribute of God or a reference to the Quran (Q).

37 for those of you who wish to go forth or stay behind.

37 To go forth means to proceed in faith, goodness, and obedience, while stay behind means to remain in disbelief, evil, and disobedience (Q, Ṭ).

38 Every soul is held in pledge for what it has earned, 38 Cf. 52:21. This verse means that the good and evil deeds that a soul has committed bind it to a particular end, since God attends to every soul in accordance with what it has earned (13:33).

39 save the companions of the right,

39 This is most likely the first use of the term companions of the right (56:8, 27, 38, 90–91; 90:18; see 56:8–9c) in the chronological order of revelation. According to most commentators, it means those of faith and piety (Q), though in this context some take it as a reference to the children of Muslims or to the angels (ٰ). The fifth Shiite Imam, Muhammad al-Bāqir (d. 114/733), is reported to have said, “We and our partisans are the companions of the right. All who oppose the People of the [Prophet’s] House are those who are held in pledge” (Q). Vv. 38–39 together are understood to mean that the companions of the right will not be subject to punishment, because God will forgive their sins (Q, Ṭ).

40 in Gardens, questioning one another

41 about the guilty,

42 “What led you into Saqar?”

40–42 The companions of the right are said to question one another about the predicament of their fellow believers who had failed to act in accord with the revelation (JJ). Others interpret questioning one another to simply mean “questioning,” indicating that they speak directly to the sinners (Q, Ṭ). This would then be one of several passages to indicate that in the Hereafter those in the Garden and those in the Fire are, at least on occasion, able to communicate with one another (see also 7:44–50; 57:13–15).

43 They say, “We were not among those who prayed;

44 nor did we feed the indigent,

43–44 In general these verses are understood to indicate those who failed to follow the Commands of God (Q, Ṭ). But one Shiite interpretation of v. 43 would be, “and we were not among the followers of the leaders (aʾimmah),” alluding to the failure to follow the Shiite Imams (Qm).

and we engaged in vain discourse with those who do the same, 45 Literally, this verse reads “and we plunged with those who plunged.” However, as employed in the Quran the verb khāda (“to plunge”) implies khāda fi’il-ḥadīth (“plunged into discourse”) or khāda fi’il-bāṭil (“plunged into vanity or falsehood”); cf. 6:91; 9:69; 52:12; 70:42. This verse thus indicates that they partook of the vanities of this world and went astray (Q, Ṭ); it could also mean that they associated with those whom God cursed for calling the Prophet a sorcerer (Q).

and we denied the Day of Judgment,

46 until certainty came upon us.”

47 The guilty committed all the errors mentioned in vv. 43–46 until certainty—that is, death—came upon them (Q, Ṭ). As al-Kāshānī writes, “That is death, then we saw with our eyes that which we had denied.”

Thus the intercession of the intercessors will avail them not.

48 Although some Muslims wish to limit the ability to intercede to prophets, many Sunni scholars maintain that angels and even righteous (al-ṣiddīqūn) believers can intercede on behalf of believers, while Shiite scholars always include the Shiite Imams among those to whom God grants the ability to intercede. The most widespread opinion is that intercession through prophets, angels, and saints is available for those who believe in God, but have been punished for some of their sins (Q); however, there can be no intercession for disbelievers. This verse would thus indicate that those whom the companions of the right question in v. 42 are the disbelievers. Regarding the question of intercession, see 10:3; 19:87; 20:109; 21:28; 34:23; 2:48c; 2:255c.

So what ails them that they turn away from the Reminder, as if they were frightened asses

49–50 Here the Reminder is a reference to the Quran (Q, T), from which people turn away either by denying it or by not acting in accord with it (Q).

fleeing from a lion?

51 Lion translates qaswarah, an enigmatic word that is also interpreted to mean “hunting spears,” “arrows,” or “hunters” (Q, T).

Rather, every man among them desires to be given pages unfolded.

52 Each man wants a revelation that is addressed directly to him (Q, T), as in 2:118: Why does God not speak to us, nor a sign come to us? (see also 17:90–93c). It is also reported that some of the Quraysh objected by saying that, if Muhammad were truly a Messenger of God, he could bring a book that would give each of them exemption and protection from the Fire (Q, T).

Nay! But they fear not the Hereafter.

Yea! Truly it is a reminder.

53–54 In both verses nay, translating the emphatic particle kallā, could also be rendered “truly” or “indeed,” an alternative that fits v. 54 better than v. 53 (Q). In the recitation of Ibn ʿĀmir, they fear not is read, “you fear not,” as a warning to the reader or listener.

Reminder refers to the Quran (T). In this context, it is a reminder indicates that revelation does not provide a list of proofs of the kind that the Prophet’s detractors request when they ask for pages unfolded for each of them in v. 52. Rather, as a reminder, the revelation reawakens the knowledge of God and of the covenant with Him (see 7:172c) that all human beings bear in their primordial nature (30:30).

55 So let whosoever will, remember it.

As rendered, this verse refers to remembering, particularly in the sense of acting in accord with the Word of God in the Quran. It could also be read as referring to the remembrance of God: “So let him who will, remember Him.”

56 And they remember not, save as God wills. He is most worthy of reverence and most worthy of granting forgiveness.

That they remember implies that they act in accord with the revelation. In this vein, God’s willing that they remember refers back to v. 31: Thus does God lead astray whomsoever He will and guide whomsoever He will. When v. 55 is read as a reference to the remembrance of God, this verse indicates that individuals cannot remember God unless God remembers them. Regarding the last sentence of this verse, the Prophet is reported to have said, “God says, ‘I am most worthy of being reverenced. So none other shall be made a God with Me. And whosoever fears to do so, it is befitting that I forgive him’” (Aj, Q).

According to the recitation of Nāfiʿ, this verse could also be read, “you remember not,” in which case it is an address to the readers or listeners.

The Resurrection

\textit{al-Qiyāmah}

\textit{Al-Qiyāmah} is an early Makkan sūrah that takes its name from God's swearing by the Resurrection in the first verse and the focus upon the Resurrection throughout. It is also known as \textit{Lā uqsimu}, meaning “I Swear,” the phrase with which the first and second verses begin (Āl). The \textit{sūrah} begins with two oaths (vv. 1–2), the second of which is subject to much interpretation. It then rebukes those who deny the Day of Resurrection and speaks of its signs (vv. 3–15). This is followed by a famous passage (vv. 16–19) that counsels the Prophet to receive the revelation with patience. The next section (vv. 20–36) contrasts the final ends of believers and disbelievers and speaks of the inevitability of death followed by another rebuke for those who deny the truth. The \textit{sūrah} concludes by invoking the stages of life as evidence of God’s Omnipotence and of His ability to resurrect the dead (vv. 36–40).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. I swear by the Day of Resurrection. 2. And I swear by the blaming soul. 3. Does man suppose that We shall not gather his bones? 4. Nay! But We are able to fashion even his fingers and toes. 5. But man desires to defile what lies before him, asking, “When is the Day of Resurrection?” 6. Then when the eyes are dazzled, 7. and the moon is eclipsed, and the sun and the moon are brought together— that Day man will say, “Where is the escape?” Nay! But there shall be no refuge. Unto your Lord that Day is the dwelling place. Man shall be informed that Day of that which he has sent forth and of that which he has left behind. Indeed, man shall be a testimony against himself, though he proffers his excuses. Move not thy tongue therewith to hasten it. Surely it is for Us to gather it and to recite it. So when We recite it, follow its recitation. Then surely it is for Us to explain it. Nay! But you love the ephemeral, and forsake the Hereafter. Faces that Day shall be radiant, gazing upon their Lord. And faces that Day shall be scowling, knowing that a spine-crushing calamity will befall them. Nay! But when it reaches the collarbones, and it is said, “Who will [make him] ascend?” And he knows for certain that it is the parting; and the shank is intertwined with the shank. Unto thy Lord that Day is the driving. For he neither confirmed nor prayed, but he denied and turned away, then went to his people swaggering. So nearer to you! And nearer! Then nearer to you! And nearer! Does man suppose that he would be left aimless? Was he not a drop of semen emitted? Then he was a blood clot; whereupon He created, then fashioned, and made from him the two genders, male and female. Is not such a one able to give life to the dead?
Commentary

1 I swear by the Day of Resurrection.

2 And I swear by the blaming soul.

1–2 Both verses begin with the particle lā, which usually indicates negation, but can also indicate an emphatic expression when taking an oath. Hence v. 2 is interpreted by some commentators to mean, “I do not swear by the blaming soul” (Aj, Sh), though the translation given reflects the predominant interpretation of lā as an emphatic particle. The blaming soul is considered the middle state of the human soul in the process of spiritual growth, between the soul that commands to evil (12:53) and the soul at peace (89:27); see 12:53c; 89:27c. It is called the blaming soul because it recognizes the shortcomings of the lower concupiscent soul and chastises it in order to transform it into the soul at peace, which returns unto the Lord content, contenting (89:28); see 89:27–30c. Every soul is believed to be capable of recognizing its shortcomings, as expressed in a ḥadīth, “There is no pious or profligate soul but that it blames itself on the Day of Resurrection; if it has done good, it says, ‘How did I not do more!’ And if it has done evil, it says, ‘Would that I had desisted!’” (Aj). Here, then, God swears by the reverent, God-fearing soul that blames itself for falling short, although it strives for obedience (Aj); a minority say, however, that it refers only to the soul of the disbeliever, which blames itself in the Hereafter (Sh). The blaming soul and the Day of Resurrection can thus be seen as intimately connected, not only by the role the quoted ḥadīth ascribes to the blaming soul on the Day of Resurrection, but also because both expose one’s faults—just as one is called to account for all of one’s lapses and shortcomings on the Day of Resurrection, so too does the blaming soul call one to account for them throughout the life of this world. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī thus equates the blaming soul with the scrupulous soul that continually asks what it desires by its own actions (IK, Q, Sh). A minority suggest that “blaming” (lawwāmah) is related to talawwum, meaning “constantly shifting,” and indicates the fickle and capricious nature of the soul, which is happy, then sad, obedient, then disobedient, reverent, then heedless (Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyyah, al-Rūḥ, 262).
3 Does man suppose that We shall not gather his bones?

3 This verse is said to have been revealed with regard to one ʿAdī ibn Rabīʿah, who said to the Prophet, “Tell me about the Day of Resurrection. When will it be? How will it be?” The Prophet answered his questions. Then ʿAdiyah said, “If I were to see that Day with my own eyes, I would not attest to you, O Muhammad, as being true, nor would I believe in you. Can God really gather these bones?” (Aj, W). In this context, man is thus understood to mean those human beings who disbelieve and deny the Resurrection (Aj, JJ).

4 Nay! But We are able to fashion even his fingers and toes.

4 This verse is said to mean, “We are able to create him again precisely as We created him the first time”; see 36:78–79c; 17:49–51c.

5 But man desires to defile what lies before him,

5 This verse may also refer to those who deny the Hereafter that lies before them and thus “sully” or defile it (R). Defile translates yafjura, which also means “to waste.” Although human beings have been warned of the Hereafter and all that it entails, they continue to waste the opportunity to purify their souls, meaning that they continue to ignore the admonitions of the blaming soul (v. 2) and to follow their own caprice. According to al-Qushayrī this applies to those who intend to prepare for the Hereafter but do not: “One continues to lapse and delays repentance, saying, ‘I will repent later.’ Then he dies having not repented. It is said that he resolves not to continue accumulating acts of disobedience, turning over a new leaf in the time he has left. Yet, despite this, he does not immediately untie the knot of persistence from his heart. Thus his repentance is not true, for among the conditions of repentance is the resolution to not return to the like of what one had done. So if one still finds within one’s heart a sweetness in lapsing and one contemplates returning to its like, then one’s regret is not true” (Qu; Aj cites this same passage, but with some slight variations).

6 asking, “When is the Day of Resurrection?”

Although this verse repeats one of the questions posed by ʿAdī ibn Rabīʿah (see 75:3c), the question and variations upon it are repeated throughout the Quran (see, e.g., 10:48; 34:29–30; 51:12; 67:25). In general it is not posed in a spirit of inquiry, but in one of derision, mockery, and denial (JJ).

7 Then when the eyes are dazzled,

Similar to their glance returning not to them in 14:43, the present verse indicates that, due to the terror of the Day of Judgment, the disbelievers will not be able to focus on anything (IK). Others interpret this verse to mean that they are amazed to see some of the things that they had denied (JJ).

8 and the moon is eclipsed,

9 and the sun and the moon are brought together—

8–9 These verses indicate that the sun and moon will be enfolded or rolled up (IK, Ṭ), as in 81:1–2.

10 that Day man will say, “Where is the escape?”

11 Nay! But there shall be no refuge.

10–11 One of several passages to make clear that for those who disbelieve there is no escape or refuge once the Hour comes; see also 18:53, 58; 34:51;
Unto your Lord that Day is the dwelling place.

This verse indicates that on the Day of Judgment it is God alone who chooses the final destination in which each soul will reside or that God is one’s final end (Ṭ).

Man shall be informed that Day of that which he has sent forth and of that which he has left behind.

Cf. 82:5. That which he has sent forth refers either to all of the deeds that individuals have performed (see 18:49; IK) or only to the good deeds performed in this life that will testify for them and for which they will receive reward in the Hereafter. That which he has left behind refers either to the good deeds that were not performed in this life or to the good deeds that continue to bear fruit. Regarding the latter interpretation, a famous ḥadīth states, “Whosoever establishes a beautiful custom (sunnah ḥasanah) in Islam that is practiced by those who come after him, on the Day of Resurrection he will receive the reward thereof [i.e., for his own good deed] and a reward like unto that of those who practiced it after him, without its detracting from their reward in any way. And whosoever establishes a bad custom (sunnah sayyī’ah) in Islam bears its burden and the burden of those who practice it, without its detracting from their burdens in any way” (Aḥ, IK on 36:12, Aj); regarding the nature of what is left behind, also see 36:12c.

Indeed, man shall be a testimony against himself, though he proffers his excuses.
These verses can be taken as a reference to the blaming soul (v. 2), which in effect testifies against every bad deed. In this vein, 17:14 says, On this Day, your soul suffices as a reckoner against you (see also 6:130; 7:37). Elsewhere their ears, their eyes, and their skins will bear witness against them for that which they used to do (41:20; see also 24:24; 36:65). Though he proffers his excuses indicates that even when disbelievers speak to defend themselves, they bear witness against themselves (IK, T) or that none of their false excuses will be accepted (IK, T). Elsewhere the Day of Judgment is described as The Day when the wrongdoers will not benefit from their excuses (40:52).

Move not thy tongue therewith to hasten it.

Surely it is for Us to gather it and to recite it.

So when We recite it, follow its recitation.

These verses address the Prophet, encouraging him to wait patiently for the continuation of the revelation, as in 20:114: Be not in haste with the Quran before its revelation is completed for thee, but say, “My Lord! Increase me in knowledge!” Both passages are understood as references to the Prophet’s fear of forgetting the verses of revelation, which led him to repeat quickly everything that had been revealed to him, even while the revelation was coming down. Ibn ʿAbbās is reported to have said, “The Messenger of God used to bear the revelation with great trouble and used to move his lips [quickly] with the revelation. . . . So God revealed [75:16–17], meaning that God will make him remember the portion of the Quran that was revealed at that time by heart and recite it.” Then Ibn ʿAbbās said, “So when We recite it, follow its recitation means listen to it and be silent. Then surely it is for Us to explain it [v. 19] means that it is [for God] to make you recite it. Afterwards, the Messenger of God used to listen to Gabriel whenever he came and after his departure he used to recite it as Gabriel had recited it” (IK, Q). It is for Us to gather it thus indicates that God will gather it within the Prophet’s breast, ensuring that he remembers it correctly (IK). These verses can also be taken as an admonition to those who wish to understand the Quran to first read and reflect upon all of its teachings rather than drawing hasty conclusions.

19 Then surely it is for Us to explain it.

19 This verse means that after the Prophet memorizes and recites the Quran, God will explain it to him, clarify it, and inspire him to know its meaning according to what God intended and legislated (IK).

20 Nay! But you love the ephemeral,

21 and forsake the Hereafter.

20–21 These verses transition from the second-person singular, in which the Prophet is addressed, to the second-person plural, addressing humanity in general. An almost identical verse is 76:27; see 76:27c. According to some other schools of recitation, they can be read in the third person plural, “But they love the ephemeral, and forsake the Hereafter.”

22 Faces that Day shall be radiant,

22–25 The contrast between the faces of the believers and those of the disbelievers in this passage is similar to that in 3:106; 80:38–41; 88:2–10.

23 gazing upon their Lord.

22–23 Most commentators take the assertion that believers will be gazing upon their Lord as a reference to the literal vision of God in the Hereafter (JJ), attested in many Sahālīth, among them, “Truly, you all will see your Lord with your own eyes” (IK, Q). When questioned by his Companions about the way in which people might see God, the Prophet said, “Are you harmed by seeing the sun and the moon when there are no clouds beneath them?” When his Companions replied, “No,” the Prophet said, “You shall see your Lord in that manner” (IK). In a similar account, he said, “Truly, you will see your Lord just as you see this moon!” (IK, Q). The “vision of God” to which these aḥādīth attest is taken by many as a matter of belief that no one can deny (IK), but a minority argue that this verse should be interpreted in light of 6:103, Sight comprehends Him not, when 6:103 is seen as definitive (mubkam) and 75:23 as symbolic (mutashābih; Z; see 3:7c), thus indicating that the vision of God is not in fact attainable or that it is only metaphorical. According to some, the vision of God, which also means direct knowledge of God, is the highest Paradise. In this regard, the Prophet is reported to have said, “When the people of the Garden enter the Garden, God says, ‘Do you desire that I increase you in anything?’ They say, ‘Didst Thou not brighten our faces? Didst Thou not admit us to the Garden and save us from the Fire?’” Then the Prophet said, “Then God removes the veil, and they are given nothing more beloved to them than gazing upon their Lord” (Āl, IK). In this vein, al-Tustarī is reported to have said, “The reward for deeds is Paradise, and the reward for the realization of God’s Oneness (tawḥīd) is the vision of God” (ST). In relating this realization to love, al-Tustarī is also reported to have said, “Whosoever has been slain by his love [for God], his recompense will be the vision of Him.” While many take this verse and the aḥādīth cited above as a reference to the vision of God on the Day of Resurrection, in Paradise, or both, others maintain that for those of high spiritual attainment the vision of God can be achieved in both this life and the Hereafter (AJ). Yet it is not attainable save by gaining God’s love and intimacy, which themselves can only be attained through knowledge (maʿrifah). Such love and knowledge can in turn only be attained by constantly reflecting upon God and remembering Him, which requires that the love of this world be erased from the heart (Aj). For those who can achieve this state, “they are immersed in witnessing His Beauty, and thus veiled to all that is other than Him” (Aj).

24 And faces that Day shall be scowling,

25 knowing that a spine-crushing calamity will befall them.
24–25 In Quranic usage, the face is often taken to indicate the true nature, or the essence, of someone. For similar descriptions of the faces of the disbelievers, see 3:106; 10:27; 27:90; 80:40–42; 88:2–7. Regarding the Face of God and the symbolism of “face” in general, see 28:88c; 55:26–27c.

26 Nay! But when it reaches the collarbones,

26 Nay translates the emphatic particle kallā, which can also be read in the affirmative, meaning “truly” or “indeed.” It refers to the soul, and its reaching the collarbones refers to the moment of death when the soul is about to leave the body (see also 56:83). When kallā is read in the negative, the verse indicates that at the moment of death one will be informed of the truth and will not be able to deny it. When kallā is read in the affirmative, the verse indicates there is no doubt that the soul will leave the body (IK).

27 and it is said, “Who will [make him] ascend?”

28 And he knows for certain that it is the parting;

27–28 These verses could be taken as a reference to the rising of the soul and thus to the angels of mercy or the angels of punishment that will remove the spirit from the body (Āl, Ṭ), as in 6:61–62: He sends guardians over you, till, when death comes unto one of you, our messengers (i.e., angels) take him, and they neglect not their duty. Then they are returned unto God, their true Master. Some maintain that v. 27 communicates the words of the angels of death meaning, “Who is it that will make him ascend?” (Z)—the angels of mercy in the case of believers or the angels of punishment in the case of disbelievers (Q). Alternately, they may be seen as referring to the body, thus mirroring the words of those around a dying person who say, “Who will cure him?” (IK, Q, Ṭ). In v. 28, the parting refers to the parting from all the things of this world (Ṭ) or the parting of the spirit from the body (Āl).
and the shank is intertwined with the shank.

This verse has several interpretations: that one shank will be intertwined with the other when one is wrapped in one’s funeral shroud (Āl, IK, JJ, Ṭ, Z); that the severity of entering the Hereafter is intertwined with the severity of leaving the life of this world (Āl, JJ, Ṭ, Z); that the last of the days of this world are intertwined with the first of the days of the next (IK, Ṭ); that the state of death is intertwined with the state of life; or that human beings are intertwined with one another so that people cannot move their own legs. For the idiomatic use of shank, see 68:42c.

Unto thy Lord that Day is the driving.

According to some commentators, this verse refers to either the manner in which God drives the soul from the body at the moment of death or the manner in which God drives the soul toward the Final Judgment (JJ). Others say that it is a challenge, meaning, “Who will heal him?” (Q, Ṭ). Still others say that it indicates the return of the body to the earth, as in a hadith qudsî where God is reported to say, “Return My servants to the earth, for verily, I have created them from it, I return them into it, and from it will I bring them forth another time” (IK).

For he neither confirmed nor prayed, but he denied and turned away,

He refers to Abū Jahl or Ādī ibn Rabîʿah (see 75:3c; Q). He did not confirm the revelation and the prophethood of Muhammad. Alternatively, “confirmed” (Ṣaddaqa) can be understood to mean that he did not give charity (Ṣaddaqa mālahu; Q, Z).
then went to his people swaggering.

33 This verse is similar to 83:30–32, which says of those who would mock the Prophet: And when they passed them, they would wink at one another. And when they returned to their people, they would return blithely. And when they saw them, they said, “Truly these are astray!” (also see 2:14; 84:13–14).

So nearer to you! And nearer!

Then nearer to you! And nearer!

34–35 These verses mean, “That to which you are averse is now nearer to you” (JJ), or the punishment is now nearer (Iṣ). According to some commentators, vv. 34–35 could also be rendered, “So woe to you! And woe! Then woe to you! And woe!” (Ṭs, Z). This is then interpreted by some as a direct address to Abū Jahl, one of the Prophet’s staunchest adversaries, meaning, “‘Woe to you’ for what you will witness on the Day of Badr [when Abū Jahl was slain in battle by the Muslims]. ‘And woe’ to you in the grave. ‘Then woe to you’ on the Day of Resurrection. ‘And woe’ to you in the Fire” (Ṭs). It can also be taken as a more general address to all those who disbelieve and swagger in arrogance (IK).

Does man suppose that he would be left aimless?

36 This verse asks, “Do people suppose that they would be left to their own devices without being obligated to follow a revealed religion and without being held accountable?” (JJ). Left aimless could also be understood to mean “neglected,” in which case it refers to those who doubt they will be resurrected (IK).
Was he not a drop of semen emitted?

Then he was a blood clot; whereupon He created, then fashioned, and made from him the two genders, male and female.

Is not such a one able to give life to the dead?

This is one of several passages that cite the phases of life from gestation to adulthood as proof of God’s Omnipotence and especially of His ability to resurrect; see also 18:37; 22:5–6c; 23:13–16; 35:11; 40:67; 76:2; 80:18–22. It is reported that when the Prophet recited, Is not such a one able to give life to the dead? he would say “Yea!” (JJ) and that he counseled others to do the same.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
According to most scholars, al-Insān was revealed in Madinah (Q), although some maintain that all but v. 24 were revealed in Madinah (Bg, Ṭṣ), and others maintain that vv. 23–31 were revealed in Makkah (Q, Ṭṣ). A minority maintain that the entire sūrah was revealed in Makkah (Aj, Ṭṣ). The sūrah takes its title from the mention of man in the first verse. It is also commonly called, after its first two words, Hal atā, “Has There Not Come,” and is sometimes known as al-Dahr, “Endless Time.” Another name is al-Abrār, “The Pious,” for its discussion of the rewards due to the pious in vv. 5–22. It is reported that the Prophet would often recite this sūrah along with Sūrah 32, al-Sajdah, during the early morning prayer (fajr) on Friday (IK).

According to most Shiite and some Sunni sources, vv. 5–22 were revealed in relation to the family of the Prophet: ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Fāṭimah, Ḥasan, and Ḥusayn. The account related with slight variation by al-Ṭabrisī, al-Qurṭubī, al-Ālūsī, and others is that Ḥasan and Ḥusayn were sick, and the Prophet and a group of followers came to visit them. They suggested that ʿAlī make a vow to God in supplicating for their recovery. So ʿAlī, Fāṭimah, and Fizzah, their house helper, vowed that if Ḥasan and Ḥusayn recovered, they would fast for three days (according to some, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn made the same vow). After a short while both of them recovered.
Therefore, the family fasted the first day. As they were in dire need of food, ʿAlī borrowed some barley with which they would break the fast, and Fāṭimah ground one-third of it into flour and baked some bread. When they were preparing to break their fast that evening, an indigent person came to their door and said, “Peace be upon you, the Household of Muhammad. I am a needy Muslim; please give me some food. May God bestow upon you, in kind, from Divine Sustenance.” All of them gave him their share. That night, they had only water. The following day they fasted again. Then an orphan came to the door. Once more, they forfeited their bread and ate nothing, only drinking water. The third day, they fasted again. This time a captive came to their house, and they repeated their charity.

On the fourth day, ʿAlī took ḥasan and ḥusayn with him to see the Prophet. When the Prophet observed them trembling with hunger, he said, “It grieves me to see you in this condition.” Then he stood up and walked with them. When he arrived at their home, he found Fāṭimah praying. Her stomach was sunk into her backbone, and her eyes had become sunken too. The Prophet was greatly affected. At this moment Gabriel descended and said, “O Muhammad, receive this sūrah. God congratulates you for having such a family.” And then Gabriel recited this sūrah.

① Has there come upon man a span of time in which he was a thing unremembered? ② Truly We created man from a drop of mixed fluid that We may test him, and We endowed him with hearing, seeing. ③ Truly We guided him upon the way, be he grateful or ungrateful. ④ We have surely prepared for the disbelievers chains, shackles, and a blazing flame. ⑤ Truly the pious drink of a cup mixed with camphor, ⑥ a fountain whereof drink the servants of God, while they make it gush forth abundantly. ⑦ They fulfill their vows and fear a day whose evil is widespread, and give food, despite loving it, to the indigent, the orphan, and the captive. “We feed you only for the Face of God. We do not desire any recompense or thanks from you. Truly we fear from our Lord a grim, calamitous day.” So God has shielded them from the evil of that Day, bestowed upon them radiance and joy, and rewarded them for having been patient with a Garden and with silk. Therein they recline upon couches, seeing neither sun nor bitter cold. Its shade shall be close above them, and its clusters shall be made to hang low. And vessels of silver and goblets of crystal are brought round for them— silvern crystal that they have measured out with due measure. Therein they are given to drink of a cup mixed with ginger, a spring therein named Salsabīl. Immortal youths wait upon them; when you see them you would suppose them to be scattered pearls. And when thou seest, there thou wilt see bliss and a great kingdom. Upon them are garments of fine green silk and rich brocade. They are adorned with silvern bracelets and their Lord shall give them to drink of a drink most pure. Truly this is a reward for you, and your endeavoring is held in gratitude. Truly We have sent down the Quran upon thee as a revelation. So be patient with thy Lord’s judgment and obey neither sinner nor disbeliever among them. And invoke the Name of thy Lord morning and evening, prostrate unto Him during the night, and glorify Him by night at length. Truly they love the ephemeral and put a weighty day behind them. We created them and made firm their frames; and whenever We will, We shall exchange them for others like them. Truly this is a reminder; so let him who will, take a way unto his Lord. And you do not will but that God wills. Truly God is Knowing, Wise. He causes whomsoever He will to enter into His Mercy. And as for the wrongdoers, He has prepared for them a painful punishment.
Commentary

1 Has there come upon man a span of time in which he was a thing unremembered?

   1 In both vv. 1 and 2, man (insān) refers to Adam, all of humanity (R), or both. As translated, the verse should be taken as a rhetorical question, either indicating that there has never been a time when human beings were not known to God (Qu) or emphasizing that there was indeed a time when man was a thing unknown, meaning nonexistent. The verse could also be translated, “There has come upon man,” which is taken by most as a reference to the time when Adam was not yet fully formed (JJ, Q, R, Ṭ’s) or more generally to the time when humanity had not yet come into existence (R).

2 Truly We created man from a drop of mixed fluid that We may test him, and We endowed him with hearing, seeing.

   2 A drop of mixed fluid (cf. 16:4; 18:37; 22:5; 35:11; 36:77; 40:67; 53:46; 75:37; 80:19) refers to the mixing of the male and female fluids (IK). This is one of several verses that remind human beings of the base origins of their physical nature; see also 86:6–7c. That We may test him could also be read as a new sentence: “We will test him” (JJ). The gifts of hearing and sight are part of the test, as they may be used for obedience or disobedience (IK); those who do not use them properly have eyes with which they see not, and they have ears with which they hear not (7:179; also see 7:198; 10:43). In this vein, the verse may also indicate that the physical nature, that which comes from a drop of mixed fluid, is created for the purpose of being tested and tried. Regarding the manner in which human beings are tested, see commentary on 29:2–3; 67:2.

3 Truly We guided him upon the way, be he grateful or ungrateful.
3 This verse is similar to 90:8–10: Did We not make for him two eyes, a tongue, and two lips, and guide him upon the two highways? (R). Both passages indicate that God provides guidance for those who have eyes to see and ears to hear, and that each person is thus responsible for the state of his or her own soul. The guidance provided by God could be through the human intellect (R), the messengers that God sends (JJ), or the many signs in revelation, in the created order, and within the human being; see 41:53c. Grateful or ungrateful indicates being either happy or wretched (IK), or a believer or a disbeliever, as in 18:29: It is the truth from your Lord! So whosoever will, let him believe, and whosoever will, let him disbelieve.

4 We have surely prepared for the disbelievers chains, shackles, and a blazing flame.

5 Truly the pious drink of a cup mixed with camphor,

4–5 These two verses express the disparate ends of those who are grateful (v. 5) and those who are ungrateful (v. 4) for the guidance God has provided. Regarding the chains and shackles that will be placed upon the disbelievers in the Hereafter, see 40:70–72c.

5–22 These verses are said to have been revealed about the family of the Prophet; see the introduction to this sūrah.

6 a fountain whereof drink the servants of God, while they make it gush forth abundantly.

5–6 The pious translates al-abrār (sing. barr), which indicates something that is broad, ample, and expansive, thus connoting beneficence, magnanimity, and associated virtues. Regarding the meaning of the pious and piety (birr), see 2:44c. Birr can also be attributed to God, as in 52:28, Truly He is the Righteous (al-Birr), the Merciful, and as when one says, Allāhu yaburru biʿibādihi, meaning, “God is righteous unto His servant.” Here cup refers to what the cup contains, the paradisal wine (JJ); see also 37:45–47; 78:34c. In medieval times, camphor was used widely for sweet and savory dishes. It is also thought to have cooling properties. According to some, this is the same wine whose seal is musk (83:26; T). That they make it gush forth abundantly indicates that the servants of God are able to partake of it as they will and that it flows wherever they wish (IK, R, T). From one perspective, while the pious drink of a cup mixed with camphor, the servants of God drink directly from a fountain that is pure and unmixed. Interpreted as a spiritual symbol, those who drink what is mixed are lovers of the Divine Attributes, while the pure spring is for lovers of the Divine Essence, whose love endures no matter which Attribute of God they experience (K).

7 They fulfill their vows and fear a day whose evil is widespread,

7 In the context of the occasion of revelation provided in the sūrah introduction, fulfill their vows refers to the perseverance of ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib and his family in continuing to fulfill their vow to fast three days even in the face of great hunger. Others interpret it as a reference to fulfilling the covenant made with God before the creation of the world (see 7:172c; K) or to being obedient toward God and fulfilling the obligations of religion (T).

8 and give food, despite loving it, to the indigent, the orphan, and the captive.

8 Despite loving it can also be interpreted to mean “out of love for Him.” Together the two interpretations indicate the manner in which this world is transcended by overcoming love for it and focusing love entirely upon God. In this vein, 3:92 states, You will never attain piety till you spend from that which you love. And whatever you spend, truly God knows it.

Regarding the feeding of orphans, see 2:83, 177, 215; 4:2–3, 8–10, 127; 6:152. According to a ḥadīth, “The indigent is not one who goes among the people asking them for a mouthful or two or a date or two; rather, the indigent is one who has not enough to satisfy his needs and whose condition is not known to others, that others may give him charity, and who does not beg of people.” The captive refers to prisoners of war (IK, T). At this time, the Muslims did not have prisons in which to keep captives from among their adversaries. The Prophet thus distributed the captives among the Muslims of Madinah and instructed them to care for the captives. As resources were scarce for many in Madinah, some of them could not feed the captives who had been entrusted to their care and some of the captives were free to seek food from other sources. This verse thus encourages charity toward those non-Muslims, even those who may have opposed the Muslims (see also 2:271; 60:8).

9 “We feed you only for the Face of God. We do not desire any recompense or thanks from you.

The words spoken by the pious in vv. 9–10 are most likely said to themselves, but can also be understood as said out loud to those whom they feed. In Arabic “face” is understood as a reference to the true nature of a thing. The Face of God is thus seen as a reference to the Divine Essence or to the Divine Essence, Attributes, and Qualities (K), or that aspect of the Divine Reality that is turned to creation. To perform charitable acts for the Face of God indicates seeking only to please God out of love for God, rather than seeking a reward for oneself (K; for a discussion of the Face of God, see 28:88c; 55:26–27c). Others, however, maintain that there is a juxtaposition in these verses, indicating that they do seek recompense from God, but not from anyone other than God (IK), as in 2:272: Whatever good you spend, it is for yourselves, when you spend only seeking the Face of God (see also 30:38–39).

10 Truly we fear from our Lord a grim, calamitous day.”

Grim translates ‘abūs, which literally means “frowning,” and is understood to mean that the severity of this day causes the disbelievers to frown (Āl, Q). Calamitous translates qamṭarīr, which is interpreted to mean “long” (Āl, Q) and is also understood by many to indicate a more severe state of frowning.
than ‘abūs or to indicate that it enfolds evil upon evil (Āl).

11 So God has shielded them from the evil of that Day, bestowed upon them radiance and joy, 11 According to some, radiance is what appears on the faces of the pious, while joy is in their hearts, as in 80:38–39: Faces that Day shall be shining, radiant, laughing, joyous (IK).

12 and rewarded them for having been patient with a Garden and with silk.

12 That human beings are rewarded for patience and constancy is a central Quranic theme. In this life, God provides signs for all who are patient, thankful (31:31; 34:19; 42:33) and God is with the patient (2:153, 249; 8:46), while in the Hereafter those who are patient shall be paid their reward in full without reckoning (39:10) and none shall receive it save the patient (28:80); see also 2:177; 3:120, 125; 11:11, 49, 115; 12:90; 13:22; 16:96; 29:59; 41:34–35. It is also reported that the angels greet the inhabitants of the Garden saying, Peace be upon you because you were patient (13:24; see also 25:75; 28:54).

13 Therein they recline upon couches, seeing neither sun nor bitter cold.

13 Bitter cold translates zamharīr, which is understood to mean a cold icy wind and can also mean “the moon,” thus meaning that the Garden will be bright without any sun or moon (JJ). In either understanding, there is an allusion to the temperate state of Paradise, where extremes are not felt on either end, as opposed to Hell, where there is both bitter cold and scorching heat. When zamharīr is understood as the moon, there is also an allusion to an eternal twilight or shade, in which everything radiates with a subtle beauty like that just after sunset or just before sunrise. Many also understand zamharīr to be a special state where sinful descendants of the Prophet, who are vouchsafed to be saved from the fires of Hell, will go in the Hereafter.

14 Its shade shall be close above them, and its clusters shall be made to hang low.

14 For the connotations of the Quranic use of shade, see 56:30c. Regarding the clusters of the Garden (see also 55:54; 69:23), it is reported that when the Prophet was upon his deathbed, he said to his Companions, “Verily, I saw the Garden and came upon a cluster of grapes. Had I taken it, you would have eaten of it so long as the world remained.”

15 And vessels of silver and goblets of crystal are brought round for them—

16 silvern crystal that they have measured out with due measure.

15–16 The goblets are made of silver that is transparent like crystal (JJ). Measured out with due measure (cf. 25:2) indicates that individuals will have measured for them exactly what each requires, neither more nor less (JJ).

17 Therein they are given to drink of a cup mixed with ginger,

17 Ginger, which translates zanjabil, can be taken as a reference to the tuber that was considered a delicacy by the Arabs (Bd) and was used as both a medicine and a spice, though it is said that the ginger of Paradise does not resemble that of this world (Sh). Zanjabil can also be understood as a proper name for one of the springs of Paradise from which drink those brought nigh a spring therein named Salsabīl.

According to some, in this context named means “described” (Ṭ). The precise meaning of Salsabīl is debated. While some understand it as a proper name, others take it to mean that the water flows well (Iṣ, Ṭ) or is easy to swallow and refreshing for the throat (K). Still others say that Salsabīl is a contraction of sal (“seek” or “request”) and sabīl (“a way”), thus meaning “seek a way [to the Garden]” (Iṣ, R).

Immortal youths wait upon them; when you see them you would suppose them to be scattered pearls.

Immortal translates mukhalladūn, which can also mean “those who wear earrings”; see also 56:17. The youths will appear as scattered pearls because of their beauty and nobility (Ṭ).

And when thou seest, there thou wilt see bliss and a great kingdom.

A great kingdom is said to indicate one that does not cease to exist (Ṭ’s).

Upon them are garments of fine green silk and rich brocade. They are adorned with silvern bracelets and their Lord shall give them to drink of a drink most pure.

Regarding the silk and brocade (cf. 44:53) that adorn the inhabitants of Paradise, see 18:31c. Whereas the paradisal beverages mentioned in vv. 15–18 are served by immortal youths, here their Lord shall give them to drink directly with no intermediary. Most pure translates ṭahūr, an emphatic form employed to emphasize the contrast between the wine of this world and the wine of the Hereafter. Invoking another perspective, Maybudī writes: “Whoever has no wine of love today will not have the drink most pure tomorrow. Today they swallow the wine of love from the cup of gnosism; tomorrow they drink the drink most pure in the presence of the Forgiving King—today the wine of love in the paradise of gnosism, tomorrow the drink most pure in the paradise of Contentment (riḍwān).”

Ṭahūr can also be taken as an active participle, meaning “purifying.” Thus some say it is a drink through which God removes vice from the heart (Sh). It is reported that the sixth Shiite Imam, Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq, said of this drink, “It purifies them of all that is other than God” (Ţs).

22 Truly this is a reward for you, and your endeavoring is held in gratitude.

22 This refers to the drink most pure (v. 21), or to all of the rewards mentioned in the preceding verses, or to the bliss that derives from these rewards. Endeavoring refers to all the good deeds that one has done; that it is held in gratitude indicates that such deeds have been accepted by God, one of Whose Attributes is Thankful (see 2:158; 4:147; 35:30, 34; 42:23; IK, Sh, Źs).

23 Truly We have sent down the Quran upon thee as a revelation.

23 This verse is understood as an indication of the gradual manner in which God revealed the Quran, that is, in periodic installments rather than all at once (JJ, Źs). Regarding the nature of the revelation and its stages, see the essay “The Islamic View of the Quran.”
24) So be patient with thy Lord’s judgment and obey neither sinner nor disbeliever among them.

24 This verse is taken as counsel to the Prophet to be patient in the face of the opposition from ʿUtbah ibn Rabīʿah and al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah, two leaders of the Quraysh, both of whom said to the Prophet, “Abandon this affair of yours” (JJ, Ṭṣ). Sinner and disbeliever can thus be understood both as a specific reference to these two men and as a more general reference to all sinners and disbelievers (JJ).

25) And invoke the Name of thy Lord morning and evening, 26 prostrate unto Him during the night, and glorify Him by night at length.

25–26 These verses enjoin mentioning the Name of God during the daily prayers (Aj, JJ, Ṭṣ) or remembering God at every moment (Aj). In the context of the previous verse, they can be understood as counsel not to be overly concerned with the tribulations of this world, but to remember God always, as in 15:97–98: And certainly We know that thy breast is straitened because of what they say. So hymn the praise of thy Lord, and be among those who prostrate (Aj). In this latter sense, many Sufis take v. 25 as an injunction to invoke the Supreme Divine Name, Allāh (Aj). Glorify Him by night at length enjoins the supererogatory practice of night vigil and prayer. For other references to night vigil, see 11:114; 20:130; 21:20; 25:63–64; 50:40; 52:49; 73:2, 6, 20. Regarding its significance and historical development, see 73:1–2c; 73:20c.

27) Truly they love the ephemeral and put a weighty day behind them.

27 As with its near analog, 75:20–21, this verse indicates the manner in which preoccupation with the things of this world distracts one from the Hereafter (IK), and from the remembrance of God, as in 17:18–19: Whosoever would desire the ephemeral, We hasten for him therein whatsoever We will for whomsoever We desire. Then We appointed Hell for him, wherein he shall burn, blameworthy, banished. And whosoever desires the Hereafter, and endeavors for it earnestly, and is a believer, it is they whose efforts shall be appreciated.

28) We created them and made firm their frames; and whensoever We will, We shall exchange them for others like them.

28 This verse indicates either that God can replace any group of people with another (IK, R, Ṭs), as in 6:133, If He will, He can remove you, and in your place appoint whomsoever He will to succeed you, or that God can resurrect people in the Hereafter; see also 4:133; 14:19–20; 17:49–51; 35:16–17; 56:61.

29) Truly this is a reminder; so let him who will, take a way unto his Lord.

29–30 These verses and a closely related passage in 81:28–29 present a notable contrast between human free will and Divine predeterminism. On the one hand, Let him who will, take a way unto his Lord could be understood to indicate that human beings are free to decide between right and wrong and to choose their own way (see also 18:29). Yet on the other hand, You do not will but that God wills (or “You do not will except as God wills”) could be understood to indicate that the final determination is in God’s Hands alone. A moderate position holds that there is neither absolute free will nor absolute determinism. God has willed that human beings have the ability to will, but could remove it any moment. God wills that human beings will, but does not necessarily determine the content of what they will, meaning that human beings have a limited range of freedom willed by God and that they are ultimately responsible for their own acts; for the extensive debates regarding the relationship between free will and determinism, see 54:49c.

29 Cf. 73:19. This can refer to this sūrah (Āl, IK, JJ, Ṭs), this particular group of verses (Āl), or the entire Quran, in which case it refers to the “message” (risālah; Ṭs). See 73:19c.

And you do not will but that God wills. Truly God is Knowing, Wise.

In other schools of recitation, you do not will is read “they do not will.”

He causes whomsoever He will to enter into His Mercy. And as for the wrongdoers, He has prepared for them a painful punishment.

Here His Mercy is interpreted by many as a reference to the Garden (Ṭs), while others understand it to mean that God relents unto human beings so that they may die in a state of repentance, forgives their sins, and admits them to the Garden (Ṭ). In contrast, the wrongdoers are understood to be those who die without repenting (Ṭ). This verse can be seen as a continuation of the message in v. 3, in which God is said to have guided people upon the way, after which they may choose to be either grateful or ungrateful; God allows those who are grateful to enter into His Mercy and has prepared . . . a painful punishment for those who are ungrateful.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Al-Mursalāt is an early Makkan sūrah, although some early commentators, such as Ibn ʿAbbās and al-Qatādah, maintain that v. 48 is Madinan (Āl, Q). It takes its name from the mention of those sent forth in the first verse and is also known as al-ʿUrf after the second word in the first verse, ʿurfān (Āl), which can mean in succession. According to a ḥadīth: “While we were with the Messenger of God in a cave, the sūrah By those sent forth was revealed to him, and we received it directly from his mouth as soon as he had received the revelation. Suddenly a snake came out, and the Messenger of God said, ‘Get it and kill it!’ We ran to kill it, but it outstripped us. The Messenger of God said, ‘It has escaped your evil, as you too have escaped its evil’” (Āl, Q).

After a series of oaths and reminders of the Last Day (vv. 1–6) and descriptions of its signs (vv. 8–14) is the first appearance of the phrase Woe that Day to the deniers! (v. 15), which thereafter serves as a refrain repeated ten times in the sūrah. The sūrah then affirms that the guilty of all generations will meet the same end (vv. 16–19) and points to the stages of gestation as a sign of God’s Power (vv. 20–24), followed by a reference to the created order as a sign of God’s Power and Mercy (vv. 25–28). It then addresses the disbelievers, ordering them toward that which they deny and warning them of the punishments such denial entails (vv. 29–40). This is subsequently contrasted to the rewards of the reverent and the virtuous (vv. 41–45). The sūrah concludes with a final address to the disbelievers and criticism of their failure to pray and to believe (vv. 46–50).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 By those sent forth in succession! 2 By the storming tempests! 3 By the spreaders spreading! 4 By the discerners discerning! 5 And by those who bring forth the Reminder, 6 to excuse or to warn, 7 surely what you are promised will befall. 8 So when the stars are blotted out, 9 and when the sky is riven asunder, 10 when the mountains are scattered, 11 and when the messengers are slated, 12 for what day is it appointed? 13 For the Day of the Division. 14 And what shall apprise thee of the Day of Division? 15 Woe that Day to the deniers! 16 Did We not destroy those of old, 17 then make those of later times follow them? 18 Thus do We deal with the guilty. 19 Woe that Day to the deniers! 20 Did We not create you from a base fluid, 21 then lodge it in a secure dwelling place 22 for a known measure? 23 Thus do We determine; what excellent determiners! 24 Woe that Day to the deniers! 25 Did We not make the earth a receptacle 26 for the living and the dead? 27 And We placed therein firm, soaring mountains and gave you sweet water to drink. 28 Woe that Day to the deniers! 29 Away to that which you used to deny! 30 Away to a threefold shadow 31 that provides no shade, nor avails against the flame. 32 Indeed, it throws up sparks like massive tree trunks, 33 as though they were yellow camels. 34 Woe that Day to the deniers! 35 That is the Day on which they speak not; 36 nor is permission granted them, such that they might offer excuses. 37 Woe that Day to the deniers! 38 This is the Day of Division, “We have gathered you and those of old.” 39 So if you have a scheme, then scheme against Me! 40 Woe that Day to the deniers! 41 Truly the reverent shall be amid shade and springs, 42 and fruits such as they desire. 43 “Eat and drink in enjoyment for that which you used to do.” 44 Thus do We recompense the virtuous. 45 Woe that Day to the deniers! 46 “Eat and enjoy yourselves a little; truly you are guilty.” 47 Woe that Day to the deniers! 48 And when it is said unto them, “Bow!” they bow not. 49 Woe that Day to the deniers! 50 So in what discourse after this will they believe?
Commentary

1 By those sent forth in succession!

1–5 Many interpret these first five verses as references to different types of angels (Āl, IK, Q), while al-Ṭabarī allows that v. 1 may refer to both the wind and the angels (Ṭ). Vv. 1–5 can also be understood as allusions to forms of knowledge and inspiration that God sends into the hearts of human beings.

1 In accord with the interpretation of vv. 2–3 as references to storms and violent winds, those sent forth is understood by many as a reference to the winds following one another in succession (JJ, Q, Ṭ), but it may also refer to the prophets and messengers who follow one another in succession (IK, Q).

2 By the storming tempests!

2 Storming tempests means the wind (Ṭ).

3 By the spreaders spreading!

3 Spreaders refers to the wind (IK, JJ, Ṭ), the rain (IK, Ṭ), or the angels who spread God’s Blessings and revelations (Āl, Ṭ) or who spread their wings (Aj). Al-Ṭabarī allows that the verse does not specify one of these to the exclusion of others, as the wind spreads the clouds, the rain spreads over the earth, and the angels spread God’s revealed books.

4 By the discerners discerning!

4 The discerners are the angels, who discriminate between truth and falsehood (Q, Ṭ), and between what is lawful and what is unlawful (Q), or the Quran, which does the same (JJ, Ṭ). Al-Ṭabarî maintains that this verse can refer simultaneously to the angels, the Quran, and anything that distinguishes between truth and falsehood.

5 And by those who bring forth the Reminder,

This verse refers to the angels who descend with the revelation, casting it upon the prophets and messengers in various human collectivities (JJ, Ṭ).

6 to excuse or to warn,

The revelation that the angels bring from God to creation serves to both excuse, here meaning provide absolution and forgiveness, and warn (IK, Ṭ).

7 surely what you are promised will befall.

This is the answer to the oaths made in vv. 1–6. When the images in vv. 1–6 are taken as references to angels who bring various messages, the present verse indicates that through these angels human beings have been provided a clear message about what will befall them on the Day of Judgment and in the Hereafter (Ṭ). For similar verses, see 6:134; 51:5.

8 So when the stars are blotted out,

9 and when the sky is riven asunder,

8–9 Theses verses refer to the dissolution of the heavens at the end of time. The light of the stars fades (see also 81:2; 82:2), and the sky is rent asunder when the mountains are scattered,

Elsewhere it is said that the Day of Judgment is a day when the mountains are made like carded wool (70:9; 101:5) or heaps of shifting sand (73:14); for other references to mountains in the Quran’s apocalyptic descriptions, see 18:47; 19:90; 20:105–6; 27:88; 52:10; 56:5–6; 69:14; 78:20; 81:3.

and when the messengers are slated,

Slated translates uqqitat, here indicating that the messengers are gathered together at an appointed moment, understood by most to be the Day of Resurrection (IK, Ṭ, Z). Uqqitat can also mean “postponed” (IK, Ṭ, Z), indicating the manner in which God does not punish humanity immediately, but grants them respite until an appointed time; see 3:178; 7:183–84; 13:32; 15:37–38; 22:44. Others understand uqqitat to mean “promised” (IK, Ṭ); in this vein, it is related to 39:69, which says that on the Day of Judgment the prophets and the witnesses will be brought forth to witness for or against humanity. For what day is it appointed? can also be read “Until what day is it postponed?” In both senses it is a rhetorical question that is answered in the following verse.

For the Day of Division.

And what shall apprise thee of the Day of Division?

The Day of Division (37:21; 44:40; 77:38; 78:17; see also 10:28;
30:14) is another name for the Day of Judgment, indicating the manner in which the believers and the disbelievers will be definitively divided from one another (Z) and that the division between true and false, good and evil, light and dark will be made clear.

15 Woe that Day to the deniers!

This is the first occurrence of a refrain that is repeated ten times in this sūrah. Each instance can be taken as a repetition for emphasis in reference to those who deny the Resurrection (Ṭ) or those who deny both the Resurrection and God. The way the warning builds through repetition increases the sense of danger and urgency. Alternately, each can be viewed in context as a reference to one of the many things that disbelievers may deny (Q on v. 49).

16 Did We not destroy those of old,

17 then make those of later times follow them?

18 Thus do We deal with the guilty.

19 Woe that Day to the deniers!

16–19 Those of old refers to the disbelievers among peoples of earlier ages from the time of Adam until that of Muhammad (Q, Sh). Here the guilty refers to the disbelievers among the Quraysh (Q) or to all who are guilty (N, Sh). According to some, the first instance of Woe that Day to the deniers! (v. 15) warns of the punishment in the Hereafter, while the second instance (v. 19) warns of the punishment in this world (Sh).

20 Did We not create you from a base fluid, then lodge it in a secure dwelling place for a known measure?

Thus do We determine; what excellent determiners!

Woe that Day to the deniers!

20–24 The creation of the human being from a base fluid (cf. 32:8) is cited in several verses to remind people of their humble origins and as testimony to God’s creative power and ability to resurrect human beings in the Hereafter; see commentary on 32:7–11. The secure dwelling place is a reference to the womb (IK, َۤ), while a known measure refers to the phases of gestation outlined in 22:5 and 23:14. An argument implied here and elsewhere is that those who do not recognize the nature of their own creation deny God and are thus a manifest adversary (16:4; 36:77) to God and to themselves. This third occurrence of Woe that Day in v. 24 can be read in connection with v. 23 and thus as a warning regarding the manner in which God determines (Sh).

Did We not make the earth a receptacle for the living and the dead?

25–26 These verses are understood to be a reference to the earth as a place of shelter for the living and as a container for the bodies of the dead. Thus al-Shaâbi is reported to have said, “Its interior is for your dead, and its surface is for your living” (IK).

And We placed therein firm, soaring mountains and gave you sweet water to drink.

27 In this context, the reference to both mountains and sweet water is understood to mean that God’s creation of these is as wondrous as the Resurrection, were one to reflect (Q, Sh).

28 Woe that Day to the deniers!

28 This fourth occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain can be seen as a warning to those who fail to be thankful for the blessings mentioned in vv. 25–27.

29 Away to that which you used to deny!

30 Away to a threefold shadow

31 that provides no shade, nor avails against the flame.

29–31 These verses can be understood as an address to the disbelievers by God or the angels in the Hereafter, instructing the disbelievers to enter the punishment of the Fire, which they had denied (Sh). The threefold shadow refers to the smoke from the Fire of Hell. As the Quranic use of shade implies protection from heat and a comfortable state (see 56:30c), this passage implies that, although a shadow would seem to provide “shade,” this shadow will neither protect them nor comfort them in the Hereafter.

32 Indeed, it throws up sparks like massive tree trunks, 33 as though they were yellow camels.

34 Woe that Day to the deniers!

32–34 Massive tree trunks translates qaṣr, which can also mean, “huge castles.” In either translation, it is implied that the flames are larger than those anyone could expect to see in this life. Yellow camels can be understood to mean that they are large and long as well as yellow (Z). But this particular usage can also be taken as a reference to “dark camels,” who are called yellow (ṣufr), because there is a touch of yellow in their blackish hair (JJ, Sh). It is thus understood to mean that the Fire of Hell is pitch-black (Sh). In this way it has none of the positive properties associated with fire in this world. This fifth occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain in v. 34 can be seen more specifically as a reference to those who deny such attributes of the Fire (Sh).

35 That is the Day on which they speak not;

On that day, people will not be asked about their deeds, since they will have already been recorded (17:71; 18:49; 50:17–18; 69:19–29; 82:11–12). People will not be given the opportunity to testify for themselves. Rather, on that Day We shall seal their mouths. Their hands will speak to Us, and their feet will bear witness to that which they used to earn (36:65); and their ears, their eyes, and their skins will bear witness against them for that which they used to do (41:20).

36 nor is permission granted them, such that they might offer excuses.

As translated, this verse is understood to mean that the deniers are not permitted to speak, and when they seek to offer excuses, they admit instead their guilt (see 67:11). The second part of this verse could also be rendered “and they offer no excuses.” In this second reading, the negation that applies to the first part of the verse, nor is permission granted them (lā yuʾdhanu) is read as applying to the second part as well, “they offer no excuses” (yaʿtadhirūn; Q). From one perspective, people are unable to offer excuses because the reality of their deeds is completely manifest.

37 Woe that Day to the deniers!
37 This sixth occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain can be taken as another reference to those who deny this Day (N).

38 This is the Day of Division, “We have gathered you and those of old.”

38 For the Day of Division, see 77:13–14c. This verse refers to God’s gathering every generation of humanity together on a single open and barren plain for the Day of Judgment (see 18:47c; 20:106; 79:14c).

39 So if you have a scheme, then scheme against Me!

39 This is one of several verses intended to show the folly of the disbelievers by challenging them to challenge God or to see what happens when they attempt to operate outside of the limits that God has established, as in 22:15: Whosoever thinks that God will not help him in this world and the Hereafter, let him stretch out a rope to Heaven. Then let him sever it and see if his scheming removes that which enrages (see also 55:33).

40 Woe that Day to the deniers!

40 This seventh occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain can be seen as another reference to those who deny the Resurrection (N) or, in connection with the previous verse, as a reference to those who deny God’s Power and thus seek to scheme against Him.

41 Truly the reverent shall be amid shade and springs,

41 This verse is similar to 15:45. For the connotations of the Quranic use of shade, see 56:30c. Springs can be seen as a reference to the common motif that God will make the believers enter Gardens with rivers running below (3:195; 4:13, 57, 122; 5:12) and to the various types of springs and drinks mentioned in other sūrah (e.g., 76:5–6, 17–18; 83:25–28; 88:12).

and fruits such as they desire.

42 Cf. 52:22; 56:21. That the fruits of the Garden are available such as they desire indicates that they are available whenever believers wish, in contrast to this world where the availability of food and drink is determined by external circumstances (JJ). Several other verses also refer to the fruits of Paradise that will always be at the disposal of the believers (e.g., 37:42; 38:61; 43:73); see 36:57c.

43 See commentary on the identical verse in 52:19.

Thus do We recompense the virtuous.

Woe that Day to the deniers!

45 In relation to the previous verse, this eighth occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain could be seen as a reference to those who fall into despair (Sh), as such despair indicates denial of the manifold reward of good deeds.
46 Eat and enjoy yourselves a little; truly you are guilty.

46 These words, which God addresses to the disbelievers, are ironic. They allude to the respite that God grants the disbelievers, though they think it good, as they are able to enjoy . . . a little; in fact, it lets them dig a deeper hole for themselves, as in 31:24: We grant them enjoyment a little, then We compel them toward a grave punishment; see also 3:178; 10:69–70; 15:3; 16:55; 26:205–7; 29:66; 30:34c.

47 Woe that Day to the deniers!

47 This ninth occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain can be seen as a repetition of the previous occurrence (Sh) or as an indication that those who enjoy . . . a little with no thought to the consequences of their actions in effect deny that all they receive is from God.

48 And when it is said unto them, “Bow!” they bow not.

49 Woe that Day to the deniers!

48–49 The command to bow is understood as a command to perform the prayer, as bowing is a part of the canonical prayer. The Prophet is reported to have said, “There is no good in a religion that has no bowing and no prostration” (Āl, Q, Sh). V. 48 is said to have been revealed regarding some disbelievers who protested that the positions required for prayer were an insult (Q). Others say that this injunction refers to those who are called to prostrate on the Day of Judgment, but are not able to do so (Q, Sh; see 36:8c; 68:42c; 68:43c). In this vein, the tenth and final occurrence of the sūrah’s refrain in v. 49 would appear to indicate those who deny the commands and prohibitions of God (N, Sh), since the command to pray is considered foremost among the actions enjoined by God.

This verse asks, “So in what discourse other than this Quran will they believe?” It is similar to 45:6: These are the signs of God that We recite unto thee in truth. So in what discourse after God and His signs do they believe? Both verses can be understood to mean, “If they will not believe in revelation, then in what will they believe?” implying that those who reject revelation do not believe in anything real. Vv. 48 and 50 can be viewed as complementary; the first criticizes the disbelievers for failing to act in accord with the revelation, and the second, for failing to believe and understand in accord with the revelation.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Al-Nabaʾ, a late Makkan sūrah, takes its name from the mention of the Great Tiding (al-nabaʾ al-ʿāẓīm) in the second verse, which is understood by most as a reference to the Quran itself, or to the Day of Resurrection. It is also known as al-Muʿṣirāt, “The Rain Clouds,” and as al-Tasāʾul, “The Questioning of One Another” (Āl). The first title comes from v. 14, and the second refers to the theme of the first verses, in which the disbelievers are said to question one another regarding the Resurrection or the revelation of the Quran or both. According to Ibn ʿAjībah, insofar as the Great Tiding refers to the Resurrection, this sūrah is connected to the previous sūrah’s discussion of the Day of Division (77:13–14, 38), which is also a reference to the Day of Resurrection. Insofar as the Great Tiding refers to the Quran, this sūrah follows directly upon the last verse of the previous sūrah (Aj).

This sūrah can be seen as comprising three sections. Vv. 1–5 discuss the nature of those who do not believe in certain aspects of the Prophet Muhammad’s message. Given the content of the sūrah, it is most likely a reference to those who do not believe in the Resurrection. Rather than argue against their disbelief, vv. 6–16 point to all of those things that God has created as signs that should make the truth evident to those with intellects. Vv. 17–40 then discuss the advent of the Resurrection, referred to here as the Day of Division and as the Moment Appointed, and then the different ways in which the return to God will be experienced by believers and disbelievers when they are indeed divided.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 About what do they question one another? 2 About the Great Tiding, 3 regarding which they differ. 4 Nay, but they will know! 5 Then indeed they will know! 6 Did We not make the earth a resting place, 7 and the mountains stakes, 8 and create you in pairs, 9 and make your sleep repose, 10 and make the night a garment, 11 and the day for livelihood? 12 And [did We not] build above you seven firmaments, 13 and make a radiant lamp, 14 and send down water pouring from the rain clouds, 15 that We might produce grain and plants thereby, 16 and luxuriant gardens? 17 Truly the Day of Division is a Moment Appointed, 18 a day when the trumpet is blown and you come forth in throngs, 19 and the sky is opened as if it were gates, 20 and the mountains are set in motion as if they were a mirage. 21 Truly Hell lies in ambush, 22 a place unto which the rebellious return 23 to tarry therein for ages. 24 They taste therein neither coolness nor drink, 25 save boiling liquid and a cold, murky fluid, 26 a fitting recompense. 27 Truly they anticipated not a reckoning, 28 and denied Our signs with utter denial. 29 And everything have We recorded in a book. 30 So taste! For We shall not increase you in aught but punishment! 31 Truly the reverent shall have a place of triumph, 32 gardens and vineyards, 33 buxom maidens of like age, 34 and an overflowing cup. 35 They hear therein neither idle talk nor lying— 36 a recompense from thy Lord, a gift abounding— 37 the Lord of the heavens and the earth, and whatsoever is between them, the Compassionate, Whom they have no power to address. 38 That Day the Spirit and the angels stand in rows, none speaking, save one whom the Compassionate permits and who speaks aright. 39 That is the True Day. So let whosoever will, take a path of return unto his Lord. Truly We have warned you of a punishment nigh, on a day when a man beholds what his hands have sent forth, and the disbeliever says, “Oh, would that I were dust!”
Commentary

1 About what do they question one another?

1 They is interpreted to mean the Prophet’s tribe, the Quraysh (Q, R, Ṭ), most of whose leaders rejected Muhammad and the Quran at the time of the revelation of this verse, though this particular reference is not understood to limit the more general implications of the sūrah.

2 About the Great Tiding,

2 The Great Tiding (al-nabaʾ al-ʿaẓīm; cf. 38:67) refers to the Resurrection; the Quran itself (Q, Ṭ), called the Mighty Quran (al-qurʾān al-ʿaẓīm; 15:87); or the Prophet Muhammad (R). The content of the sūrah best supports the reference to the Resurrection in general or to the Day of Resurrection, which is also referred to as a tremendous day (yawm ʿaẓīm) when considered in relation to the punishment received by disbelievers (see, e.g., 6:15; 19:37; 26:189; 83:5).

3 regarding which they differ.

3 This verse is understood as an allusion to the distinction between two parties: those who accept and confirm the Quran and the Prophet and those who reject and deny them (Ṭ). Ashʿarite theologians, who oppose a metaphorical understanding of Resurrection, have viewed it as an allusion to the different degrees and modes of rejection and denial (Qu, R), since some believe in certain aspects of the message but not in others, and some believe in a spiritual resurrection but not in a bodily one.

Nay, but they will know!

Then indeed they will know!

4–5  Nay, translating the emphatic particle kallā, could alternately be rendered “truly” or “indeed,” as it is in v. 5. If the two verses are both addressed to the disbelievers, the repetition can be seen as emphasis; they can also be viewed as addressed to two groups: the first to the disbelievers, the second to the believers (Q, R, Ṭ). When both are viewed as an address to disbelievers, v. 4 can be seen as a reference to knowing the truth of the Resurrection and v. 5 to knowing the truth of the punishment; or v. 4 can be seen as a reference to the punishment in this world and v. 5 to the punishment in the Hereafter (R). If addressed to the two groups, vv. 21–30 would correspond to what the disbelievers will know, and vv. 31–36 to what the believers will know.

Did We not make the earth a resting place,

6  Like 22:2 and 27:61, this verse indicates both that God has made all that is upon the earth subservient to human beings (see, e.g., 22:65; 31:20) and that He has placed guidance upon the earth, as in 43:10: He it is Who made the earth a cradle for you and made paths for you therein, that haply you may be guided.

and the mountains stakes,

7  Several verses refer to God’s having made the mountains firm; see 21:30–31c. The mention of mountains here is also connected to the resting place in v. 6, for God has made places of refuge for you in the mountains (16:81) and in other verses mountains are referred to as places with dwellings and houses (see 7:74; 15:82; 26:149).

8 and create you in pairs,

Pairs (azwāj) could be a reference to the male and female, as in 53:45: And that He creates the two (zawjayn)—male and female, which are said to be “mates” (azwāj) created from a single soul (4:1; 7:189; 39:6). In this sense, this verse follows upon v. 6, for human beings find rest and repose in their mates, as in 30:21: And among His signs is that He created mates for you from among yourselves, that you might find rest in them, and He established affection and mercy between you (see also 7:189). The verse can also be seen as a reference to the creation of all things in pairs, as in 51:49, And of all things We created pairs, that haply you may remember, which is understood by some as a reference to the manner in which human beings can be said to know things through their opposites.

9 and make your sleep repose,

Sleep provides rest for the body and a break from external activity. Some relate this verse to 6:60, He it is Who takes your souls by night, in which the body is as if dead; for sleep as “a minor death,” see 6:60c; 39:42; and the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.”

10 and make the night a garment,

This verse can be seen as a continuation of v. 9, as He it is Who made the night for you, that you might rest therein (10:67), and He has made the night for repose (6:96). On the one hand, night as a garment implies that it is a protection and comfort. On the other hand, night allows the true nature of a person to manifest, as the cover of night facilitates the actions of those who incline toward wrongdoing. It also provides a stillness that facilitates devotion and vigil, as in 73:6: Truly the vigil of the night is firmest in tread and most upright for speech; for the importance of night vigil, see 11:114; 17:79; 20:130; 21:20; 25:63–64; 50:40; 52:49; 73:2, 6, 20; 76:26; 73:1–2c; 73:20c. In his Makkan Openings (al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyyah), Ibn ʿArabī mentions that the night is a cloak for “the people of the night” (aṣḥāb al-layl), because it covers them from others and creates a spiritual retreat (khalwah) for them.

11 and the day for livelihood?

11 When v. 9 is viewed in relation to 6:60, this verse can be viewed in relation to another phrase in 6:60, by day He resurrects you. Together vv. 9–11 indicate the cycles of rest and activity essential to the functioning of the created order. The alternation of night and day is referred to as an important sign in over two dozen verses; e.g., 24:44: God alternates the night and the day. Truly in that is a lesson for those possessed of sight; for vv. 9–11, cf. 25:47. For other verses that contrast night and day, see 27:86; 28:73; 40:61.

12 And [did We not] build above you seven firmaments,

12 Seven firmaments is a reference to the seven heavens (2:29; 17:44; 23:17; 41:12; 65:12; 67:3; 71:15). Firmaments translates shidād, which also means “strong, solid, and firm,” thus implying that the heavens have no fissure and are not subject to the vicissitudes of this world (R, Ṭ). For the significance of the seven heavens, see 23:17c.

13 and make a radiant lamp,

13 For v. 12–13, cf. 71:16. Radiant lamp is understood by most as a reference to the sun (Q, Ṭ, Ṭs), although some interpret it as a reference to the Prophet Muhammad, as in 33:45–46, where he is said to have been sent as a luminous lamp (see also 25:61).

14 and send down water pouring from the rain clouds, 14 Rain clouds, translating muʿṣirāt, is read by some as “the winds” that bring the rain clouds (Q, R, Ṭ). A small minority read it as a reference to “the heavens” (Ṭ).

15 that We might produce grain and plants thereby,

16 and luxuriant gardens?

15–16 God remains the primary cause for all things. Therefore, it is not the rain that produces grain, plants and gardens, as some are inclined to believe; rather, it is God Himself who does so by means of rain, since God made every living thing from water (21:30; see also 24:25; 25:54).

17 Truly the Day of Division is a Moment Appointed, 17 Cf. 44:40. The Day of Resurrection is referred to here and elsewhere (e.g., 44:40; 77:13–14; 77:38) as the Day of Division, because it provides the ultimate distinction between truth and falsehood, right and wrong, light and dark. It is a Moment Appointed because it is guaranteed, and God will not fail the tryst (3:9; 13:31; 39:20). For the Day of Division, see 77:13–14; 77:38.

18 a day when the trumpet is blown and you come forth in throngs, 18 In 39:68 the Archangel Seraphiel is said to blow the trumpet twice: at the first blast, all of creation will swoon (see 69:13); at the second, all souls will rise from their graves and be gathered before God (see 50:20–21; 64:9). This verse may refer to the fact that the trumpet is blown twice or to the second blowing of the trumpet (see 39:68c). Throngs (afwāj) is taken by some to indicate that human communities will come in “groups” (afwāj), with each community gathered behind its prophet (see 17:71c). After all souls are gathered, they will be divided according to those who must be reckoned for their bad deeds and those who are rewarded for their good deeds. When asked about the afwāj, the Prophet said that on the Day of Resurrection his community (ummah) would be resurrected in ten afwāj, which he then enumerated.

19 and the sky is opened as if it were gates,

19  Cf. 54:11: So We opened the gates of the sky with pouring water. The word translated sky and Heaven in these two verses is the same, *samā*³. Most interpret v. 19 as an allusion to the descent of the angels (IK, Q), as in 25:25, where it is referred to as the Day when the sky is split open with clouds and the angels are sent down. For a more extensive discussion of the opening of the sky or Heaven, see 39:73c.

20 and the mountains are set in motion as if they were a mirage.

20  Cf. 81:3. Several verses indicate that the mountains will be dispatched on the Day of Judgment, as in 27:88: And thou seest the mountains that thou dost suppose are solid pass away like clouds—the work of God, Who perfects all things; see also 18:47; 70:8–9; 73:14; 101:5.

21 Truly Hell lies in ambush,

22 a place unto which the rebellious return

21–22  Hell is the place to which those who rebel against the truth are sent. It will come upon them like an ambush when they die, because they had been oblivious to the truth in this world.
to tarry therein for ages.

23 For ages (ḥqāban) indicates periods of time. The vast majority of commentators maintain that it indicates Hell will be eternal, with one period following after another endlessly. Others say it indicates that, although Hell is “endless” in relation to our understanding of time; it is of limited duration, limited “ages,” in the absolute sense. The relativity of Hell in relation to the Absolute is alluded to in a famous ḥadīth, “On the Day of Judgment, those who deserve the Garden will enter the Garden, and those who deserve the Fire, the Fire. Thereupon God will say, ‘Take out everyone in whose heart there was as much faith as a grain of a mustard seed’ [see 4:40c]. Then they will be taken out already blackened and will be cast into the River of Life. Then they will sprout as an herb sprouts by the side of a stream. Do you not see how it comes out yellow and budding?”

24 They taste therein neither coolness nor drink,

25 save boiling liquid and a cold, murky fluid,

24–25 Therein can be taken as a reference to ages or to Hell. The former implies that there will be ages in which they drink of nothing other than boiling liquid (ḥamīm) and cold, murky fluid (ghassāq), followed by ages in which they drink of other beverages or experience other forms of punishment. The second implies that they will drink of these forever. The boiling liquid (cf. 6:70; 10:4; 22:19; 37:67; 38:57; 40:72; 44:46, 48; 47:15; 56:42, 54; 88:5) indicates something that has reached its maximum temperature, but can also indicate severe, painful cold. The cold, murky fluid (cf. 10:4; 38:57) is said to be an unbearably cold liquid with an intolerable stench gathered from the pus, sweat, tears, and wounds of the people of Hell (IK). This verse and similar verses provide an interesting window onto the nature of Hell—it is characterized not just by fire and heat but by extremes at both ends of the spectrum of temperature and all of the tension such extremes entail, whereas the Garden is described as a place of perfect tranquility. Although in the garden there are all the wine, fruits, and pure companions one could want, there is no indulgence. Peace and joy lie in moderation; torture lies in the extremes.

26 a fitting recompense.

26 It is a fitting recompense in that it is proportionate to the offense committed, for the recompense of an evil is an evil like unto it (42:40) and God wrongs not His servants (3:182; see also 10:44; 22:10).

27 Truly they anticipated not a reckoning,

27 As the disbelievers did not believe in the Resurrection and Divine Judgment, they did not anticipate the reckoning and did not fear it or seek to avoid it by accounting for their own actions (Q). Their recompense is therefore of their own doing, since it is they who have wronged themselves (3:117; 10:44; 16:118).

28 and denied Our signs with utter denial.

28 Our signs indicates all aspects of revelation. With utter denial, translating kadhāb, could also be rendered “as deniers” if read as kudhdhāb (Q, R, Z); or kudhdhāb could be read in the singular as a name of emphasis and thus rendered “as does a great denier.”

29 And everything have We recorded in a book.

29 This verse refers to the book in which all deeds are recorded by angels (see 86:4; commentary on 43:80; 50:17–18; 82:10–12) or to the Preserved Tablet (85:22; Q). Since the disbelievers’ transgressions are as described in vv. 27–28 and since God has recorded everything, theirs is a fitting recompense (v.
26); cf. 36:12. In a book, translating kitāban, could also be rendered “in writing” (Q, Ts).

30 So taste! For We shall not increase you in aught but punishment!

30 So taste means, “Taste the punishment [see 3:106, 181; 4:56; 6:30; 7:39; 8:35, 50; 10:52; 22:22; 32:14, 20; 34:42; 46:34] that you have brought upon yourselves through your disbelief and your actions.” According to a ḥadīth, “This verse is the most severe [verse] against the people of the Fire” (IK, R, Z). See also 17:97, which says of the punishment, Every time it abates, We shall increase for them a blazing flame; and 4:56, which promises that as often as their skins are consumed, We shall replace them with other skins, that they may taste the punishment.

31 Truly the reverent shall have a place of triumph,

31 For the Quranic understanding of the reverent, see 2:2c. Attaining “the Garden” is referred to as the great triumph in over a dozen verses; for the blessings of Paradise, see commentary on 5:119; 44:51–57.

32 Gardens will surround believers on all sides.

33 buxom maidens of like age,

33 Maidens with full breasts represent those who will be fully mature, but whose bodies will not suffer the vicissitudes of time. According to some commentaries, all men and women of Paradise will be thirty-three years old. For of like age, see 56:36–37c.

and an overflowing cup.

34 Overflowing translates dihāq, which has several interpretations: “continuously filled,” “pure,” or most commonly “completely filled” (IK, R). According to the early commentator al-Ḍaḥḥāk (d. 212/827), every use of “cup” in the Quran is a reference to paradisal wine (R); e.g., 37:45–47; 76:6.

They hear therein neither idle talk nor lying—

35 Cf. 19:62; 56:25; 88:11. All they hear is Peace (19:62; 56:26), because that is the greeting of the Garden (see, e.g., 10:10; 14:23). Idle talk and lying can be seen to represent the concupiscent and devious tendencies, respectively, as manifested in speech, whereas true speech is pure peace.

a recompense from thy Lord, a gift abounding—

36 Abounding translates ḥisāb, which could also mean “sufficient” (Z). When viewed in relation to v. 26, it could be rendered “appropriate” or “fitting” (R), indicating that the reverent receive what they have earned, as do the deniers.

the Lord of the heavens and the earth, and whatsoever is between them, the Compassionate, Whom they have no power to address.

37 Here they is understood by some as a reference to the disbelievers (Q), as in 36:65: On that Day We shall seal their mouths. Others say they refers to all created beings (R). Some say this verse does not indicate speech as such, but that on the Day it comes, no soul shall speak, save by His Leave (11:105; Q).
That Day the Spirit and the angels stand in rows, none speaking, save one whom the Compassionate permits and who speaks aright.

38 The Spirit (al-rūḥ) is open to many interpretations. Even the Quran does not give a definitive explanation, responding instead by saying, They ask thee about the Spirit. Say, “The Spirit is from the Command of my Lord, and you have not been given knowledge, save a little” (17:85). As al-Ghazzālī writes, “The Spirit’ is found in the Quran with many meanings” (Iḥyā’ ʿulūm al-dīn, K. al-ʿilm). Here some say it refers to the Archangel Gabriel (IK, Q, R), as in 26:192–94, where he is referred to as the Trustworthy Spirit (al-rūḥ al-amīn). Others say that here the Spirit does not specify a particular angel, but the first creature created by God (Q, R), which may or may not be the Archangel Gabriel. The angels refers to the most noble of angels, the protecting angels who are responsible for recording the deeds of each individual (see commentary on 82:10–12), or all angels. In rows, translating ʿaffan, could also mean “in a row.” Some read the verse to mean that the Spirit and the angels stand in a single row; others take it to mean that the Spirit stands alone, while the angels stand in a row (Āl). In relation to 89:22, which refers to the angels coming row upon row, some read ʿaffan to mean that the angels stand in many rows (Āl, R). Save one whom the Compassionate permits is interpreted as a reference to those whom God permits to intercede on behalf of others, as in 2:255: Who is there that may intercede with Him save by His Leave? The referent to who speaks aright is then taken by many as those who intercede, since they will only be able to speak aright about those for whom they intercede (Āl, Q, R). Some maintain that this refers to the prophets (IK). Others say who speaks aright means those who say, “There is no god but God” (Q). Some maintain that the verse should be read, “save one whom the Compassionate permits. And he speaks aright,” meaning that after permission has been granted, he cannot but speak aright.

That is the True Day. So let whosoever will, take a path of return unto his Lord.
39 It is the True Day, for it is the Day in which there is no doubt (3:9, 25; 4:87; 6:12; 42:7; 45:26). The path of return to the Lord is through belief and good deeds.

40 Truly We have warned you of a punishment nigh, on a day when a man beholds what his hands have sent forth, and the disbeliever says, “Oh, would that I were dust!”

According to most, this entire verse points to disbelievers, for disbelievers will behold and dwell upon the evil of their deeds, whereas believers will experience the Forgiveness and Mercy of God. According to others, a man beholds what his hands have sent forth (see 75:13c; 82:5c) refers to believers, who will experience reward for their good deeds, in contrast to disbelievers, who will wish that they were nothing (R). Oh, would that I were dust could indicate that one wishes either to have never been born or to be back in the grave and not resurrected (IK, Q), as in 4:42: On that Day those who disbelieved and disobeyed the Messenger will wish that they were level with the earth, and they will conceal no account from God (R). It can also be taken as an indication that those who took pride in their high station in this world will prefer that they had had a low station that had not made them prideful and insolent; see also 69:25–27. Many commentaries convey an account that links this verse to the resurrection of animals. Traditional Islamic teachings maintain that all animals will be resurrected. Then God will rectify all injustices between them, and according to many when the judgment between them is finished, He will say to them “Be dust,” and they will all become dust. Upon witnessing this, disbelievers will prefer the fate of the animals to their own and say, Oh, would that I were dust (IK, Q, Ṭṣ, Ṭū).

A few commentators interpret the disbeliever as a reference to Satan, who, when he sees the rewards received by believing human beings, wishes that he too had been made of dust or clay, thus altering his previous evaluation: I am better than him. Thou hast created me from fire, while Thou hast created him from clay (7:12; 38:76; Q, R, Ṭṣ). In some Shiite commentaries, the Arabic for Oh, would that I were dust, yā laytanî kuntu turāban, is read yā laytanî kuntu turābiyyan, that is, “Oh, would that I were a follower of Abī Turāb,” meaning ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, the first Shiite Imam (Kā, Qm). This would then mean that on the Day of Resurrection all who were not among the followers of the twelve Shiite Imams would wish that they had been. In this sense Shiites may be inverting the pejorative name Turābiyyah (“the followers of Abū Turāb”), which some of their opponents gave to them, and wearing it as a badge of honor.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
A late Makkan sūrah, al-Nāziʿāt was most likely revealed shortly before or after Sūrah 78, al-Nabaʾ. It takes its title from the first word of the sūrah. It is also known as al-Sāhirah, “The Wide Expanse,” after the reference in v. 14 to the wide expanse upon which all human beings are said to be gathered on the Day of Resurrection, and as al-Ṭāmmah, “The Calamity,” after the reference to the Day of Judgment as the Great Calamity in v. 34 (Āl).

The focus of this sūrah is upon the reality of the Day of Judgment, the Hour, and the Resurrection. Thus some say that it follows directly upon the first phrase of 78:40, Truly we have warned you of a punishment nigh (Aj). The first five verses present a series of oaths in which God swears by certain aspects of creation. According to commentators, when one makes an oath by a thing, it is to show its greatness or to express the magnitude of what is to follow in the sūrah, or both. It is said that God may swear an oath by anything He has created, but that it is not proper for human beings to swear by anything other than God. Vv. 6–14 recount the questions of those who do not believe in the Resurrection and reaffirm some of its attributes. The next section, vv. 15–26, is most likely the first account of the story of Moses and Pharaoh in the chronological order of revelation, likening Pharaoh’s disbelief to that of the Makkan idolaters. Vv. 27–33 then cite the wonders of creation as evidence of God’s ability to resurrect.
The next section, vv. 34–41, returns to a description of the Day of Resurrection, contrasting the fate of the believers with that of the disbelievers. The last five verses respond to the disbelievers who chided the Prophet for not knowing when the Hour would come.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1- By those that wrest violently, 2- by those that draw out quickly, 3- by those that glide serenely, 4- by those that race to the fore, outstripping, 5- and by those that govern affairs, 6- on the Day when the quaker quakes 7- and the successor follows upon it. 8- Hearts that Day shall tremble, 9- with eyes humbled. 10- They will say, “Are we to be restored as we were before? 11- What! When we have become decayed bones?” 12- They say, “This, then, would be a ruinous return!” 13- Yet it shall be but a single cry, 14- then, behold, they will be upon a wide expanse. 15- Hast thou heard tell of Moses, 16- when his Lord called out to him in the holy valley of Ṭuwā? 17- “Go unto Pharaoh! Truly he has rebelled! 18- And say, ‘Dost thou wish to be purified 19- and that I guide thee to thy Lord that thou mightest have fear?’” 20- Then he showed him the greatest sign. 21- But he denied and disobeyed. 22- Then turned his back, moving swiftly. 23- Then he gathered and proclaimed, 24- and said, “I am your lord most high.” 25- So God seized him with a punishment exemplary in the Hereafter and in this world. 26- Truly in that is a lesson for whosoever fears. 27- Are you more difficult to create or the sky that He has built? 28- He raised high its canopy and fashioned it, 29- darkened its night, and brought forth its day. 30- And after that He spread out the earth. 31- From it He brought forth its water and its pastures, 32- and the mountains He set firm, 33- as sustenance for you and for your flocks. 34- So when the Great Calamity befalls— 35- a day when man shall remember that for which he endeavored, 36- and Hellfire is made visible for one who sees—\(\text{37}\) as for one who rebels \(\text{38}\) and prefers the life of this world, \(\text{39}\) truly Hellfire is the refuge. \(\text{40}\) As for one who fears standing before his Lord and forbids the soul from caprice, \(\text{41}\) truly the Garden is the refuge. \(\text{42}\) They ask thee about the Hour, “When shall it set in?” \(\text{43}\) What hast thou to do with mentioning it? \(\text{44}\) Unto thy Lord is [knowledge of] the end thereof. \(\text{45}\) Thou art but a warner for whosoever fears it. \(\text{46}\) The Day they see it, it will be as if they had tarried but an evening or the morning thereof.
Commentary

1 By those that wrest violently,

1–5 Regarding the varying interpretations for these verses as referring to different types of angels, different modes of death, or different types and phases of stars and/or other celestial bodies, among other things, al-Ṭabarī says that they can be seen as a reference to all of these, for God is swearing by everything that exhibits the characteristics mentioned in these verses. Al-Rāzī advises that we cannot say any of the interpretations are what is meant by God, but that we can say they are possible. He adds another interpretation in which these verses represent five phases in the return of the heart from what is other than God to God: “Those that wrest (al-nāziʿāt) are the spirits that move toward (tanzīʿu ʿilā) attachment to the most unfailing handhold [2:256; 31:22], or who are being wrested from the love of what is other than God. Those that draw out quickly (al-nāshiṭāt nāshīṭ) means that, after the return from bodily things, [the spirits] take to striving and assuming the character traits of God with utter zeal (nishāṭ) and great strength. Those that glide serenely is then that, after striving, [the spirits] ‘glide’ in the realm of sovereignty, such that they cross these oceans and swim therein. Those that race to the fore, outstripping is an allusion to the variegation of spirits in the degrees of their journeying unto God, and those that govern affairs is an allusion to the connection between the last levels of humanness and the first degrees of angelhood. So when the human spirits reach their farthest limit, which is the level of outstripping, they connect to the world of the angels, which is what is meant by those that govern affairs. So the first four are what is meant by its oil would well-nigh shine forth [24:35], and the fifth is the fire in His saying, even if no fire had touched it [24:35].”

1 Those that wrest are viewed by most as the angels who wrest the souls of disbelievers from the body (IK, Q, Ṭ, Z). They do so violently because the souls do not want to face the Judgment. Others see those that wrest as an allusion to the stars or to all celestial bodies (Q, Ṭ, Z).

2 by those that draw out quickly,
2 This verse may be a reference to the angels who draw out the souls of believers who go willingly into the Hereafter (Q, Ṭ); though others say it could be another description of the difficulties confronted by disbelievers and hypocrites, because nashīta, here translated draw out, can also imply something that must be pulled out with great force (Q). Others say it refers to the stars as they travel from one horizon to the other; while according to others, vv. 1–2 refer to death itself (Q, Ṭ), where the soul’s exit from the body is violent for some and gentle for others.

3 by those that glide serenely,

3 This verse is a reference to angels who descend with God’s nourishment, or to the stars, or to ships that sail gently upon the sea (Ṭ). When taken as a reference to angels, glide serenely could also be rendered “descend in the early morning.” Mujāhid viewed this as a third reference to death (R): v. 1 refers to the death of disbelievers; v. 2, to the death of believers; and v. 3, to the death of the elect among the believers.

4 by those that race to the fore, outstripping,

4 This verse is a reference to either angels who race to Paradise with human souls, death, or the stars (Ṭ).

5 and by those that govern affairs,

5 Most see this verse as a reference to the angels who have been charged with governing the affairs of this world (Q). Some say that it applies to all angels with such responsibilities, while others relate it to the responsibilities mentioned in vv. 1–4 (R); and others say it refers only to the Archangels Gabriel, Michael, Azrael, and Seraphiel (Q), each of whom is considered to be responsible for a particular domain. In another interpretation this verse is understood as a reference to the planets (Q), presumably in astrological terms.

6 on the Day when the quaker quakes

7 and the successor follows upon it.

6–7 Some maintain that the quaker and the successor refer to the first and second blasts of the trumpet blown by the Archangel Seraphiel on the Day of Judgment (Q, R, T); see 39:68c; 78:18c. Some say the quaker refers to earth and the mountains, for it is a day on which the earth and the mountains shake (73:14), while the successor refers to Heaven and the planets (IK, R). Another opinion is that the quaker refers to the first “shaking” of the earth, and the successor to the second shaking when it is sundered and fades away (R). Others interpret the quaker as a reference to “the event” in which the earth quakes; and still others see it as a reference to the Hour (Q, T), which is said to “quake” (22:1). A minority interpret vv. 6–7 as an allusion to death itself and all that it entails (Q, T).

8 Hearts that Day shall tremble,

8 Hearts shall tremble with fear (Q, T), as in 40:18: So warn them of the Day of the Imminent Event, when hearts will be in throats, choking in agony. Al-Rāzī interprets the fact that hearts is here indefinite in the Arabic as an indication that not all hearts tremble, only those of the disbelievers.

9 with eyes humbled.

9 Cf. 68:43; and 70:44: Their eyes humbled, abasement shall overcome them.
They will say, “Are we to be restored as we were before?”

What! When we have become decayed bones?”

These verses contain a common objection made by those who do not believe in the Resurrection; cf. 17:49; and 17:98: They say, “What! When we are bones and dust, shall we indeed be resurrected as a new creation?”

They say, “This, then, would be a ruinous return!”

This verse is the response of those who deny the Resurrection. It is understood to mean that they know that if this were the case, they would be ruined (Q, R).

Yet it shall be but a single cry,

Judgment will come with a single cry; cf. 36:29; 36:49; 37:19; 38:15. See in particular 39:68, which maintains that there will be two cries of the trumpet. The present verse is then taken as a reference to the second cry, at which all human beings will be gathered. The reference to a single cry is understood by some to mean that the gathering will occur almost instantly, for as other verses say, Our Command is naught but one, like the blinking of an eye (54:50); and The matter of the Hour is as the blinking of an eye, or nearer still (16:77; IK).

then, behold, they will be upon a wide expanse.

Wide expanse is interpreted by some as a reference to the face of the earth (IK, Q). Others connect it to the open plain in 18:47 and the barren plain in 20:106 (IK), both of which are seen as allusions to the plain on which all of humanity will be gathered for the Day of Judgment. Still others believe that the wide expanse refers to a plain near Jerusalem, in the vicinity of Mt. Arīḥā, where some say the Resurrection will take place. Sāhirah, here translated wide expanse, could also mean that they are “awake” due to the intensity of their fear (R, Z).

15 Hast thou heard tell of Moses,

15–25 For the full Quranic account of Moses, see 7:103–55; 10:75–93; 17:101–4; 20:9–97; 26:10–66; 27:7–14; 28:3–46; 40:23–45; 43:46–56; 44:17–31. This is most likely the first account of Moses in the chronological order of revelation. As it occurred early in the Makkan period, it would appear to assume some basic knowledge of the story of Moses among the Arabs. Here it is offered as an example for the Prophet and his followers of what will eventually become of unjust rulers, like those of Makkah.

16 when his Lord called out to him in the holy valley of Ṭuwā?

16 Cf. 20:12. Ṭuwā is either a proper name for the valley said to lie just below Mt. Sinai, where Moses first heard the Voice of God (see 20:12–16), or a term derived from the verb ṭawāṭayya, “to roll up,” meaning that the valley is wrapped in sanctity or that it is sanctified twice (Q, Ṭ).

17 “Go unto Pharaoh! Truly he has rebelled!

17 Cf. 20:24, 43.

18 And say, ‘Dost thou wish to be purified and that I guide thee to thy Lord that thou mightest have fear?”

18–19 Just as the Prophet invited the tribe of Quraysh to Islam in a peaceful manner, Moses was instructed to first invite Pharaoh to follow God’s Revelation, as in 20:44: Yet speak unto him gently, that haply he may remember or have fear. It is a common Quranic theme that no community is punished for wrongdoing until it has been offered guidance, as indicated in 28:59: And thy Lord never destroys towns until He sends a messenger to their mother city to recite unto them Our signs; and 26:208: And never did We destroy a town save that it had warners; see also 6:131; 10:13; 15:4.

20 Then he showed him the greatest sign.

20 One account mentions nine clear signs (17:101), but does not state which is the greatest sign. Some say it is the staff that became a serpent (7:107; 20:66–17; 26:32, 44–45), the hand turned white (7:108; 26:33; 27:12), the parting of the sea (7:136; 10:90; 20:77–78; 26:63–66), or all of the miracles that Moses performed. For a comprehensive list of the “signs” associated with Moses, see 17:101c.

21 But he denied and disobeyed.

21 Even after Pharaoh’s sorcerers acknowledged the superiority of Moses and the veracity of the signs with which he had been sent, Pharaoh continued to deny, considering the staff turned serpent and the white hand mere sorcery (see 7:111–26c).

22 Then turned his back, moving swiftly.

22 Some say that this verse indicates that Pharaoh turned and fled when he saw the greatest sign or the staff turned serpent (R). Others say it indicates that, upon realizing the power of Moses’ message, Pharaoh quickly moved to devise a plan against him (R).

23 Then he gathered and proclaimed,

23 Most say this verse indicates that Pharaoh gathered all the people to declare his sovereignty. Others relate this verse to 26:53: Then Pharaoh sent marshalers to the cities, in which case it refers to Pharaoh’s summoning his people to pursue the Israelites.

24 and said, “I am your lord most high.”

24 According to several reports, Pharaoh first said, O notables! I know of no god for you other than myself (28:38), then I am your lord most high (R, Ṭ, Ṭs).

25 So God seized him with a punishment exemplary in the Hereafter and in this world.

25 A punishment exemplary renders nakāl, which also indicates weakness and inability, evoking the sense that God rendered Pharaoh impotent in opposing Moses. As translated, this verse is a reference to punishment in this world and the next, and many interpret the this-worldly punishment as the plagues sent upon his people and their drowning in the sea (cf. 20:78–79; 7:135–37). Some read this verse as “the punishment of the last and the first,” saying “the first” indicates the punishment for saying, I know of no god for you other than myself, and that “the last” is for saying, I am your lord most high (Q, Ṭ, Ṭs); others say “the first” is for denying Moses and “the last” is for saying, I am your lord most high (Q). In a well-known Sufi interpretation, Alāʾ al-Dawlā al-Simnānī (d. 787/1336) is said to have seen the soul of the famous Sufi martyr al-Ḥallāj in an exalted state. So he prayed to God, asking how it was that al-Ḥallāj’s soul was in a high Paradise (ʿIlliyyūn), though he had said, “I am the Real” (anā al-Ḥaqq), yet Pharaoh’s soul was in Hell because he had said, I am your lord most high. God answered that Pharaoh saw only himself and forgot God, while al-Ḥallāj saw only God and forgot himself.

26 Truly in that is a lesson for whosoever fears.

27 Are you more difficult to create or the sky that He has built?

27 God’s ability to create, which some who opposed the Prophet did accept, is here cited as evidence that God would have no problem resurrecting human beings as He wills, as in 40:57: Surely the creation of the heavens and the earth is greater than the creation of mankind. But most of mankind know not; and 36:81: Is not He Who created the heavens and the earth able to create the like thereof?

28 He raised high its canopy and fashioned it,

29 darkened its night, and brought forth its day.

30 And after that He spread out the earth.

28–30 These verses describe additional dimensions of creation, which demonstrate that God can create and resurrect as He will. Its canopy indicates the highest level of the sky; fashioned it implies that it is whole with no fissures, cracks, or imperfections. For the perfection of the heavens, see 67:3–4c. Its day translates ḍuḥāhā, which could also mean “its light,” “its morning brightness,” as in 93:1, or the morning, as in v. 46. For the full range of meanings for ḍuḥā, see the introduction to Sūrah 93. The mention of the earth (v. 30) after the sky, night, and day indicates that the earth was created after the heavens had been established (Q).
31 From it He brought forth its water and its pastures,

Its pastures is interpreted by some as an allusion to all plant life and by others as an allusion to everything eaten by human beings and animals.

32 and the mountains He set firm,

The firmness of the mountains is cited in many verses as a sign of God’s Omnipotence; see 13:3; 15:19; 16:15; 21:31; 31:10; 41:10; 50:7; 77:27; 21:20–31c.

33 as sustenance for you and for your flocks.

Cf. 80:32. God sustains all things and has made all things subservient to human beings (see 22:65; 31:20; 45:13). Human beings are thus God’s vicegerents (see, e.g., 2:30; 6:165c; 35:39) and must remain thankful to God for sustenance, while sharing these resources with all of God’s creatures.

34 So when the Great Calamity befalls—

Calamity translates ẗāmmah, which derives from the verb ẗamma, meaning “to be abundant” or “to rise over,” as would a flood, implying that the ẗāmmah is the greatest of all tremendous events, because its overabundance encompasses all things. Some take the Great Calamity as a reference to the second cry of the trumpet (see 39:68c), at which all human beings and jinn are gathered; others take it as a reference to the Resurrection, because it surpasses and predominates over (yaṭimmu) all things (Q). It is also interpreted by some as a reference to the very moment when the people of Hell are led to Hell and the people of Paradise are led to Paradise. Some view the omission of a response to the conditional when (idhā) as an affirmation that what is to occur must occur (Q, Ts).

35) a day when man shall remember that for which he endeavored,

35 All people will remember the good and evil that they have done, for even if they have forgotten some of their deeds while in this world, their deeds have all been recorded, as in 58:6: On the Day when God resurrects them all together, then informs them of that which they did. God has kept account of it while they have forgotten it (see also 10:21; 34:3; 36:12; 43:80; 45:29; 78:29; 99:6–8).

36) and Hellfire is made visible for one who sees—

36 One who sees is understood by some as a reference to the disbelievers and by others as a reference to all human beings (Q, R). Others argue that it could not refer to the disbelievers, because the realities of the Hereafter can only be seen by those who have eyes, and the eyes of the disbelievers are covered (see 2:7; R).

37) as for one who rebels

38) and prefers the life of this world,

39) truly Hellfire is the refuge.

37–39 Al-Rāzī interprets one who rebels to indicate corruption of the intellect, for all who know God know their own insignificance and would thus not incline to rebellion and arrogance. Prefers the life of this world is then taken to indicate corruption in actions in accordance with the ḥadīth “The love of the world is the source of all error” (R). The two together are thus taken to indicate the greatest degree of corruption, the punishment for which is eternal. So Hellfire is the refuge for those who reach this level of corruption. Those who do not may still be punished, but Hellfire will not be their ultimate refuge (R). Many verses condemn those who prefer the life of this world over the life of the Hereafter, for the life of this world is naught but the enjoyment of delusion (3:185; 57:20), while the Hereafter is better and more enduring (87:17; cf., e.g., 6:32; 9:38; 14:3).

40 As for one who fears standing before his Lord and forbids the soul from caprice, 41 truly the Garden is the refuge.

40–41 Cf. 55:46: And for one who fears standing before his Lord, there are two Gardens. Maqāma rabbihī, translated standing before his Lord here and in 55:46, could also be translated, “the station of his Lord.” It indicates being aware of standing before God on the Day of Judgment and answering for all of one’s deeds. Al-Rāzī sees this fear of standing before his Lord as the exact opposite of one who rebelled in v. 37, for just as rebellion implies ignorance, fear implies knowledge, as in 35:28: Only those among His servants who know fear God. In the same way, one who forbids the soul from caprice is the opposite of one who prefers the life of this world, for just as rebellion is seen as connected to love of the world, the fear of God is seen as leading the soul to perform acts of obedience and good deeds. From a Quranic perspective, it is caprice that leads astray; one follows either God and His Messenger or caprice. For a discussion of the significance of caprice, see 45:23c.

42 They ask thee about the Hour, “When shall it set in?”

42 This verse is said to refer to the idolaters of Makkah, who did not ask in order to be informed, but only to mock (Āl, Q). When shall it set in? (cf. 7:187) derives from a nautical metaphor meaning, “When shall it berth?” Some take the use of this metaphor to imply that it is near at hand (Q).
What hast thou to do with mentioning it?

This verse can be understood either as God’s telling the Prophet that he is not to speak of that of which he does not know, or as a reference to those who contended that the Prophet had no business mentioning the Hour, its signs, the Resurrection, and other things, if he did not know when they were to transpire. The former interpretation is supported by a report from ʿĀʾishah that the Prophet wanted to ask God about the moment when the Hour would come, and God said to him that he was asking for knowledge of something he had no right to know.

Unto thy Lord is [knowledge of] the end thereof.

Only God knows about the Hour, as in 7:187: They question thee about the Hour, when it will set in. Say, “Knowledge thereof lies only with my Lord. None save He shall manifest it at its proper time. Heavy shall it weigh upon the heavens and the earth. It shall not come upon you but suddenly.” They question thee as if thou knew it well. Say, “Knowledge thereof lies only with God, but most of mankind know not” (cf. 30:34). Thus when the Prophet was asked about the Hour by the Archangel Gabriel, he responded, “Regarding that the one questioned knows no more than the questioner” (IK).

Thou art but a warner for whosoever fears it.

Cf. 36:11. The Prophet has no knowledge of the Hour and other aspects of the Unseen (see 38:69–70c), for he is only sent to warn (13:7; 22:49; 27:92; 29:50; 34:46; 35:23; 38:70; 46:9; 67:26). That prophets warn and bring glad tidings is reiterated throughout the Quran (see, e.g., 18:56), yet human beings often expect them to function as soothsayers or fortune-tellers. Thus in 46:9 the Prophet is instructed: Say, “I am no innovation among the messengers, and I know not what will be done with me or with you. I only follow that which has been revealed unto me, and I am naught but a clear warner.”
The Day they see it, it will be as if they had tarried but an evening or the morning thereof.

Cf. 10:45; 17:52; 20:103–4; 23:112–14; 30:55; 46:35. Most commentators say that this verse means that the time in the grave will seem short before the Day of Judgment, when all souls are gathered before God upon being resurrected. Others say the implication is that life on earth will seem as if it were only an hour in comparison to the experience of the Hereafter (IK, Q); see also 46:35 and the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.” In this instance, morning (ḍuḥā) is said to refer to the time period of the worldly life in the eyes of the people when they see the Hereafter (IK). For the broader meaning of ḍuḥā, see the introduction to Sūrah 93.

ʿAbasa

ʿAbasa is an early Makkan sūrah that takes its name from the first sūrah’s word. It is also known as al-Ṣākhkhah, “The Piercing Cry,” in reference to v. 33, or as al-Safrah, “The Scribes,” in reference to v. 15 (Āl). Some maintain that it is related to the previous sūrah by the manner in which the first ten verses reinforce the message of 79:45, Thou art but a warner for whosoever fears it (Āl), counseling the Prophet not to spend his time seeking to guide those who are indifferent, when there are those waiting who wish to be guided. These first ten verses refer to a famous incident in the early history of Islam. Āʾishah, the wife of the Prophet, reported that this sūrah was revealed about ʿAbd Allāh ibn Umm Maktūm, a blind man, who went to the Prophet and kept saying, “O Messenger of God, guide me,” while the Prophet was speaking to the leaders of the idolaters. The Prophet frowned and kept avoiding him, turning to the others (IK, Q). The verses are then said to have been revealed as a rebuke to the Prophet for preaching to those who had no interest in God’s message, while turning away from one who sought guidance.

ʿAbd Allāh ibn Umm Maktūm was among the first to embrace Islam. He is known for his devotion to the Prophet and the Quran. After the revelation of this sūrah, it is said that the Prophet would greet him by saying, “Welcome to him on whose account my Lord rebuked me” (Q). Ibn Umm Maktūm was one of the first two people to migrate to Madinah, where he taught the Quran to many people. Along with Bilāl ibn Rabāh al-Ḥabashī (d. ca. 20/642), Ibn Umm Maktūm would give the call to prayer (adhān) in Madinah. In later years, the Prophet would at times leave Madinah in his care when he left the city. It is also said that 4:95 was revealed regarding the particular case of Ibn Umm Maktūm, who was excused from going on military expeditions on account of his blindness. Nonetheless, he was not content with staying behind when an expedition was in progress and determined that no campaign should pass him by. He requested a role on the battlefield, saying, “Place me between two rows and give me the standard. I will carry it for you and protect it, for I am blind and cannot run away.” After the Battle of Qādisiyyah in 14/636, he was found dead on the battlefield still clutching the standard of the Muslims (Q).

After the verses addressing the case of Ibn Umm Maktūm (vv. 1–10), the sūrah alludes to a book written by the angels (vv. 11–16). It then transitions into a discussion of humanity’s ingratitude (vv. 17–22), followed by enjoinders to recall the bounties provided by God (vv. 23–32) and concluding with a reminder of the disparate ends of believers and disbelievers on the Day of Judgment (vv. 33–42).

1 He frowned and turned away, 2 because the blind man came to him. 3 And what would apprise thee? Perhaps he would purify himself, 4 or be reminded, such that the reminder might benefit him. 5 As for him who deems himself beyond need, 6 to him dost thou attend, 7 though thou art not answerable, should he not be purified. 8 But as for him who came to thee striving earnestly 9 while fearful, 10 from him thou art diverted. 11 Nay! Truly it is a reminder — 12 so let whomsoever will, remember it— 13 on pages honored, 14 exalted and purified, 15 in the hands of scribes, 16 noble and pious. 17
May man perish! How ungrateful is he! \(18\) From what thing did He create him? \(19\) From a drop He created him, then proportioned him, \(20\) then He made the way easy for him. \(21\) Then He caused him to die and buried him. \(22\) Then, when He willed, He resurrected him. \(23\) Nay! But he has not accomplished what He commanded him. \(24\) So let man consider his food, \(25\) that We pour down water in abundance; \(26\) then We split the earth in fissures, \(27\) and cause grains to grow therein, \(28\) and vines and herbs, \(29\) and olives and date palms, \(30\) and gardens densely planted, \(31\) and fruit and pastures, \(32\) as sustenance for you and for your flocks. \(33\) So when the Piercing Cry does come, \(34\) that Day when a man will flee from his brother, \(35\) and his mother and his father, \(36\) and his spouse and his children. \(37\) For every man that Day his affair shall suffice him. \(38\) Faces that Day shall be shining, radiant, \(39\) laughing, joyous. \(40\) And faces that Day shall be covered with dust, \(41\) overspread with darkness. \(42\) Those, they are the disbelievers, the profligates.
Commentary

1 He frowned and turned away,

2 because the blind man came to him.

3 And what would apprise thee? Perhaps he would purify himself,

4 or be reminded, such that the reminder might benefit him.

5 As for him who deems himself beyond need,

6 to him dost thou attend,

7 though thou art not answerable, should he not be purified.

8 But as for him who came to thee striving earnestly

9 while fearful,

10 from him thou art diverted.

1–10 For the occasion of revelation, see the introduction to the sūrah. The Prophet is here admonished for turning away from one who sought guidance to others whom he hoped to attract to Islam, since he was not responsible for making people accept religion, only for conveying God’s message and guiding those who accepted it, as in 28:56: Surely thou dost not guide whomsoever thou loveth, but God guides whomsoever He will. And He knows best those who are rightly guided. Other verses tell the Prophet to be patient and to not turn away from those who seek religion, such as 6:52: And drive not away those who call upon their Lord morning and evening, desiring His Face; and 18:28: Make thy soul patient with those who call upon their Lord morning and evening, desiring His Face. Turn not thine eyes away from them, desiring the adornment of the life of this world, nor obeying one whose heart We have made heedless of the remembrance of Us and who follows his caprice and whose affair exceeds the bounds.

Beyond need (v. 5) translates man istaghnā, which literally means “is self-sufficient” and connotes a view of oneself as “self-sufficient” vis-à-vis God. The fear mentioned in v. 9 is fear of God and the Day of Judgment.

11 Nay! Truly it is a reminder—

Cf. 74:54. It can be taken as a reference to the Quran, this particular sūrah, or the exhortation to treat people equitably (IK, T). The verse also indicates that it is only incumbent upon the Prophet to convey God’s message and remind others, not to sway those who oppose the message (see 88:21–24). For the Quran as Reminder, see 36:69c.

12 so let whomsoever will, remember it—

This verse could also be translated, “So let whomsoever He wills remember it,” meaning that only those whom God wills will be receptive to the revelation and thus remember (Q), for as 11:114 says of the Quran, This is a reminder for those who remember. In either reading, remember it could also be rendered “remember Him,” meaning “remember God” (IK). This latter reading may be more accurate, as the pronoun taken as a reference to the Quran or the sūrah in v. 11 is feminine, while the pronoun rendered “it” or “Him” in v. 12 is masculine.

13 on pages honored,

According to some, pages refers only to the Quran. According to others, it refers to the books of all the prophets (Q) or to the Preserved Tablet (85:22; T), which is said to be the source of all revelation. Pages translates ṣūḥuf in accordance with the first interpretation. Ṣūḥuf is also rendered scriptures in 53:36 and 87:18–19, where it refers to the revelations given to Abraham and Moses. They are honored or “ennobled” because of what they contain.

14 Exalted means “elevated” in the Eyes of God (Aj) and beyond all obscurity and contradiction (Q). Purified means free from any additions or deficiencies (IK) and protected from being assailed by disbelievers (Q), such that None touch it, save those made pure (56:79).

15 in the hands of scribes,

16 noble and pious.

15–16 Scribes translates safarah, which can be understood as a reference to the attendant angels who “inscribe” (safara) the deeds of God’s servants in books (asfār; see 43:80; 50:17–18; 82:10–12), or as a reference to the angels whom God has appointed as “mediators” (sufarāʾ) between Himself and His messengers (Q, Ṭ). A famous ḥadīth states, “One who recites the Quran proficiently and has memorized it is with the scribes, noble and pious” (IK). Some argue that here scribes should be “mediators” to indicate the function of mediating God’s message that human beings can fulfill for other human beings (Q). Safara can also mean “to unveil”; thus some take it as an allusion to the Quran’s making matters clear (Q). Others say that the hands of scribes refers to the reciters of the Quran (Ṭ).

17 May man perish! How ungrateful is he!

17 May man perish translates qutila al-insān, which could also be rendered, “May man be cursed” (IK, Q). Here the phrase is said to refer to those who deny the truth without any supporting argument, but only because they lack knowledge of it and think it is far-fetched (IK). Ungrateful translates afkara, which indicates both ingratitude toward and disbelief in God (for the broader meaning of kufr, or “disbelief,” see 2:85–86c). Thus this verse could also be read, “Man is accursed for what he disbelieves,” or “Mankind is accursed; for what does he disbelieve?” (Q). According to some, this verse relates to a specific individual who had accepted Islam, but apostatized when Sūrah 53 was revealed; so God revealed this verse, meaning that he was accursed for disbelieving in the Quran after first believing (Q).

18 From what thing did He create him?

19 From a drop He created him, then proportioned him,

18–19 This is one of several passages in which the creation of the human being from a drop is cited as evidence of God’s Omnipotence, as in 18:37: Do you disbelieve in the One Who created you from dust, then from a drop, then fashioned you as a man? See also 16:4; 40:67; 86:6–8.

20 then He made the way easy for him.

20 From one perspective, this verse refers to the ease with which a baby comes forth from the mother’s womb (IK, Q); from another, it refers to God’s providing all people with guidance, as in 76:3: Truly We guided him upon the way, be he grateful or ungrateful (IK). Some interpret it as an indication that God has made it easy for everything to perform the function for which it was created, as in a famous ḥadīth, “Work, for that for which each person was created has been made easy for him” (Q).

21 Then He caused him to die and buried him.
Then, when He willed, He resurrected him.

21–22 These verses are related to several passages that speak of all the phases of human existence to rebuke those who do not believe in God; e.g., 2:28: How can you disbelieve in God, seeing that you were dead and He gave you life; then He causes you to die; then He gives you life; then unto Him shall you be returned?

Nay! But he has not accomplished what He commanded him.

23 Nay! is a rebuke to the disbelievers, who, when informed of the Resurrection, will say, . . . “If I am returned unto my Lord, surely with Him shall I have that which is most beautiful” (41:50; Q); or it is a rebuke to those who believe that they have accomplished what they were commanded, but, as they disbelieve in God and His Messenger, have not done so (Q). The emphatic particle kāllā (nay) can also be read in the affirmative, in which case the verse would begin, “Truly, he has not . . .” (Q), and would not convey the same sense of rebuke.

So let man consider his food,

24 Consider his food is taken by some to indicate another of the many signs upon which human beings should reflect in order to appreciate fully God’s Power and Mercy (Q). Others say that it relates to reflecting upon the consumption and elimination of food, for that is an example of what becomes of the world (Q).

that We pour down water in abundance;

25 Water is mentioned as a symbol of God’s Mercy in several verses and can also be taken as an allusion to all living things, for God made every living thing from water (21:30; see also 24:45; 25:54).

26 then We split the earth in fissures,

Vegetation comes through the fissures, splitting the earth. For other verses describing the manner in which God brings forth vegetation and revives the earth with water, see, e.g., 6:99; 29:63; 30:24; 31:10; 35:27; 39:21; 41:39.

and cause grains to grow therein, and vines and herbs, and olives and date palms, and gardens densely planted, and fruit and pastures,

as sustenance for you and for your flocks.

These verses reflect the continuous Quranic emphasis on the benefits that God has provided through the natural world and the fact that reflecting upon them leads to a deeper understanding of God’s wisdom, since

God created the heavens and the earth in truth (14:19; see also 6:73), and whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is on the earth glorifies God (59:1; 61:1; 62:1; 64:1; cf. 57:1; 59:24); for the importance of the natural environment and the connection between creation and revelation, see 3:191c; 45:3c. As sustenance for you and for your flocks also appears in 79:33.

So when the Piercing Cry does come,
The Piercing Cry refers to the second blast from the trumpet of the Archangel Seraphiel, at which all human beings will be resurrected (Q; see 39:68c). It is said that it will almost deafen those who hear it (Bg, IK). Others say that al-ṣākhkhah, translated the Piercing Cry, is a proper name for the Day of Judgment (IK).

34–37 The terror of the Day of Judgment will be so severe that people will not be concerned with anything other than themselves. In 70:11–14 it is said that a man would go so far as to ransom himself from the punishment of that Day at the price of his children, his spouse and his brother, his kin who had sheltered him, and all who are on the earth, that it might save him. In a famous hadīth, the Prophet said, “People will be gathered barefoot, naked, and uncircumcised.” To which a woman responded, “Will we look upon each other’s nakedness?” He responded, “For every man that Day his affair shall suffice him” (IK, Q).

38–39 Cf. 75:22. These verses describe the hearts of believers, for “the face is the mirror of the heart” (Tb), which are then contrasted with the hearts of disbelievers in vv. 40–41. The faces of believers are shining, radiant from the joy they experience in their hearts and the glad tidings manifest on their faces (IK), because of the ablutions they performed in this life (Q, R), their performance of night vigil (Q, R), or their relief from the burdens and attachments of this world (R). The believers are joyous when they receive their reward from God (Q). Related to the event that is said to have occasioned the revelation of this sūrah (see the introduction to the sūrah), these verses can be seen as a reference to the state of Ibn Umm Maktūm, while vv. 40–42 refer to the state of him who deems himself beyond need (v. 5).

40  And faces that Day shall be covered with dust, overspread with darkness.

42  Those, they are the disbelievers, the profligates.

40–42  Covered with dust indicates complete and utter humiliation. According to some, the disbelievers, the profligates indicates the same group; disbelief defines their thoughts, and profligacy their actions (Āl, Ṭb); the punishment for disbelief is faces covered with dust, and the punishment for profligacy is being overspread with darkness (Āl); cf. 75:24.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
An early Makkan sūrah, al-Takwīr is most likely the seventh in the chronological order of revelation. It takes its name from the first verse, which refers to the enfolding of the sun as one of the signs of the Hour, and is also known by the title “When the Sun Is Enfolded” (Āl). Ibn ʿAjībah suggests that this sūrah is related to the previous one because it begins by describing the events that are related to the Last Day, the subject with which the previous sūrah ends. The sūrah can be viewed as having two sections, the first of which tells of the signs of the Hour and the Resurrection (vv. 1–14). These apocalyptic events are described in a manner that suggests an inversion of the apparent order of the created world. In this vein, a ḥadīth states, “Whosoever wishes to look at the Day of Judgment as if he is seeing it with his own eyes, let him read, When the sun is enfolded, and when the stars fade away; when the mountains are set in motion, and when pregnant camels are abandoned” (IK). The second section of the sūrah is a more elusive passage that discusses the revelation of the Quran through the Archangel Gabriel and its effect upon the human soul (vv. 15–29).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 When the sun is enfolded, 2 and when the stars fade away; 3 when the mountains are set in motion, when pregnant camels are abandoned; when the wild beasts are gathered, and when the seas are made to swell over; when the souls are coupled, and when the female infant buried alive is asked for what sin she was slain; when the pages are spread, and when Heaven is laid bare; when Hellfire is kindled, and when the Garden is brought nigh, each soul shall know what it has made ready. So I swear by those receding, those that move and set, by the night as it approaches, and by the morning as it breathes! Truly it is the speech of a noble messenger, possessed of strength, before the Possessor of the Throne, of high rank, obeyed, trustworthy withal. Your companion is not possessed. He surely saw him upon the clear horizon. And he does not withhold grudgingly the Unseen. Nor is it the speech of a satan outcast. So where are you going? It is naught but a reminder for the worlds, for those of you who will to go straight. And you do not will but that God, Lord of the worlds, wills.
Commentary

When the sun is enfolded,

1 Enfolded translates kuwwirat, which may be interpreted in various ways: it may mean that the sun is absorbed into the Divine Throne (Q), that the light of the sun is wiped out (IK, Q), or that one part of it will be folded into another and then it will be rolled up and thrown away (IK). In this vein a ḥadīth says, “The sun and the moon will be rolled up (kuwwirat) on the Day of Resurrection” (IK).

and when the stars fade away;

2 Cf. 77:8. Fade away translates inkadarat, which could also mean to spill out, as a container spills out when it is broken (IK, Q), or to fall upon the ground (Q).

when the mountains are set in motion,

3 Cf. 78:20. Elsewhere it is said that mountains are scattered (77:10), for the Day of Judgment is a day when the mountains are as carded wool (70:9; 101:5) or like heaps of shifting sand (73:14); see also 18:47; 19:90; 20:105–6; 27:88; 52:10; 56:5–6; 69:14.

and when pregnant camels are abandoned;

4 Pregnant camels translates ‘ishār, which is said to indicate the best type of camel when it has reached the tenth month of pregnancy (IK). Camels were central to Arabian livelihood, and a pregnant camel was doubly valuable. Abandoning a pregnant camel would thus have been a salient metaphor for the Arabs of the time, indicating that on the Day of Judgment people will be so preoccupied with their immediate state that they will have no concern for wealth, even their most precious property, or for the things of this world in general.

5 when the wild beasts are gathered,

5 This verse is seen by most commentators as a reference to the gathering together of all created animals, other than jinn and human beings, after resurrection, even flies (IK, Q). It is said by many that God resurrects all of the animals and allows each of them to claim justice, so that those who had been wronged may retaliate against the offenders; then they all become dust (JJ, Q). For the resurrection of animals, see 6:38c. This verse could also be seen as another example of an apocalyptic inversion of the created order, since wild beasts \(wuhush\) cannot be gathered in this world, but are gathered in the Hereafter.

6 and when the seas are made to swell over;

6 Cf. 52:6. That the seas are made to swell over implies another apocalyptic inversion, in which the seas break the barrier which they transgress not (55:20), so that the sweet water mixes with the salty, becoming one (Q, R, T), and so that they burst forth (82:3), covering the earth or parts of it when the earth quakes. For the significance of the two seas, one sweet, satisfying, the other salty, bitter (25:53), see 25:53c; 35:12c; 55:19–20c. Made to swell over translates \(sujjirat\), which could also mean “to be set on fire” and is treated in this way by several early commentators (IK, Q, T).

7 when the souls are coupled,

7 Some say that this verse means when the souls and bodies are joined together on the Day of Judgment (Q). Others maintain that it indicates that the souls of believers are coupled with wide-eyed maidens, as in 44:54 and 52:20, And We shall wed them to wide-eyed maidens (coupled and wed translate the same verb, zawwaja), while the souls of disbelievers and hypocrites are joined to satans, as in 43:36, We assign to him a satan who is then a companion unto him. Others maintain that it indicates souls being joined with like souls, as this is the Day of Division (e.g., 37:21), on which God sorts the righteous from the evil and believers from disbelievers (Q), and they are no longer mixed together as they are in this world. The last interpretation seems to be the most consistent, as a famous hadith says of this verse, “Every man will be joined to every person who did as he did” (Āl, IK, Q). In making this connection several commentaries refer to Sūrah 56, which speaks of the division of human beings into three categories: the companions of the left, the companions of the right, and the foremost; see commentary on 56:7–10.

8 and when the female infant buried alive is asked

9 for what sin she was slain;

8–9 These verses allude to the pre-Islamic Arabian practice of burying newly born females alive. Although the verses specifically reproach those who engaged in this practice, they can also be read as indicating that all who have been wronged in this world will have the opportunity to demand justice of their oppressors and be vindicated in this life or the next.

10 When the pages are spread refers to the opening of the book in which people’s deeds are recorded. Upon witnessing this life review, they will say, “What a book this is! It leaves out nothing, small or great, save that it has taken account thereof.” And they find present [therein] whatsoever they did (18:49), since on the Day of Judgment no deed can be hidden. For the book in which deeds are recorded, see 17:71c; 18:49c; 50:17–18; 69:19–29; 82:11–12.
and when Heaven is laid bare;

11 Laid bare translates kushīṭat, which could also mean “scraped off”; others interpret it to mean “rolled up,” similar to 21:104: That Day We shall roll up the sky like the rolling of scrolls for writings (Q).

when Hellfire is kindled,

12 Hellfire will be kindled by the Anger of God and the sins of human beings (Q, R).

and when the Garden is brought nigh,

13 Those to whom the Garden is brought nigh are the believers who reverence God, as in 26:90: And the Garden will be brought nigh unto the reverent.

each soul shall know what it has made ready.

14 Every soul will know the good and evil it has done, for the pages of its book will be spread open (v. 10), and people will no longer be able to hide their sins with lies and obfuscations, since their ears, their eyes, and their skins will bear witness against them for that which they used to do (41:20), and they will say, “We bear witness against ourselves” (6:130). A well-known hadīth says, “There is none among you, but that God will inform him of that which is between him and his two translators [i.e., the two angels who record his deeds; see 50:17–18c]” (Q).
So I swear by those receding, those that move and set,

15–16 For the implications of I swear (lā uqsimu) here, see 75:1–2c. Those receding, those that move and set is taken by most as a reference to the planets; some say all planets; others say Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury, which (along with the sun and the moon) are visible to the naked eye and thus appear to recede during the day and reappear at night (IK, Q, R). It could also be seen as a reference to the planets having both forward and retrograde motion.

by the night as it approaches,

17 Approaches translates *ʿ asā*ā*, which is among a class of Arabic words that can mean either one thing or its very opposite. *ʿ Asā*ā* thus means both “to approach” and “to leave” (Āl, IK, R) and can refer to either the beginning or the end of the night (Āl, IK, Q, R, T), the latter being similar in meaning to 74:33. It could also be seen as a reference to both the end and the beginning (Āl).

and by the morning as it breathes!

18 The image of the morning as it breathes alludes to both the manner in which the morning appears to awaken from the night and the way its light expands and spreads like exhaled breath until it becomes day (Āl). If v. 17 is taken as the approach of night, this verse is interpreted to mean “by the morning as it rises” (IK), alluding to the beginning of the morning. When v. 17 is taken as the receding of the night, this verse is understood to indicate either the rising of the morning or the gradual illumination of the day.

Truly it is the speech of a noble messenger,
19 This verse is the response to the oath by which God swears in vv. 15–18. It is a reference to the Quran. A noble messenger is taken by most as a reference to the Archangel Gabriel, though some take it as a reference to the Prophet (Q). The verse is repeated in 69:40.

20 possessed of strength, before the Possessor of the Throne, of high rank, 20 If v. 19 is seen as a reference to the Archangel Gabriel, possessed of strength would be similar to one of awesome power, which describes Gabriel in 53:5 (Z). Gabriel’s strength can be taken to mean his ability to withstand all forces from this earth, as he is said to have overcome the armies from the cities of Lot, or his steadfastness in being completely obedient to God from the beginning of creation until the end of time (Āl, Q). If v. 19 is understood as a reference to the Prophet, possessed of strength is taken to mean his ability to deliver God’s message (Q). For Possessor of the Throne, see 17:42; 40:15; 85:15. God is also described as Lord of the Throne (9:129; 21:22; 23:86; 23:116; 27:26; 43:82), which is borne by angels (40:7; 69:17).

21 obeyed, trustworthy withal.

21 When vv. 19–20 are taken as a reference to Gabriel, obeyed refers to his position among other angels. When taken as a reference to the Prophet, it refers to the injunction for those who obey God to obey His Messenger (see 3:32; 4:59; 5:92; 24:54–56; 47:33; 64:12). Trustworthy translates amīn, which could also be rendered “faithful” or “secure,” and is understood to mean that the Prophet is faithful to the revelation and message with which he has been entrusted, delivering it as instructed by God. Al-Amīn, “the Trustworthy,” was one of the names by which the Prophet was known even before the advent of the revelation.

22 Your companion is not possessed.
He surely saw him upon the clear horizon.

According to some, the Prophet had sought a vision of the Archangel Gabriel in his true form, and when he saw him upon the horizon with six hundred wings, he fell down prostrate, covering himself. So the idolaters of Makkah said that he was possessed by a jinn (majnūn) or that he was mad, and vv. 20–23 were revealed in response (Q). The clear horizon is understood by some as a specific reference to the east as the place where the sun rises (Q, R), or as a reference to 53:7, which says that Gabriel was upon the highest horizon during the Night Journey and Ascension (see 17:1c; introduction to Sūrah 53). The verse could also be rendered, “The one who makes clear saw him upon the horizon,” a reading preferred by several scholars when v. 24 is read as describing the Prophet (Q).

And he does not withhold grudgingly the Unseen.

Most take he in this verse as a reference to the Prophet; others as a reference to the Archangel Gabriel. In both cases it means that he teaches the Quran and the rulings (aḥkām) of God that he has been instructed to teach, withholding nothing. Many prefer an alternate reading, in which the word translated withhold grudgingly, ḍanīn, is read as ḥanīn, meaning “suspect, unreliable, or untrustworthy” (Āl, Q, R), meaning, “he is not unreliable with regard to the Unseen.”

Nor is it the speech of a satan outcast.

This verse is a response to those who are reported to have said that the Quran was inspired by Satan and that the Prophet was a sorcerer (R), an accusation made against other prophets as well (see 38:4–5; 51:52).

So where are you going?
26 This verse asks essentially, “Where will you, who do not follow God and His Messenger, turn, for none guides but God?”

27 It is naught but a reminder for the worlds,

28 for those of you who will to go straight.

29 And you do not will but that God, Lord of the worlds, wills.

27–29 Cf. 76:29–31. As translated, v. 27 refers to the Quran. It could also be rendered as a reference to the Prophet Muhammad: “He is naught but a reminder,” as in 88:21: Thou art but a reminder. But it most likely refers to the Quran, as the Quran and previous revelations are referred to as reminders in many verses (e.g., 6:90; 15:9; 16:44). That it is a reminder for the worlds is taken to indicate that it is a universal revelation for any people who desire guidance (Ṭb).

For whosoever wishes to go straight, the Quran and the Prophet will serve as a reminder, but for those who do not, He misleads many by it (i.e., the Quran; 2:26). These verses are taken to indicate that the act of traveling the straight path is dependent upon one’s will and desire to do so (R). Yet none will to follow the straight path unless God wills that they will it, for the manifestation of desire within human beings is determined by God’s Desire (Ṭb). From this perspective, one’s will and desire to follow the path is a manifestation of God’s Will and Desire within; for more on the relation between human choice and Divine determinism, see 54:49c.

Al-Infiṭār is an early Makkan sūrah most likely revealed after Sūrah 79, al-Nāziʿāt. It takes its name from the verb in the first verse, one of the many dramatic descriptions of the cataclysmic alterations that will afflict the sky on the Day of Judgment. Like other sūrahs from this period, the beginning verses focus upon the events that will mark the Day of Judgment (vv. 1–5), which, as in the previous sūrah, are a series of apocalyptic inversions in which the normal order both in Heaven and on earth is turned inside out. This is followed by a reproach and warning of the Last Day (vv. 6–12). The final section (vv. 13–19) contrasts the bliss of the pious with the punishment of the profligate, indicating that in the end all shall know how they have in fact lived.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. When the sky is cleft asunder, 2. and when the stars are dispersed, 3. when the seas are burst forth, 4. and when graves are turned inside out, 5. then shall each soul know what it has sent forth and what it has left behind. 6. O mankind! What has deluded you with regard to your noble Lord, 7. Who created you, then fashioned you, then proportioned you, 8. assembling you in whatever form He willed? 9. Nay! But you deny religion. 10. And yet truly over you there are guardians, noble, writing, knowing what you do. Truly the pious shall be in bliss; and truly the profligate shall be in Hellfire, burning therein on the Day of Judgment. And they will not be absent from it. And what will apprise thee of the Day of Judgment? Then what will apprise thee of the Day of Judgment? A day when no soul will avail another soul in any way, and the Command that Day is with God.
Commentary

1 When the sky is cleft asunder,

2 and when the stars are dispersed,

1–2 The “cleaving” or splitting of the sky (see also 25:25; 55:37; 84:1), when it is opened as if it were gates (78:19) is considered one of the marks of the Day of Judgment (cf. 73:18). When the sky is cleaved, the stars will be blotted out (77:8) and fade away (81:2).

3 when the seas are burst forth,

4 and when graves are turned inside out,

3–4 These verses move from signs of the Hour in the celestial realm to those on the earth. The seas . . . burst forth, breaking the barrier which they transgress not (55:20), mixing with one another and becoming one (Q, R, T), and swell over (81:6; cf. 52:6), covering the earth or parts of it when the earth quakes. For the significance of the two seas, one sweet, satisfying, the other salty, bitter (25:53), see 25:53c; 35:12c; 55:19–20c. The seas swell because of a great earthquake that also causes the earth to overturn and cast out all human beings and jinn (see 99:1–2), at which point they emerge from the graves as if they were scattered locusts (54:7).

5 then shall each soul know what it has sent forth and what it has left behind.

5 Cf. 75:13. According to some, what it has sent forth indicates the good deeds done in obedience to God and observance of His Commands, and what it has left behind indicates those deeds that, although commanded, were left undone (Ṭ). Others say this verse indicates all the good and evil that individuals have sent forth, or done, in accord with which they will be judged, and all the good and evil that was left behind, that they could have done during this life, but did not (Ṭ). Al-Ṭabarî, however, maintains that a deed is not something that can be left behind unless it has actually been performed, so that what it has left behind indicates “a good or evil practice that one has established such that if another performs it he [the one who established it] has the same reward as the one who performed it or the same burden” (Ṭ).

6 O mankind! What has deluded you with regard to your noble Lord,

Two things are said to delude human beings, the life of this world and Satan, the Deluder; see 31:33 and 35:5: So let not the life of this world delude you; nor let the Deluder delude you concerning God.

7 Who created you, then fashioned you, then proportioned you,

Fashioned you refers to the manner in which God has made all human parts and faculties sound and functional (R). Proportioned you translates ʿaddalaka, which could also be read ʿadalaka, meaning “turned you,” implying that God turns people in any direction He wills. Both readings are viable, though the former is grammatically more appropriate when v. 8 is read as a continuation of v. 7 (R, Ṭ).

8 assembling you in whatever form He willed?

Some take this verse to indicate the manner in which God chooses a particular human form for each individual (Q, R, Ṭ). Others take this to mean that God can assemble human beings in the form of other animals (Q, R, Ṭ), presumably as punishment, as implied in 2:65: Be you apes, outcast. Vv. 7–8 can also be taken to imply the inner qualities rather than the outer form, thus referring to states of faith or disobedience (Qu, R) or states of felicity (ṣaʿādah) or wretchedness (ṣhaqāwah), which are commonly understood as referring to states of damnation and salvation, respectively, as in 11:105: On the Day it comes, no soul shall speak, save by His Leave. Among them shall be the wretched and the felicitous.

9 Nay! But you deny religion.

9 Religion, translating dīn, could also be rendered “judgment,” as in vv. 15, 17, and 18; for the broader meaning of dīn, see the essay “The Quranic View of Sacred History and Other Religions.”

10 And yet truly over you there are guardians,

10 Cf. 86:4. Guardians refers to angels who preserve the record of all the deeds of human beings; see 43:80c; 50:17–18c. In accordance with 50:17, most maintain that each individual has two angels solely responsible for recording the deeds that he or she performs in this life.

11 noble, writing,

12 knowing what you do.

11–12 The record the angels write is said to be the book of deeds that is given to each individual on the Day of Judgment; see 18:49c.

13 Truly the pious shall be in bliss;
and truly the profligate shall be in Hellfire, burning therein on the Day of Judgment.

14–15 Profligate translates fujjār (sing. fājir), which could also be rendered “libertine.” It derives from the verb fajara, meaning, “to break open,” and implying that those who do evil break open what should be left closed.

And they will not be absent from it.

Whereas previously the profligate had been oblivious, now they will see the reality of how they have lived (see 50:22), and they will not be able to escape its consequences.

And what will apprise thee of the Day of Judgment?

Then what will apprise thee of the Day of Judgment?

17–18 These verses can be taken as an address directly to the Prophet, to all human beings, or to the disbelievers. Some propose that v. 17 is addressed to the pious and v. 18 to the profligate (R).

A day when no soul will avail another soul in any way, and the Command that Day is with God.
The Day of Judgment is the Day when no friend will avail a friend in any way (44:41), and a day on which no parent will avail his child aught and no child will avail his parent aught (31:33), meaning that no individual will have recourse to anything beyond the record of his own actions and intentions, or the state of his own soul; see also 2:48, 123. And the Command that Day is with God indicates that all intermediaries are then stripped of their power, and God alone is the direct actor. It also points to the fact that all things perish, save His Face (28:88), as God abides, while all else fades.

In another variant, this verse can be read as a continuation of the previous verse, in which case the question ends after the word “way.”

Those Who Defraud

al-Muṭaffīfīn

Al-Muṭaffīfīn is a late Makkan or early Madinan sūrah, or a combination of the two. The first four verses were reportedly revealed just after the Prophet’s arrival in Madinah (Bg, IK, Ṭ); vv. 5–28 are then considered to have been revealed in Madinah; and the last eight verses were most likely the last verses of the Quran to be revealed in Makkah. Others maintain that all of the verses except the first four were revealed in Makkah.

The sūrah takes its name from the reference to the defrauders in v. 1. Defrauders renders al-muṭaffīfīn, which is based upon the word ṭafīf, deriving from ṭaff, meaning “the very edge” of something. Something that is slight or insufficient is called ṭafīf; the term also indicates a measure that is not completely full, not up to the edge. Muṭaffīfīn thus implies those who “skim” a tiny bit off the top and in this way shortchange others. More broadly, it indicates those who ask that their own rights be observed, but are not willing to recognize the rights of others, or those who see faults in others, but do not see them in themselves (Qu, R). Beginning with a condemnation of those who shortchange others (vv. 1–6), the sūrah then provides a contrast between the fate of the profligate (vv. 7–17) and the rewards of the pious (vv. 18–28) and concludes with a discussion of the fate of the sinners who mocked the Prophet and his followers (vv. 29–36).
In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Woe unto the defrauders, 2 who, when they take measure from people, demand [it] in full, 3 and when they measure for them or weigh for them, they stint. 4 Do they not think that they will be resurrected 5 unto a tremendous day— 6 a day when mankind shall stand before the Lord of the worlds? 7 Nay! Truly the book of the profligate is in Sijjīn. 8 And what will apprise thee of Sijjīn? 9 A book inscribed. 10 Woe that Day to the deniers, 11 who deny the Day of Judgment, 12 which none deny save every sinful transgressor. 13 When Our signs are recited unto him, he says, “Fables of those of old!” 14 Nay! But that which they used to earn has covered their hearts with rust. 15 Nay! Surely on that Day they will be veiled from their Lord. 16 Then they will burn in Hellfire. 17 Then it is said unto them, “This is that which you used to deny.” 18 Nay, truly the book of the pious is in ʿIllyyūn. 19 And what will apprise thee of ʿIllyyūn? 20 A book inscribed, 21 witnessed by those brought nigh. 22 Truly the pious shall be in bliss, 23 upon couches, gazing. 24 Thou dost recognize in their faces the splendor of bliss. 25 They are given to drink of pure wine sealed, 26 whose seal is musk—so for that let the strivers strive— 27 and whose mixture is of Tasnīm, 28 a spring whence drink those brought nigh. 29 Truly those who sinned did laugh at those who believed. 30 When they passed them, they would wink at one another. 31 And when they returned to their people, they would return blithely. 32 And when they saw them, they said, “Truly these are astray!” 33 Though they were not sent as guardians over them. 34 So that Day those who believe shall laugh at those who disbelieve, 35 upon couches, gazing. 36 Have the disbelievers been requited for that which they used to do?
Commentary

1 Woe unto the defrauders,

2 who, when they take measure from people, demand [it] in full,

3 and when they measure for them or weigh for them, they stint.

4 Do they not think that they will be resurrected

5 unto a tremendous day—

1–5 Ibn ʿAbbās said, “When the Prophet first moved to Madinah, its inhabitants were the worst kind of defrauders, and so God revealed, Woe unto the defrauders, who, when they take measure from people, demand [it] in full. After the revelation of this verse, they became honest in their weighing” (Q, T, W). According to Abū Hurayrah, these verses refer directly to a man who had two scales, one that he used when buying and another for selling (Q, Ṭs). It is reported that when these verses were revealed, the Prophet recited them to the citizens of Madinah and said, “Five for five.” He was asked, “What is ‘Five for five’?” He answered, “No people broke their covenant, but that God set their enemies over them. None judged by other than what God sent down, but that poverty spread among them. None fornicated, but that death spread among them. None defrauded, but that their crops failed and they were plagued by famine. No community refused to pay alms, but that God withheld rain from them” (Q, R). These verses can also be extended beyond their immediate context to imply that shame and suffering will befall anyone who intentionally falls short in any matter according to what has been ordained by God. With regard to prayer, it is reported that Ibn Masʿūd, a Companion of the Prophet and early Quranic commentator, said, “Prayer is a measure. Whosoever completes [its measure] God will complete [his reward] for him. And whosoever lightens (ṭaffaṭafa) [its measure], you have heard what God has said regarding al-muṭaffifīn [the defrauders, lit. “those who lighten”]” (Ṭs).

In a non-canonical variant reading, both instances of “them” (hum) in v. 3 can be read as an affirmation of the subject rather than as a direct object; “And when they measure, or they weigh, they stint.”

6 a day when mankind shall stand before the Lord of the worlds?

6 Several ḥadīth indicate the nature of standing before God. According to one, “The people will be submerged in perspiration according to their deeds, some up to their knees, some up to the waist, and some will have a bridle of perspiration,” at which point the Prophet pointed toward his mouth (Q, Ṭs). Other narrations say, “People will stand in their perspiration up to the middle of their ears” (Bg, Q, R, Ṭ). Some say that this day is fifty thousand years; others that it is a thousand years; others say three hundred, one hundred, or forty (Q, R, Ṭ); see 22:47c.

7 Nay! Truly the book of the profligate is in Sijjīn.

8 And what will apprise thee of Sijjīn?

7–8 Sijjīn is derived from sijn, meaning “prison” (R, Z). Some interpret Sijjīn as a reference to a place where disbelievers are held until the Day of Judgment; most say it refers to the lowest depths of Hellfire and relate the ḥadīth: “Sijjīn is the lowest of the seven earths” (IK, Q, R, Ṭ). Some relate it to the lowest of the low (95:5), unto which God is said to have cast man, and to the narrow place (25:13) into which the disbelievers are to be cast (IK). Others interpret it as a characterization of the book in which evil deeds are indelibly recorded (Q, Qu, R, Ṭs, Z).

9 A book inscribed.

9 Inscribed here means “sealed” (Q, R), as what is written cannot be decreased or erased (IK, Q, R). Others say it refers to the fact that good and bad deeds are written in the book (Qu). Marqūm, translated inscribed, derives from raqm, meaning “large, bold writing.” It may thus imply clear, unambiguous, decisive inscriptions. Some say that this verse describes Sijjīn (R), but most agree that it describes the book of the profligate, not Sijjīn itself (Q, R, Ṭs, Z).

10 Woe that Day to the deniers,

10 This verse is a refrain found throughout Sūrah 77 and in 52:11.

11 who deny the Day of Judgment,

12 which none deny save every sinful transgresser.

13 When Our signs are recited unto him, he says, “Fables of those of old!”

13 Cf. 68:15. Fables of those of old (cf. 6:25; 8:31; 16:24; 23:83; 25:5; 27:68; 46:17; 68:15) is an expression used in the Quran by disbelievers to deny its veracity.

14 Nay! But that which they used to earn has covered their hearts with rust.

14 Regarding this verse, a ḥadīth states, “Verily, when the servant commits a sin, a black spot appears in his heart. If he repents from it, his heart is polished clean. But if he increases [in sin], the spot will continue to increase. That is the statement of God, Nay! But that which they used to earn has covered their hearts with rust” (IK, Q). Some commentators say that this verse refers to inveterate sinners for whom sin upon sin has sealed their hearts from realizing the truth (Q, R), like one surrounded by his sins (2:81). According to the Prophet, the heart covered with rust must be “polished.” As he says in a famous ḥadīth, “For everything there is a polish, and the polish for the heart is the remembrance of God. There is nothing more potent in saving a person from the Punishment of God than the remembrance of God.” It was asked, “Not even striving (jihād) in the path of God?” Then he replied, “Not even if you were to continue striking with your sword until it breaks.”

15 Nay! Surely on that Day they will be veiled from their Lord.

This verse may mean that they are veiled from God’s Mercy and Magnanimity (karāmah; Q, R, Ṭ, Ṭs, Z) or that they are forbidden from seeing their Lord, for in Arabic one can say that one who is barred from seeing the king is “veiled” from him (R, Z). Many relate this to the belief that after the gathering of all human beings and jinn before God (see, e.g., 3:25; 4:87; 6:38, 128; 42:7; 64:9), the believers will see God, but the disbelievers will not (R). In this vein, the famous Persian Sufi poet Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī writes, “Everyone sees the Unseen in proportion to the clarity of his heart, and that depends upon how much he has polished it. Whoever has polished it more sees more—more Unseen forms become manifest to him”(Mathnawī, 4:2909–10).

16 Then they will burn in Hellfire.

17 Then it is said unto them, “This is that which you used to deny.”

Cf. 52:14.

18 Nay, truly the book of the pious is in ʿIlliyyūn.

19 And what will apprise thee of ʿIlliyyūn?
18–19 ʿIlliyyūn is an unusual plural whose singular form is disputed. It indicates high places, persons who sit in high places, or those who dwell in the high parts of mountains. Here it refers to something exalted by many degrees. Contrasted with Sijjīn in v. 7, it appears to refer to a place in Heaven in which good deeds are indelibly recorded. The fifth Shiite Imam, Muhammad al-Bāqir, is reported to have said, “Sijjīn is the seventh earth, and ʿIlliyyūn is the seventh heaven.” Opinions differ. ʿIlliyyūn is either in the seventh heaven below the Divine Throne or beyond the seven heavens to the right of the Throne (Q); it indicates heights without limit (Q) or refers to the lote tree of the boundary (53:14).

20 A book inscribed,

20 Most agree that this verse describes the book of the righteous (Q, R, Ts, Z). Some, however, say that it could describe ʿIlliyyūn itself, in which case kitāb, or “book,” would mean “writing” (kitābah), indicating that the writing of the deeds of the pious is in ʿIlliyyūn and that it is a “writing inscribed” (R).

21 witnessed by those brought nigh.

21 Some say that those brought nigh refers to the archangels, as in 4:172, in which case it refers to the angels who bear witness to the book of the pious (Q, R, Ts). Others say that those brought nigh refers to the elect among the pious, who are the foremost of the foremost (56:10–11). It could also refer to the archangels and the foremost, as both are brought nigh.

22 Truly the pious shall be in bliss,

22 Cf. 82:13. Elsewhere the reverent and those who believe and perform righteous deeds are described as being in Gardens of bliss (see 5:65; 10:9; 22:56; 37:43; 52:17; 56:12); see also 9:21; 26:85; 31:8; 56:89; 68:34. Regarding the meaning of the pious (al-abrār) and piety (birr), see 2:44c.

23 upon couches, gazing.

23 Cf. 75:23; 88:13. The couches represent the state of the soul at peace (89:27), content with God, while God is content with it. The pious are gazing at the delights they are given in the Garden (Q, R, Ṭs), or at God Himself (Q, R), as in 75:22–23: Faces that Day shall be radiant, gazing upon their Lord. Some commentators say they gaze upon the punishment endured by their enemies (Q, R, Ṭs; see vv. 34–35), though this interpretation is not consonant with the sayings of the Prophet or with other passages of the Quran.

24 Thou dost recognize in their faces the splendor of bliss.

24 Thou can be read in a general sense as an address to any reader or listener or as a specific reference to the Prophet Muhammad. The verse is read by some in the passive voice, “The splendor of bliss can be recognized in their faces” (Q, R).

25 They are given to drink of pure wine sealed,

25 Those in Paradise drink the pure wine sanctioned by God. It may be the same as the wine in 37:46–47: White, delicious to those who drink thereof. No headiness lies therein; nor are they intoxicated by it; and 56:19: Wherefrom they suffer neither headache nor stupefaction. Some say that this pure wine is superior to the rivers of wine referred to in 47:15 (R).

26 whose seal is musk—so for that let the strivers strive—26  Seal refers to either an actual seal of musk upon the wine (Ṭ, Ṭṣ) or the scent of musk, which appears when the end of the wine is reached (Q, R, Ṭ).

27  and whose mixture is of Tasnīm,

28  a spring whence drink those brought nigh.

27–28  Most commentators agree that Tasnīm is the purest and noblest drink of Heaven (Ṭ). Some say that it flows from the Divine Throne into Paradise. Tasnīm is understood by some as a proper name with no specific meaning (R, Ṭ). Others propose that it derives from the verb sannama, “to raise,” indicating that it raises or ennobles those who drink it (R). According to Ibn ʿAbbās, Tasnīm is what is alluded to in 32:17: No soul knows what comfort is kept hidden for it as a recompense for that which they used to do (R). Some say that Tasnīm is a spring whose waters are mixed with the pure wine sealed for the companions of the right (56:8, 27, 38, 90–91; 74:39; 90:18), but from which those brought nigh drink in its purest form (Ṭ). Similarly, others say those brought nigh drink of it unmixed, while all the other inhabitants of Paradise drink of it mixed (Ṭ). According to al-Rāzī, Tasnīm “is the knowledge of God and the delight of gazing upon the Face of God.” So those brought nigh drink from none but Tasnīm, for they gaze upon none but God, whereas the companions of the right sometimes gaze upon the delights of the created (though paradisal) world and sometimes upon the Face of God, and thus drink a mixture (R). Some Sufi commentators have identified Tasnīm with the highest level of spiritual love (maḥabbah).

29  Truly those who sinned did laugh at those who believed.

30  When they passed them, they would wink at one another.

29–30  According to some, those who sinned refers to the leaders of the Quraysh, who used to laugh at and mock several of the more impoverished Muslims (Q, R); see also 23:109–10.
And when they returned to their people, they would return blithely.

Blithely translates fākihīn, as it is read in most schools of Quranic recitation, though the most widespread school of recitation, Ḥafṣ, reads it as fakihīn, which translates as “conceited” or “proud.”

And when they saw them, they said, “Truly these are astray!”

The disbelievers deem the believers to be astray for following the Prophet.

Though they were not sent as guardians over them.

This verse implies that the disbelievers are not fit to judge the actions of the believers (Ṭs). Some gloss guardians (ḥāfīzīn) as “witnesses” (shāhidīn), meaning that they arrogate to themselves the ability to bear witness against the believers, but in the Hereafter it is the believers who will bear witness against them (Ṭṣ).

So that Day those who believe shall laugh at those who disbelieve,

That Day is the Day of Resurrection.

upon couches, gazing.

In this context, the implication is that the believers are gazing upon the disbelievers and witnessing the punishment the disbelievers receive for having mocked them (Aj). It can thus be viewed as a contrast to v. 23, or alternatively as a reassertion of the same paradisal state. See 83:23c.

36 Have the disbelievers been requited for that which they used to do?

36 The answer to the question posed by this verse is yes and no. On the one hand, the disbelievers have been requited with punishment for the evil deeds they committed. On the other hand, they have not been requited for what only appear to be good deeds, since they are those whose deeds have come to naught in this world and in the Hereafter (3:22; see also 7:147; 18:104; 47:8–9). From a Quranic perspective, only those deeds that are accompanied by belief in God, His prophets, His revelations, and His angels can truly be called good or righteous. Thus the phrase perform righteous deeds, which occurs over fifty times in the Quran, is always accompanied by some mention of belief in God.

The Sundering

al-Inshiqāq

Chronologically al-Inshiqāq most likely follows Sūrah 82, al-Infiṭār, making it one of the last *sūrah*s to be revealed in Makkah. It takes its name from the mention of the sky being rent asunder in the first verse and is also known as Inshaqqat, “Rent Asunder” (Āl). As a thematic thread, Sūrah 82 alludes to the guardian angels who write one’s deeds in a book (82:10–12), Sūrah 83, al-Muṭaffifīn, contrasts the book of the profligate (83:7) with the book of the pious (83:18), and this sūrah contrasts the reactions of those who receive their book in the right hand (v. 7), with those who receive it from behind their backs (v. 10) on the Day of Resurrection.

The sūrah begins with allusions to events that will transpire on the Day of Judgment (vv. 1–5) and then contrasts those who will have a joyful reckoning with those who will not (vv. 6–15), followed by a series of oaths (vv. 16–18) that lead into a confirmation of the great disparity between the final ends of the believers and the disbelievers (vv. 19–25).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. When the sky is rent asunder, 2. and hearkens unto its Lord, as in truth it must; 3. and when the earth is stretched out, 4. and casts forth what is in it, emptying itself, 5. and hearkens unto its Lord, as in truth it must. 6. O mankind! Truly thou art laboring unto thy Lord laboriously, and shall meet Him! 7 As for one who is given his book in his right hand, 8 he will be reckoned with an easy reckoning 9 and will return to his people joyful. 10 But as for one who is given his book from behind his back, 11 he will cry out for destruction, 12 and will enter a Blaze. 13 Truly among his people he was joyful. 14 Truly he thought that he would never return. 15 Nay! Truly his Lord was watchful of him. 16 So I swear by the twilight, 17 by the night and what it enshrouds, 18 and by the moon when full; 19 thou wilt surely journey from stage to stage. 20 So what ails them that they believe not, 21 and that when the Quran is recited unto them, they do not prostrate? 22 Nay! Those who disbelieve deny. 23 But God knows best what they conceal. 24 So give them glad tidings of a painful punishment, 25 save those who believe and perform righteous deeds; theirs shall be a reward unceasing.
Commentary

① When the sky is rent asunder,

② and hearkens unto its Lord, as in truth it must;

1–2  The sky . . . rent asunder refers to the destruction of the world at the end of time (cf. 55:37; 77:9; 82:1–2); the sky hearkens unto God, because it cannot but obey its creator (IK, Q).

③ and when the earth is stretched out,

3  When the earth is stretched out means when all that is upon it is made flat (cf. 20:105–7). According to some, this is to prepare for the Day of Judgment, when all human beings will be gathered on a single plain (see 18:47; 20:106; 79:14).

④ and casts forth what is in it, emptying itself,

4  This verse refers to the time when all of the graves are emptied and everyone is brought to Judgment (cf. 79:13–14; 99:2). Some say it means that all that was hidden within it becomes manifest.

⑤ and hearkens unto its Lord, as in truth it must.

5  Cf. vv. 1–2.
6 O mankind! Truly thou art laboring unto thy Lord laboriously, and shall meet Him!

6 According to Ibn ʿAbbās, this verse means, “Whatever deed you do, you will meet God with it, whether it is good or bad” (IK); see commentary on 99:6–8. Maybudī understands it as an injunction to be mindful, since every moment is a step closer to God.

7 As for one who is given his book in his right hand,

7 For the symbolic distinction between right and left, see 56:8–9c; for the meaning of the book in which one’s deeds are recorded, see 18:49c; and for the symbolism of receiving the book in the right or left hand, see 17:71c; 69:19–29c. This verse and others (e.g., 56:27–46) display the universal identification of the right hand with goodness and light and the left hand (though not mentioned explicitly) with evil and darkness, like the Latin sinister, which means “on the left” and is the origin of the English “sinister.”

8 he will be reckoned with an easy reckoning

8 The Prophet said, “Whosoever is reckoned on the Day of Resurrection will be punished.” To which ʿĀʾishah responded, “But has God not said, As for one who is given his book in his right hand, he will be reckoned with an easy reckoning?” The Prophet replied, “That is not the Reckoning; rather, that is the presentation [of deeds]. Whosoever suffers the interrogation of the Reckoning on the Day of Resurrection will be punished” (IK, Q, Z).

9 and will return to his people joyful.

9 His people (ahlihi) may refer to family if they were believers, a group of similar believers, or companions in Paradise (Z). According to 13:3; 40:8; and 43:70, the pious will enjoy the company of pious family members in the Hereafter.

10–12 To reconcile v. 10 with 69:25, which states that those who are reckoned are given their book in their left hand, the commentators say that in this instance the left hand will be tied behind the back (IK, Q, Ṭs, Z).

13–14 Among his people he was joyful refers to the life of this world; it represents the heedlessness of those who did not believe that they were laboring unto their Lord and would return to Him in the Resurrection and face the Reckoning on the Day of Judgment (cf. 83:31). Regarding this contrast, a hadīth says, “The world is the prison of the believer and the garden of the disbeliever” (R).

15 Nay! That is, they will in fact return. God has been aware of all their actions from the moment He created them until the moment He resurrects them (Ṭs).
So I swear by the twilight,

16 Twilight (al-shafaq) refers to the remaining redness and light of the sun after its setting at the beginning of the night until it is close to actual nighttime (IK) or the period between the setting of the sun and the last bit of light on the horizon (Q).

by the night and what it enshrouds,

17 Enshrouds (tasaqa) conveys the notion of “gathering together (in one herd)” and points to the symbolic power of night, as it gathers all things together by encompassing them in darkness, just as all things will be brought back to God in the end.

and by the moon when full;

18 When full (ittasaqa) derives from the same root as “enshroud” (tasaqa). In relation to v. 19, it can be seen as a reference to the manner in which all that exists waxes and wanes as it goes through various states and phases.

thou wilt surely journey from stage to stage.

19 From stage to stage is understood by some to indicate the vagaries of human existence, in which we experience “ease after difficulty, difficulty after ease, wealth after poverty, poverty after wealth, health after sickness, and sickness after health” (IK, Q). Yet others say, “From stage to stage: weaned after he was breast-fed, and an old man after he was a young man” (IK). Others understand it as a reference to the many states of being from nonexistence to life to death, then to all posthumous states of being; some say it refers only to the posthumous states of being or merely to states of being on the Day of Resurrection (Q, R, Z; see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran”). It can also be seen as a reference to the exchange of states in which those who are lowly on the earth will be exalted in the Hereafter and those exalted on earth will be brought low (R). This verse is likely an address to the Prophet, as it is in the second-person singular, in which case it is seen as a reference to his moving in degrees of nearness to God (R), or as an allusion to the night of Ascension (miʿrāj; see 17:1c; My). In this vein, it is recorded that Ibn ʿAbbās said of this verse, “That concerns your Prophet.”

20 So what ails them that they believe not,

20 As a continuation of v. 14, this verse asks, “Seeing as all things move through phases of existence whereby they return to God, how could human beings not discern the truth from these signs and not believe in the Resurrection and in God’s Power over all things?” (Q, R).

21 and that when the Quran is recited unto them, they do not prostrate?

21 Here the Quran is invoked as another sign of God, as if to say, “If they cannot read the signs of God in the created world, then they should at least be able to recognize the miracle of the Quran and the signs of God contained in it.” According to some, prostrate (yasjudūn) refers to prayer. Others say it refers to humility. Most maintain that this is one of fifteen verses after which one prostrates when reciting the Quran; see 19:58c. Imam Mālik does not maintain that one is obligated to prostrate after reciting this verse, but other Mālikī jurists do (Q).

22 Nay! Those who disbelieve deny.
22 Some are inveterate; so no matter whether they see signs that appeal to intelligence or miracles such as the Quran, they will not believe.

23 But God knows best what they conceal.

23 What the disbelievers are concealing within their breasts and hearts is polytheism, whatever its form, and denial (R, Ṭṣ).

24 So give them glad tidings of a painful punishment,

24 Although glad tidings usually indicates the good news of salvation that prophets bring, here as elsewhere (see 3:21; 4:138; 9:3, 34; 45:8), it is used with a sense of irony indicating that hypocrites and disbelievers will receive the painful punishment that they seem to desire. Alternately glad tidings could be read as a reference to the following verse, thus indicating that the door of repentance remains open.

25 save those who believe and perform righteous deeds; theirs shall be a reward unceasing.

25 Cf. 41:8; 95:6. Some say this verse should read, “but those who believe . . .” to distinguish the fate of believers from that of disbelievers (Q, Z). Others say that it should be “save those who . . .” to distinguish the disbelievers who repent from those who do not (Q, R). For the meaning of reward unceasing, see 41:8c; 95:6c.

The Constellations

\textit{al-Burūj}

\textbf{Al-Burūj} is a Makkan \textit{sūrah} said to have been revealed immediately after \textit{Sūrah} 91, \textit{al-Shams}. It takes its name from the mention in the first verse of the \textit{burūj}, meaning “constellations” or “mansions.” The Prophet is reported to have said of this \textit{sūrah}, “Whosoever recites it, God will give reward for the good deeds ten times the number of all people gathered in Friday prayer and all people gathered on the Day of Ṭārīfah [the most important day of the ḥajj and the ninth day of the month of Dhu’l-Ḥijjah].”

The \textit{sūrah} begins with a short series of oaths (vv. 1–3), followed by the story of the \textit{inhabitants of the pit}, who are said to have persecuted the believers (vv. 4–10). Their destiny is then contrasted to that of the believers in v. 11, followed by a description of God’s Omnipotence (vv. 12–20) and two oft recited verses that speak of the Quran as being \textit{upon a Preserved Tablet} (vv. 21–22). It is reported that the Prophet would often recite this and the following \textit{sūrah} as part of the two afternoon prayers.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful and were witness to what they did unto the believers, and took vengeance on them for naught but that they believed in God, the Mighty, the Praised, unto Whom belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth; and God is Witness over all things. Truly those who persecute believing men and believing women, then do not repent, theirs shall be the punishment of Hell, and theirs shall be the punishment of the burning. Truly those who believe and perform righteous deeds, theirs shall be Gardens with rivers running below: that is the supreme triumph. Truly thy Lord’s assault is severe. Truly it is He Who originates and brings back. And He is the Forgiving, the Loving, Possessor of the Throne, the Glorious, Doer of whatsoever He will. Hast thou heard tell of the hosts—Pharaoh and Thamūd? Yet those who disbelieve are in denial. And God is behind them, All-Encompassing. Nay, it is a glorious Quran, upon a Preserved Tablet.
Commentary

1 By the sky possessed of constellations.

For constellations (burūj), see 25:61c. Here the constellations are considered to refer to the stars themselves (Q), the largest stars (R, Z), lofty towers in the sky, or to the traditional twelvefold division of the belt of the sky through which the planets, including the sun and the moon, pass (Aries, Taurus, etc.; Q, R, Ṭ, Z). Owing to a lexical relation to tabarruj (“to display one’s beauty”), possessed of constellations (dhāt al-burūj) could also be read “beautiful in its creation” (Q).

2 By the Day promised,

The Day is the Day of Resurrection (Q, R, Ṭs, Z).

3 and by the witness and the witnessed.

Most commentators interpret witness and witnessed as references to Friday and the Day of ʿArafah, respectively (Bg, Q, Ṭ). Some see the Prophet Muhammad as the witness, as in 2:143 and 22:78: and that the Messenger may be a witness for you (cf. 4:41; 33:45), and human beings as the witnessed (Bg, Q). Others interpret witness as a reference to the Prophet Muhammad and witnessed as a reference to the Islamic community (ummah), while others prefer the pairing of all of the Divine messengers and their respective communities, as the messengers will bear witness for or against their communities on the Day of Judgment (cf. 4:41; 5:117; Q). Another view sees witness as the Muslim community and witnessed as all other communities, as in 2:143: Thus did we make you a middle community, that you may be witnesses for mankind (cf. 22:78). Others say that witness is human beings and witnessed is God (Q). In another interpretation witness is human beings and witnessed the black stone in the Kaʿbah that pilgrims touch in bearing witness to their covenant with God (Q, Ṭs). Others take God to be the witness, as in 4:79: God suffices as a Witness; and 6:19: Say, “What thing is greatest as testimony?” Say, “God is Witness between you and me” (Q).

May they perish, the inhabitants of the pit,

4–9  Many stories attempt to identify the inhabitants of the pit. Some take it as a reference to the people of Dhū Nuwās al-Yamānī, a Yemeni king who is said to have persecuted the Christians of Yemen in pre-Islamic times (IK). The most frequently cited account in the interpretation of this verse is a hadīth that relates the story of a king who was enraged that the people recognized God as their Lord and as a lord above him. After he killed a young boy who was foremost among them and the people refused to renounce their religion, he ordered that ditches be dug at the entrances to the roads. It was done, and fires were kindled in them. Then the king said, “Whoever abandons his religion, let him go, and whoever does not, cast him into the fire.” So they set about casting people into the fire. Then a woman came with her son, and he said, “Be patient, mother, for truly you are following the truth” (Bg, IK, Q, R, Ṭ, Ṭs). Most say that the religion of those persecuted was Christianity; others say they were Magians (Ṭs); still others say it could refer to one of the messengers not mentioned in the Quran (Bg). Although these verses are believed to pertain to a particular historical incident, they present a universal condemnation of all who persecute believers of any faith.

4  Another reading is, “Slain were the inhabitants of the pit.”

the fire well fueled,

when they sat by it,

6  This verse refers to either the disbelievers sitting beside the fire while the believers burned in it (Bg, Q, Ṭ, Ṭs) or the believers, either those who were burning, and thus sitting “upon” it rather than “by” it, or the believers who were not burned because they renounced their religion and then sat by witnessing the others burn (R).

7 and were witness to what they did unto the believers,

7 This verse can refer to either the presence of the disbelievers at the burning of the believers or their bearing witness against themselves on the Day of Judgment, as in 24:24; 36:65; 41:20.

10 Truly those who persecute believing men and believing women, then do not repent, theirs shall be the punishment of Hell, and theirs shall be the punishment of the burning.

10 This verse could apply only to the inhabitants of the pit or to all who persecute believers simply for their belief (R). Hell and burning may refer to two forms of punishment suffered by those who persecute believers, or to the contrast between the eternal punishment of Hell suffered by the inhabitants of the pit and the temporary punishment of burning they inflicted upon the believers (R). Some say the punishment of Hell is for their disbelieving and the punishment of burning is for persecuting others (Ṭs).
Truly those who believe and perform righteous deeds, theirs shall be Gardens with rivers running below: that is the supreme triumph.

The supreme triumph (al-fawz al-kabīr) most likely refers to Paradise, similar to the great triumph (al-fawz al-ʿaẓīm), which commentators usually identify as a reference to the Garden, indicating that it is greater than any triumph one can attain in this world (Al). For the blessings of Paradise, see commentary on 5:119; 44:51–57.

Assault renders baṭsh, which indicates a sudden seizing by God, similar to 11:102: Such is the seizing of thy Lord when He seizes the towns while they are doing wrong. Surely His seizing is painful, severe (R). Some interpret this verse as the response to the oath begun in v. 1, with what lies between constituting an affirmation of the oath (Q).

Truly thy Lord’s assault is severe.

Truly it is He Who originates and brings back.

God originates and brings back, that is, causes things to come into being and then to return to Him, thereby giving them a new life after their life on this earth.

And He is the Forgiving, the Loving,

Possessor of the Throne, the Glorious,

For God as Possessor of the Throne, see 17:42; 40:15; 81:20. Elsewhere in the Quran God is described as Lord of the Throne (9:129; 21:22; 23:86; 23:116; 27:26; 43:82), which is borne by angels (40:7; 69:17). If Glorious is read in the nominative, it describes Possessor; if in the genitive, it describes the Doer of whatsoever He will.

Cf. 22:18: Truly God does whatsoever He will. One of the basic themes of the Quran is that God is Omnipotent and His Will is supreme, as in 5:17: Unto God belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth and whatsoever is between them. He creates whatsoever He will, and God is Powerful over all things (cf. 24:45; 30:54).

Hast thou heard tell of the hosts—

Pharaoh and Thamūd?

Hosts here refers to earlier peoples who denied prophets and were vanquished. Pharaoh provides an older example from the Biblical tradition, and the Thamūd would have likely been a more resonant example for the Arabs. These examples show that the situation faced by the Muslims is the same as the one all believers face and that the Muslims, like those who were oppressed before them, will prevail (R), whether in this life or the next. For the Quranic account of Pharaoh, see 7:103–41; 20:24–79. For the account of the Thamūd, a pre-Islamic northern Arabian tribe who rejected the Prophet Ṣāliḥ, see 7:73–79; 11:61–68.

Yet those who disbelieve are in denial.

And God is behind them, All-Encompassing.

Although He is “unseen,” God encompasses whatsoever they do (4:108; 8:47) and is able to inflict upon the hosts of the disbelievers what He inflicted upon the hosts of Pharaoh, the Thamūd, and others (Q).
21–22 According to some, glorious (majīd) indicates the utmost in nobility, magnanimity, and grace (Q). Others say that it indicates the uncreatedness of the Quran (Q). In light of 15:9, Truly it is We Who have sent down the Reminder, and surely We are its Preserver, the present verses are understood to indicate that the Quran is guarded by God from any increase, decrease, distortion, or change (IK, Q, R, Ṭ, Ṭs,).

Some say that the Book concealed (56:78) and the Preserved Tablet are the same (R). Others say that the Preserved Tablet refers to a book recited by the angels nigh unto God (Aj, Q, R), while others relate it to the Mother of the Book (3:7; 13:39; 43:4), said to be the source of all revelation, from which the Quran and all other revealed Books are derived (Q, Ṭs). Some commentators describe the Tablet (lawh) as one made of white pearls that is as high as the distance between Heaven and earth and as wide as the distance between the east and the west (JJ, Q, Ṭs). Others say that it is located to the right of God’s Throne (Q, R, Ṭs). In keeping with the predominant theme of the sūrah, believers prevailing over persecution from disbelievers, al-Qushayrī relates the Preserved Tablet to 29:49, Nay, it is but clear signs in the breasts of those who have been given knowledge, indicating that the Quran is preserved in the hearts of true believers. For further discussion of the Preserved Tablet, see the essay “The Quran and Schools of Islamic Theology and Philosophy.”
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
An early Makkan sūrah, al-Ṭāriq was most likely revealed after Sūrah 90, al-Balad. It takes its title from the mention in the first verse of al-Ṭāriq, a word that derives from the verb ṭaraqa, meaning “to pound.” Al-ṭāriq is thus understood by some to indicate “the way,” because the path is pounded by the feet that walk upon it. Since doors are closed at night, when people arrive at this time, they must pound on them to gain entry, thus al-Ṭāriq is also understood to mean That which comes by night, or “The Night Visitant.” Al-Ṭariq is also understood by some as a reference to the Morning Star. The sūrah begins with an oath by Heaven and the celestial bodies (vv. 1–3). It then calls upon human beings to reflect upon the soul and the humble origins of their physical nature and the fact that all are returning to God (vv. 4–10). An oath echoing that of vv. 1–3 (vv. 11–12) then leads into a final warning (vv. 13–17). It is reported that the Prophet would often recite this and the previous sūrah as part of the two afternoon prayers.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. By the sky and that which comes by night.
2. And what will apprise thee of that which comes by night?
3. It is the piercing star.
4. Over every soul there is a guardian.
5. So let man consider that from which he was created. He was created from a gushing fluid, issuing from between the loins and the pelvic arch. Truly He is able to bring him back, on the Day when secrets are tested, whereat man has neither strength nor helper. By the resurgent sky, and by the furrowed earth, truly it is indeed a decisive Word. And it is not for amusement. Truly they are devising a scheme, and I, too, am devising a scheme. So be gentle with the disbelievers; grant them respite for a while.
Commentary

1 By the sky and that which comes by night.

2 And what will apprise thee of that which comes by night?

1–2 That which comes by night refers to either a specific star or all heavenly bodies that appear at night and disappear during the day (Bq).

3 It is the piercing star.

3 Most say the piercing star refers to the Pleiades. Others say that it is Saturn, Venus, or a meteor. A minority say that it can be any star that glitters (Āl). In each interpretation the star is called upon because it pierces the dark (Āl) and in this sense can be seen as an allusion to overcoming ignorance (Bq).

4 Over every soul there is a guardian.

4 A guardian refers to the angels who are said to be tasked with recording the deeds of individual human beings (cf. 40:80; 50:18; 82:10–12) or to the angels who protect human beings at all times (cf. 6:61; 13:11), though the protection here may be specifically against the whispers of Satan and jinn referred to in 114:4–6.

5 So let man consider that from which he was created.

5 Let those who deny the Resurrection reflect upon the manner in which God created them (Ṭ). This verse can also be understood as a call to recognize that for which the human being was created, as in 51:56: I did not create jinn...
and mankind, save to worship Me. In this vein, Maybūdī writes: “God created a face fit for prostration, eyes fit for taking heed, a body fit for service, a heart fit for knowledge (ʿirfān), and a secret core fit for love. So remember God’s Blessing upon you [2:231], for He adorned your tongues with the shahādah, your hearts with knowledge (ʿirfān) and joy, and your bodies with service and worship.”

6 He was created from a gushing fluid,

7 issuing from between the loins and the pelvic arch.

6–7 Loins (ṣulb) and pelvic arch (tarāʾib) are understood by some to refer to the respective parts of the man and the woman, whose sperm and egg form the fetus (Ṭ); others restrict them to the male (Ṭ, Ṭs), saying that loins and pelvic arch refer to the area from which a man’s fluid gushes.

8 Truly He is able to bring him back,

8 As in 19:67 and 22:5, here the Quran argues that if God is able to create human beings from dust, then from a drop (35:11), then He can surely resurrect them, as in 30:27: He it is Who originates creation, then brings it back, and that is most easy for Him. Many pre-Islamic Arabs accepted that God was the Creator, but did not accept that He could resurrect the dead (see 18:37; 19:67–73; 22:5–6c; 23:13–16; 35:11; 40:67; 76:2; 80:18–22).

9 Secrets refers to all that is hidden in the heart and mind and to all of one’s deeds (Z). People’s mouths, feet, hands (36:65), and even their skin (41:19–24) will bear witness to what they have done. It is related that Muʿādh ibn Jabal asked the Prophet, “What are these secrets for which the servants [i.e., human beings] will be tested in the Hereafter?” To which he replied, “Your secrets are your deeds, such as prayer, fasting, the alms, the minor ablution, the major ablution, and all other obligatory acts. All deeds are hidden secrets. For if a person wills, he says, ‘I have prayed,’ though he has not prayed. And if he wills, he says, ‘I have made my ablution,’ though he has not made his ablution. And this is God’s Word (qawl), on the Day when secrets are tested” (Ṭs).

10 whereat man has neither strength nor helper.

This verse echoes others in which God is spoken of as the sole helper or protector (see, e.g., 2:107, 120; 9:74, 116; 33:18, 65; 42:31; 48:22), and none shall avail another against God’s Punishment (2:48, 123; 3:10, 116; 26:88; 31:33; 44:41).

11 By the resurgent sky,

12 and by the furrowed earth,

These verses refer to the cycles of the seasons and the growing of vegetation as signs that God can resurrect as He wills, just as vv. 6–8 cited human beings’ emergence from a base fluid. In reference to heaven, “resurgent” (rajʿ) refers to the rains that return periodically. Thus most interpret the resurgent sky as a reference to rain or to the clouds that bring rain (IK, Ṭ, Ṭs). Others interpret it as a reference to the continual return of the sun, the moon, and other celestial bodies (Ṭ). The furrowed earth is where the vegetation emerges.

13 truly it is indeed a decisive Word.

A decisive Word refers to either the Quran or the Day of Judgment, both of which separate good from evil in a decisive manner. The Prophet said of the Quran, “It is a statement that separates right from wrong” (Āl). See 37:21; 44:40; 77:13, 38; 78:17, where the Day of Judgment is referred to as the Day of Division between truth and falsehood, right and wrong, light and dark.

14 And it is not for amusement.

15 Truly they are devising a scheme,

16 and I, too, am devising a scheme.

15–16 Here the disbelievers among the Quraysh are likened to those who schemed against previous prophets, such as Joseph, Moses, and Hūd. But as 8:18 says, God makes feeble the scheming of the disbelievers, since God is swifter in plotting (10:21). And although God’s scheme is firm (7:183; 68:45), those who are guilty only plot against themselves, though they are unaware (6:123). Thus 16:127 counsels the Prophet, Grieve not on their account, nor be distressed by what they plot (see also 52:46; 77:39).

17 So be gentle with the disbelievers; grant them respite for a while.

17 Grant them respite indicates that one should not seek to hasten the Hour, as do the disbelievers (see 8:32; 42:18c), because God will deal with them in due time (see 31:24). Some say that the implication that God will deal with them refers to the Battle of Badr in 2/624, when the Makkans were defeated by the Muslims; others say that it refers to the Day of Resurrection, on which all will be judged (Ṭs). The verse can be seen as alluding to punishment in both this world and the Hereafter, but also to mercy insofar as God allows people time to repent.
Opinions are divided as to whether al-Aʿlā is a Makkan or Madinan sūrah, but the majority maintain that it is early Makkan. It is often placed eighth in the chronological order of revelation, immediately after Sūrah 81, al-Takwīr. Some consider the first part of the sūrah to be Makkan and the last part to be Madinan, since it contains words about prayer and the zakāh (alms) in vv. 14–15, which, according to narrations from the family of the Prophet, refer to “the prayer and zakāh on the ‘Īd al-fiṭr [Feast of Breaking Fast],” which was not institutionalized until the Madinan period (Ṭb). Others say that it can still refer to these ritual practices, although it was revealed before them, and that the whole sūrah is Makkan (Bg).

The Prophet is said to have recommended reciting Sūrahs 87 and 88 for the evening prayer. These same sūrahs were often recited by the Prophet on both the ‘Īd al-fiṭr, marking the end of Ramadan, and the ‘Īd al-adḥā, marking the completion of the bājj, and during the Friday congregational prayer (IK). He is also said to have advised his followers to recite it while in prostration (Ṭs). In the Shiite tradition, it is related that, according to Imam ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, if people knew what a blessing al-Aʿlā has, every person would recite it ten times each day, and one who recites it has, in essence, recited the Quran and the scriptures of Moses and Abraham.

The sūrah begins with glorification of God (vv. 1–5) and encouragement for the Prophet (vv. 6–9) followed by a contrast between those who heed the Quran and those who avoid it (vv. 10–15). It concludes with a sharp rebuke of those who prefer this world (vv. 16–17) and an affirmation of the connection between the Quran and previous revelations (vv. 18–19).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Glorify the Name of thy Lord, the Most High, 2 Who created, then fashioned, 3 Who measured out, then guided, 4 and Who brought forth pasture, 5 then made it as blackened stubble. 6 We shall teach thee to recite, that thou wilt not forget, 7 save what God wills. Truly He knows that which is open and that which is hidden. 8 And We shall ease thy way unto ease. 9 So remind, should the reminder benefit: 10 he who fears will remember; 11 while the most wretched shall avoid it; 12 he who enters into the greatest Fire, 13 then neither dies therein nor lives. 14 He indeed prospers who is purified, 15 remembers the Name of his Lord and prays. 16 Nay, but you prefer the life of this world, 17 while the Hereafter is better and more enduring. 18 Truly this is in the scriptures of old, 19 the scriptures of Abraham and Moses.
Commentary

1 Glorify the Name of thy Lord, the Most High,

Regarding the relationship between the different ways in which God is glorified in the Quran, see 64:1c. The Most High can be understood to modify Lord or the Name, though most prefer the former (R, Ṭ). When Most High modifies Lord, the verse is simply an injunction to glorify God. When it modifies the Name, the verse is understood to provide instruction regarding the manner in which one should glorify God, meaning that one should refrain from associating the Name of God with any other thing (R) or that one should praise God with the Names that God has revealed, as in 17:110: Call upon God, or call upon the Compassionate (R). It is said that when So glorify the Name of thy Lord, the Magnificent (56:74) was revealed, the Prophet told his Companions, “Enact it when you bow [in prayer],” and when the present verse was revealed, he said, “Enact it when you prostrate” (Q, R). Muslims thus say “Glory be to God, the Magnificent” three times when bowing in prayer and the formula “Glory be to God, the Most High” three times when prostrating.

2 Who created, then fashioned,

3 Who measured out, then guided,

2–3 Here created refers to human beings in particular, to human beings and animals, or to all of creation (R). With regard to the first, God fashioned the first human being after breathing into him of His Spirit, leaving him without irregularities. Then He measured out his form and figure and bestowed the nourishment required for existence (Ṭ’s). Measured out renders qaddara, which can also be read qadara, meaning to have power or to determine, in which case the verse indicates that after God created and fashioned, He maintained direct power over all that He created (R).

Here guidance refers to the instinct God puts in all things to be able to seek the nourishment that He has already measured out for them or to the manner in which He guides people to His religion and to knowledge of His Unity by manifesting signs and clear proofs (Ṭs). The broader implication is that creation is as it should be, without imperfection or flaw (see 67:3–4c).

4 and Who brought forth pasture,

5 then made it as blackened stubble.

4–5 These verses allude to the manner in which God maintains power over the creation and destruction of all living things. Pasture renders marʿā, which refers to all forms of vegetation.

6 We shall teach thee to recite, that thou wilt not forget,

6 This verse is an assurance that God will grant revelation in due time and ensure the Prophet does not forget it. It is reported that when the Archangel Gabriel came, the Prophet would sometimes recite the beginning of the passage being revealed before Gabriel had finished, fearing that he might forget. So this verse was revealed (Bg, Ṭs). In 20:114 and 75:16–17, the Prophet is also counseled not to “hasten” the revelation.

7 save what God wills. Truly He knows that which is open and that which is hidden.

7 The Prophet is counseled that if a verse has been forgotten, it is because God willed it, not because of a fault on the part of the Prophet (R). Muslims believe that God abrogated some verses and caused others to be “forgotten,” but always replaced them with better verses. For a discussion of abrogation, see commentary on 2:106: No sign do We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, but that We bring that which is better than it or like unto it; and the essay “The Quran as
And We shall ease thy way unto ease.

Some understand this verse as an allusion to the uncomplicated nature of the revealed law (JJ, R). See 2:185: God desires ease for you, and He does not desire hardship for you; and 94:5–6. Others say that in light of vv. 6–7, this verse indicates that God will make it easy for the Prophet to memorize the Quran (R). Others interpret the verse as a reference to God’s easing the way for believers to enter Paradise (R).

So remind, should the reminder benefit:

This verse implies that whether it is of benefit or not, all should be reminded of God’s message (Bg), for all will be held accountable.

he who fears will remember;

Those who are certain of the return to God and those who admit to it but are not certain of it are those who fear God (v. 10), while those who deny the return to God are the most wretched (v. 11; R). In relation to v. 9, these verses imply that the reminder only benefits those who fear God.

Cf. 50:45: So remind, by the means of the Quran, those who fear My Threat.

while the most wretched shall avoid it;

he who enters into the greatest Fire, then neither dies therein nor lives.

12-13  Cf. 20:74; 74:28–29. The “greatest” or “greater” Fire is that of the Hereafter, while the lesser fire is that of this world (JJ, R). Alternately, v. 12 alludes to different degrees of punishment, with the greatest Fire being that for which the most wretched are destined (R). In Arabic, to say that one neither lives nor dies is to indicate that one is suffering great trials (R); see 35:36.

14 He indeed prospers who is purified,

15 remembers the Name of his Lord and prays.

14-15  According to some, He indeed prospers who is purified refers to purification from idolatry by professing God’s Oneness. Others say that it refers to purification through good deeds, while still others say it refers specifically to the alms given on ʿĪd al-fiṭr (Bg, Ṭb, Ṭs). According to Shiite tradition, the sixth Imam, Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq, stated that the order of the verses refers to the alms being given in the morning before the two cycles of the ʿĪd prayer.

Here prayer is taken by most as a reference to the five canonical prayers, and by some as a reference to the congregational prayer said on the morning of ʿĪd al-fiṭr (Bg). According to some, remembers the Name of his Lord refers to mentioning the Name of God in the basmalah at the beginning of each prayer (Ṭs); others emphasize that it means to remember with both heart and tongue, as remembering God with the tongue while being heedless of God in the heart has no benefit and no reward (Āl). These two verses can be taken together as referring to worshipping with all aspects of one’s being by purifying the heart, remembering God with the tongue, and performing the actions commanded by God, the foremost of which is prayer (Āl).

16 Nay, but you prefer the life of this world,

17 while the Hereafter is better and more enduring.
16–17 According to some, you is here an address to the disbelievers, while others say that it refers to all of humanity. Regarding the relationship between this world and the Hereafter, a ḥadīth states, “The world is the prison of the believer and the garden of the disbeliever”; see 93:4c.

18 Truly this is in the scriptures of old,

19 the scriptures of Abraham and Moses.

18–19 This refers to either the subjects mentioned in vv. 14–17 (Ţs), the whole of this sūrah (Ţ), or the entire Quran, as in 26:196: It is indeed in the scriptures of those of old (Āl). Although Judaism and Christianity do not ascribe a revealed book to Abraham, that Abraham had a particular scripture is implied in both the Quran and the Ḥadīth. When the Prophet was asked how many revealed books there were, he responded, “One hundred and four books. He sent down fifty scrolls to Seth, thirty scrolls to Idrīs, ten scrolls to Abraham, and ten scrolls [understood by some to be tablets (alwāḥ)] to Moses before the Torah. And He sent down the Torah, the Gospel, the Psalms, and the Criterion [i.e., the Quran]” (Āl). This tradition has a slightly different narration in Shiite sources (Ţs); some say the scrolls revealed to Abraham were twenty in number.
بِسْمِ اللَّهِ الرَّحْمَٰنِ الرَّحِيمِ
The Overwhelming Event

al-Ghāshiyah

Al-Ghāshiyah was revealed in Makkah. It takes its name from the mention of the overwhelming event in the first verse, which most maintain refers to the Day of Resurrection. It can be seen as related to the previous sūrah insofar as it elaborates upon the dichotomy between the believers and the disbelievers discussed in 87:11–15. The sūrah begins with a vivid description of the torments suffered in the Fire (vv. 1–7), followed by a description of the blessings enjoyed in the Garden (vv. 8–16). It then calls people to witness the signs of God in His creation (vv. 17–20) and concludes by reminding the Prophet that he is only a warner and is not responsible for the final end of those who do not heed the call (vv. 21–26). It is reported that the Prophet would often recite this sūrah during the Friday congregational prayer along with the previous sūrah (Āl).

Commentary

1 Hast thou heard tell of the overwhelming event?

1 The beginning of the verse can also be rendered, “Thou hast heard tell” (Āl). If understood as a question, it is rhetorical, for emphasis. In the context of this sūrah, the overwhelming event most likely refers to the Day of Resurrection, whose grandeur will overcome all of humanity (cf. 12:107; JJ). But it is also taken by some to mean that Hell will “cover” or “overwhelm” the people in layers (cf. 7:41; Āl) or that the Fire will overwhelm the faces of disbelievers (cf. 14:50; Ṭs).

2 Faces that Day shall be humbled,

2 Here, humbled means abased or humiliated (IK, JJ), Cf. 75:24. Unlike humility that one experiences in this world, this humility will reportedly be of no benefit to disbelievers (IK) since the door to repentance is open only in this world, not in the Hereafter.

3 toiling, weary,

4 entering a scorching Fire,

3–4 Toiling, weary can be understood as a reference to their toil in the scorching Fire, which is said to be dragging chains and shackles, or to their toil in this world, which is for naught if done in opposition to God (Ṭs). Others see toiling as a reference to performing disobedient acts in this world and weary as a reference to suffering in the Fire (IK). Taṣlā, here rendered “entering,” can also be read Tuṣlā, meaning, “made to enter.”

given drink from a boiling spring.

5 Boiling spring refers to water at the highest possible heat (cf. 55:44; IK), a stark contrast to the flowing spring in v. 12.

6 They will have no food, save a vile thorn,

6 Vile thorn translates ḍarīʿ, which is the name given to the dry version of a bitter and thorny desert shrub called shibrīq. When dry, it is said to be so vile that no animal will eat it (Āl, Bg, Q, Ṭs). Some say that it designates a tree of the Fire (Q, Ṭ), similar to Zaqqūm in 37:62; 44:43; and 56:52. According to a ḥadīth, “Ḍarīʿ is a thing in the Fire that resembles thorns. It is bitterer than aloes, more fetid than a putrid corpse, and more burning than fire. God has named the thing ḍarīʿ” (Q). Some say ḍarīʿ means “poison” (Ṭs). Others say that it derives from the verb ḍaraʿa, meaning “to humble” or “to abase,” because eating ḍarīʿ is part of the humiliation and abasement for those in the Fire (Q, Ṭs). Most commentators agree that it is not the same as other things the disbelievers will be made to eat in Hell, such as Zaqqūm and filth (ghislīn; 69:36), but that these refer to the vegetation found in different levels of the Fire (Q).

7 which neither nourishes nor avails against hunger.

7 It is related that in response to v. 6 the Arabs said, “Our camels are nourished by ḍarīʿ,” though it was actually shibrīq, the shrub before it dried. So this verse was revealed (Bg, Q, Ṭs).

8 Faces that Day shall be blessed,

8 For characteristics of faces in the Hereafter, see 75:22–23; 80:38; 83:24.
9 contented by their endeavoring

In contrast to those whose deeds bear no fruit in the Hereafter in v. 3, those referred to in this verse will realize and enjoy the fruits of their labor.

10 in a lofty Garden,

11 In Paradise there be will no vain discourse (IK); cf. 19:62; 56:25; 78:35. Here they is based upon reading the faces in v. 8 as the subject of the verb. It could also be understood as an address to the Prophet in the second person singular, “thou hearest no idle talk therein.” In another variant, the verb is read in the passive with idle talk as the subject, “no idle talk is heard therein.”

11 wherein they hear no idle talk.

12 Spring can be read as having a generic import indicating a multitude of springs in heaven (IK, Ṭs, Z).

12 Therein lies a flowing spring,

13 These are the same as the embroidered couches mentioned in 56:15. Those seated upon such couches are said to have had all rancor removed from their breasts (cf. 15:47).

13 therein are raised couches,

14 The mention of goblets in the Quran is taken as an allusion to the wine of Paradise, which they contain; see 56:18–19c; 78:34c.

14 goblets placed,
15 cushions arrayed,
16 and carpets spread.

17 Do they not consider the camels, how they are created;

17–20 Camels, mountains, sky, and earth would be the most predominate aspects of any desert journey in Arabia, indeed of desert life itself. These verses indicate that reflecting upon the signs of God in the created order should suffice to make one understand the truth.

17 Camels were central to desert livelihood, as they were easy to domesticate; could be eaten, milked, or used as beasts of burden; and could carry large loads for many days, surviving on little water and thorny desert brush (Bg, IK, Ṭs). The camel is thus seen in many commentaries and in Islamic literature in general as one of the supreme examples of God’s Wisdom and Power. The reference to camels can also be understood as an allusion to the docile nature of camels, who despite their strength will yield to one who is leading them. In this sense, the verse could be read as chastising human beings for not yielding to the guidance of God in the manner that camels yield to their guides (ST).

18 the sky, how it is raised;

18 Cf. 50:6.

19–20 The mountains being made firm is cited as evidence of God’s Power and Mercy in several verses (13:3; 15:19; 16:15; 21:31; 27:61; 31:10; 41:10; 50:7; 79:32) and is often joined to a discussion of the earth being spread out in such a way that human beings derive many benefits from it.
19 the mountains, how they are established;
20 and the earth, how it is spread?
21 So remind! Thou art but a reminder;
22 thou art not a warder over them.
23 But whosoever turns away and disbelieves,
24 God shall punish him with the greatest punishment.
25 Truly unto Us is their return,
26 then truly with Us lies their reckoning.

21–26 The Prophet’s mission is only to remind people of the truth. He will not be held responsible for the faith or disbelief of others, as in 13:40: Thine is only to proclaim, and Ours is the Reckoning (cf. 3:20; 5:92, 99; 16:35, 82; 29:18; 36:17; 42:48; 64:12), and he does not have the ability to create faith in their hearts (IK). That judgment and reckoning lie with God alone is also mentioned in 6:52, 69; 13:40; 26:113.

Most commentators consider al-Fajr to be an early Makkan sūrah, though some maintain that it is Madinan (Āl). Most likely the tenth sūrah in the chronological order of revelation, it takes its title from the first word of the sūrah. It follows upon the previous sūrah in that Faces that Day shall be humbled, toiling, weary (88:2–3) can be seen as applying to those for whom thy Lord poured upon them the scourge of punishment (v. 13), and Faces that Day shall be blessed, contented by their endeavoring (88:8–9) can be seen as applying to those to whom God says, O thou soul at peace! Return unto thy Lord, content, contenting (vv. 27–28). The sūrah begins with a series of oaths (vv. 1–4) followed by brief descriptions of the punishments that befell tyrannical regimes in the past (vv. 6–13). This transitions to a discussion of the human tendency to vacillate in the face of fortune or trial (vv. 14–16), a rebuke to those who are stingy (vv. 17–20), and a reminder of the Day of Judgment (vv. 21–26), culminating in an address to the souls of the believers, here referred to as the soul at peace (vv. 27–30).

Commentary

1 By the dawn,

2 by the ten nights,

1–2 Some see these verses as a reference to the break of dawn at the beginning of Muḥarram, the first month of the Islamic calendar, and to its first ten nights. Others see them as a reference to the break of dawn at the Feast of Sacrifice at the end of the ḥajj and the first ten nights of the sacred month of Dhu’l-Ḥijjah, the month of the ḥajj (see 2:196–97; 22:27–29). Others see them as a reference to the break of dawn during Ramadan and the last ten nights of Ramadan, the period during which the Quran is said to have first been revealed (see the introduction to Sūrah 97; R, Ṭs).

3 by the even and the odd,

3 Commentators have given this verse up to thirty-six different interpretations (Ṭb). Some interpret even as a reference to all of creation, for as 78:6–8 says, Did We not . . . create you in pairs, and odd as a reference to God, Who is One without peer, hence odd (R, Ṭs). According to a saying attributed to the Prophet, this verse refers to the prayers, most of which have an even number of prayer cycles, and one of which, the sunset prayer (maghrib), has an odd number of cycles (R, Ṭs). Others say that odd refers to the Day of ʿArafah, which is the ninth day of the ḥajj, and that even refers to either the eighth day, when the pilgrims travel to Mt. ʿArafāt, or the tenth day, which is the Feast of Sacrifice (Ṭs). According to other interpretations, the odd refers to Adam, and the even to Eve (R, Ṭs); the even refers to Ṣafā and Marwah, between which the pilgrims pass during the pilgrimage, and the odd refers to the Kaʿbah (Ṭs). One Shiite interpretation maintains that the even refers to ʿAlī and Fāṭimah and the odd refers to the Prophet himself (Ṭs).
and by the night as it recedes;

Most commentators interpret this verse as a reference to night in general (Q, R), in which case it is seen to indicate the Wisdom of God’s measuring between night and day (R). Some say that it could be a specific reference to the night of the ḥajj when the pilgrims gather on the plain of Muzdalifah before moving to Minā (Q, R, Ṭṣ). Others say it could be seen as a reference to the Night of Power (see 97:1–2; Q).

is there an oath therein for one who is mindful?

One who is mindful (dhī ḥijr) is derived from the verb ḥajara, meaning “to prevent” or “to prohibit.” Ḥijr is thus understood to indicate the intellect, because it prevents one from falling into error and confusion (R, Z). Ḥijr can also be taken to imply self-control (ḥilm; Ṭ).

Hast thou not seen how thy Lord dealt with ād,

For the account of the ād, a pre-Islamic southern Arabian tribe who rejected the Prophet Hūd, see 7:65–72; 11:50–60; 41:15–16; 54:18–21.

Iram the pillared, the like of which was never created in all the land,

Iram is believed to refer to either a particular people or the city of the ād. Several sources cite the Arabian legend that this city was built by Shaddād, the son of ād, with gold and silver and trees full of jewels. Some say ād was a son of ʿAwṣ, the son of Iram, the son of Sham, the son of Noah, and since the name of the ancestor of a tribe was used for the tribe, the tribe of ʿĀd was also called Iram (Z). Iram is then taken as a reference to ʿĀd the Former (53:50), while ʿĀd the Latter were simply referred to as ʿĀd. According to this interpretation, pillared refers to the tall stature of the people. If taken as a reference to a city where they lived, pillared refers to the architecture of their city. Pillared can also be seen as a reference to the quality of their stature, as in Arabic to say individuals are rafīʿ al-ʿimād, literally “with raised pillar,” means that they are of a noble stature.

9 For the account of the Thamūd, a pre-Islamic northern Arabian tribe who rejected the Prophet Ṣāliḥ, see 7:73–79; 11:61–68; 26:141–58; 54:23–31.

12 and increased corruption therein?

13 So thy Lord poured upon them the scourge of punishment.
13 Poured indicates the continuous nature of the punishment that is realized in this life and the next. Scourge translates sawt, which indicates something that is mixed in various ways. Thus it also means a “whip,” which is woven of various materials. Here it indicates either the nature of the punishment in which blood and flesh are said to be mixed together or to the various punishments that afflicted the three peoples (Q, R): a howling, raging wind for the tribe of ād (69:6; cf. 41:16; 51:41; 54:19), an “overwhelming” earthquake for the tribe of Thamūd (69:5; cf. 7:78), and the drowning of Pharaoh and his host (2:50; 7:136c; 8:54; 10:90; 17:102–3; 28:40; 43:55; 44:23–24; 51:40).

14 Truly thy Lord lies in ambush.

14 Nothing escapes God, for He is ever watchful, hearing what people say in public and private, seeing what they do publicly and privately, and rewarding or punishing them accordingly (Q; cf. 78:21). The point is that no matter what reprieve God may allow for tyrants to work corruption, they will be punished for it in due time, as in 3:178; 7:182–83; 22:48.

15 As for man, whenever his Lord tests him, then honors him and blesses him, he says, “My Lord has honored me.”

16 And as for whenever He tries him and straitens his provision, he says, “My Lord has abased me.”

15–16 Cf. 22:11; 23:55–56; 30:36; 41:51. Human beings are inclined to think that wealth and status are marks of true worth or signs of one’s standing with God, forgetting that God outspreads and straitens provision for whomsoever He will (13:26; 17:30; 28:82; 29:62; 30:37; 34:36, 39; 39:52; 42:12; see 34:39c) and that surely the most noble of you before God are the most reverent of you (49:13). Al-Rāzī connects the present verses to 30:7: They know some outward aspect of the life of this world, but of the Hereafter they are heedless; and to 22:11: And among mankind some worship God upon a brink: if good befalls him, he is content thereby, but if a trial befalls him, he is turned over upon his face. The implication is that human beings forget the balance between the things of this world and those of the next. What appears to be a benefit in this world may in fact be a detriment in the next, and one who appears abased here may in fact be honored in the Hereafter, and vice-versa. With regard to the balance between this world and the next, the more people incline to the sensory things of this world, the more difficult will be their passage from it (R). According to a ḥadīth qudsī, “God says, ‘Truly I do not honor one whom I have honored with worldly abundance; and I do not abase one whom I have abased with paucity thereof. I only honor one whom I have honored with obedience unto Me; and I only abase one whom I have abased with disobedience unto Me’” (Q).

17 Nay, but you honor not the orphan,

17–20 Nay is a rebuke to those who make the errors implied in vv. 15–16 (Q, R). The accusation that they devour inheritance and do not honor the orphan alludes to the abuse of the inheritance bequeathed to orphans, a point that is addressed in 2:220; 4:2–3, 8–10, 127; 6:152 (cf. 107:1–3). Some read all of these verses in the third-person plural rather than the second-person plural (Q, Ṭ). Either reading is accepted. Following upon vv. 15–16, the implication of vv. 17–20 is that failure to appreciate the true nature of God’s honoring and abasing leads people to act inequitably toward those who are less privileged (Ṫs).

18 nor urge you the feeding of the indigent.

18 There is disagreement about how urge you should be read. It can be read in two ways in the second-person plural: transitive, taḥuddūna, meaning “nor urge you,” or reflexive, taḥāddūna, meaning “nor urge you one another.” And it can be read two ways in the third-person plural: transitive, yahuddūna, meaning “nor do they urge,” or reflexive, yuḥāddūna, meaning “nor do they urge one another” (Q, Ṭ). When read in the third person, it is seen as applying to those mentioned in vv. 15–16 (cf. 69:34).

19 You devour inheritance with rapacious devouring,

   19 This verse means that people consume whatever they can find without knowing or questioning whether it is permitted (ḥalāl) or forbidden (Ḥarām; Ṭ). Here it implies that they consume both their own share of an inheritance and that of others (Ṭ).

   20 Cf. 102:1–2; 104:1–3.

21 Nay, but when the earth is ground up, grinding upon grinding,

   21 Nay is a response to those who commit the sins mentioned in vv. 17–20. Ground up implies that all things have been destroyed and reduced to sand, as if by a great earthquake (Q, R; cf. 20:105–7; 56:5; 69:14; 79:6–7). According to some this grinding will prepare the plain on which all human beings and jinn will then be gathered for the Reckoning on the Day of Judgment (IK, Ṭ; see 18:47c; 20:106; 79:14c).

22 and your Lord comes with the angels, row upon row;

   22 As God is not considered to have a body or be a “thing” that can be said to be in a particular place or to move from one place to another, some commentators read this verse as an allusion to God’s Power, Decree, or Command (Q, R). Others say that it indicates God’s Presence, because true knowledge (maʿrifah) of God will come on that Day, even if some had denied
God before it (R, Ṭs). It is said that the angels will be lined up like Muslims in prayer (Ṭs). Others say the angels will descend from every heaven forming lines around the believers (R; cf. 78:38).

23 and Hell is brought forth that Day; that Day man will remember; yet whence will that remembrance avail him?

24 He will say, “Would that I had sent forth for my life!”

23–24 With regard to Hell . . . brought forth, a ḥadīth says, “Hellfire will be brought forth that Day and it will have seventy thousand leashes, and each leash will have seventy thousand angels pulling it” (IK, Q). These verses indicate that people will remember how they conducted themselves in this world, but there will be no opportunity for repentance or to make up for lost time. Most commentators say Would that I had sent forth for my life means, “Would that I had sent forth good deeds that would save me from the Fire” (Q, R). Yet even believers will have some regret, since as a ḥadīth says, “There is no time wherein the son of Adam does not remember God, but that it will be a source of regret for him on the Day of Judgment.”

25 That Day none punishes as He punishes,

26 and none binds as He binds.

25–26 Ultimately, God will be the only one who punishes anyone on the Day of Judgment, meaning that there is no punishment like the punishment inflicted on that Day. The binding alludes to the chains and shackles mentioned in 13:5; 34:33; 36:8; 40:71; 76:4. Others read, “He punishes none with his punishment, and He binds none with his binding” (Āl, Qu, R), meaning that God will not punish anyone with the punishment of another or that God will not punish anyone as severely as He punishes the disbelievers (Qu). This interpretation could be general, meaning that no one suffers the punishment or binding due another, since none shall bear the burden of another (6:164; 17:15; 35:18; 39:7; 53:38; Āl, R, Z). It could also be specific, applying to a particular individual (Āl, Q, Z) or to Satan (Āl).

27 O thou soul at peace!

27–30 It is said that these verses are an address from the angels to human beings (Āl, Q, R, Sy) or directly from God Himself (Āl, R), delivered either at the moment of death, when the soul leaves the body, or on the Day of Resurrection (Q, R, Ṭs). They play an important role in Muslim piety, as they are often recited in eulogies for the dead and are seen by Sufis and others as a reference to the true nature of the soul when it is purified of all defilements.

27 The soul at peace is said to be the soul that has certainty (Q, Qu, R); this is the meaning of Abraham’s request to God in 2:260, So that my heart may be at peace (R). The soul at peace is also said to possess true knowledge, or gnosis (maʿrifah; Qu, R). Elsewhere the soul is said to be at peace in the remembrance of God (13:28; Q, Qu, R). From one perspective, the degree of remembrance is in accord with the strength of certainty (Āl), both of which are in accord with the degree of peace. Others speak of the soul so illuminated by the heart that all blameworthy character traits have been removed and all praiseworthy character traits are manifest (Jurjānī, al-Taʿrifāt, 239). It is reported that Ubayy ibn Kaʿb (d. 29/649), one of the leading authorities on the Quran among the Prophet’s Companions, read this verse as “O thou soul secure (āminah), at peace” (Q, R), implying the soul that is not fazed by fear or sorrow (Aj, R), unlike those described in vv. 15–16.

The soul is said to have three levels: the soul at peace (v. 27), which is in command of its lusts and desires and has attained certainty; the blaming soul (75:2), which strives to overcome its lusts and desires; and the soul that commands to evil (12:53), which is at the mercy of its lusts and desires; see 75:1–2c; 12:53c. The soul at peace is said to be “that which issues from the light of the first [Divine] Address, through which it was brought into being out of nonexistence by the light of pretemporality (nūr al-qidam) and it is at peace with the Real [i.e., God], with His Address, and in union with Him (wa bi wiṣālihī). Then its Lord calls it to its first origin (maʿdin), wherein it inclines, from the first to the last, toward nothing other than witnessing God, content with God through God and content in the Presence of God” (Aj).

28 Return unto thy Lord, content, contenting.

28 That the soul returns to its Lord is understood to imply that it was with its Lord in the Garden before creation (R). Many interpret this verse to mean content with the reward of God and contenting to God for having performed good deeds (Q, R). Others understand it as an indication that one is content with everything that God has decreed for all matters. Still others take it as an indication that the soul returns to the Divine Essence in a state of complete contentment (Aj, K), in which case, content, contenting could be read as two different levels of contentment: the first is the contentment experienced from God through God, and the second, the contentment experienced when standing before God (Aj). Some emphasize that there can be no contentment with God until God is content with souls, as in 5:119; 9:100; 58:22; and 98:8: God being content with them and they being content with Him (K). Contentment is seen by some as one of the most important virtues; it has been described as “the greatest gate of God and the paradise of this world” (Qu, Risālah).

29 Enter among My servants.

30 Enter My Garden.

29–30 Among My servants means among the righteous servants, as in the supplication of Solomon in 27:19: My Lord, . . . cause me to enter, through Thy Mercy, among Thy righteous servants! (Aj; cf. 29:9). In this sense it is read as an address to the spiritual elect (K). Some read, “Enter into My servants,” meaning their bodies, thus alluding to spirits returning to bodies for the bodily resurrection (Q, R, Sy, Ṭs). Some say it can mean both at the same time (Āl). According to several ahādīth, the Hereafter has progressive levels with lower and higher gardens. Thus, while most take My Garden as an allusion to Paradise in general, some take it as an allusion to the highest Garden, the Garden of the Divine Essence, in the very Presence of God (K); see the essay “Death, Dying, and the Afterlife in the Quran.”

Most commentators consider al-Balad to be from the early Makkan period, although al-Suyūṭī and others maintain that it was revealed immediately after Sūrah 50, Qāf, in the middle of the Makkan period. A minority maintain that it is Madinan, or that all but the first four verses are Madinan (Āl). The sūrah takes its title from the mention of this land in the first verse. It begins with two oaths that lead into a discussion of the human condition (vv. 1–4). It then reproaches human beings for failing to realize the nature of their condition and failing to put their faculties and possessions to proper use (vv. 5–11), followed by instruction as to how they should act (vv. 12–17), and concluding with a contrast between the companions of the right and the companions of the left (vv. 18–20).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Nay, I swear by this land, 2 while thou art free in this land; 3 and [by] the begetter, and that which he begat, 4 truly We created man in travail. 5 Does he suppose that none will ever have power over him? 6 He says, “I have squandered vast wealth!” 7 Does he suppose that no one sees him? 8 Did We not make for him two eyes, 9 a tongue, and two lips, 10 and guide him upon the two highways? 11 Yet he has not assailed the steep pass. 12 And what will apprise thee of the steep

[It is] the freeing of a slave, or giving food at a time of famine to an orphan near of kin, or an indigent, clinging to the dust, while being one of those who believe and exhort one another to patience, and exhort one another to compassion. Those are the companions of the right. And those who disbelieve in Our signs, they are the companions of the left. Upon them is a Fire enclosed.
Commentary

1 Nay, I swear by this land,

Some read this verse without Nay, interpreting that the article lā as one of emphasis rather than negation (Q). When read as an article of negation, it can be seen as a rebuke to those who are of the disposition criticized in vv. 5–11 (Q) or as a rebuke to the Quraysh (IK). Land, translating balad, can refer to Arabia, though a majority read it as “city,” referring to Makkah (Q, R, T, Ts, Z), and a minority say it refers to Madinah (Q). Balad can also be read in a more general manner as a reference to the earth.

2 while thou art free in this land;

Most interpret this verse to mean that the Prophet is free to act as he deems best in Makkah (IK, Q, R, T). In this sense, it is seen as a direct response to the conquest of Makkah in 8/630 or, if revealed during the Makkan period, as a premonition of the conquest, in which a few members of the Quraysh were slain. Even in pre-Islamic times, Makkah was considered sacrosanct and fighting there was prohibited. That the Muslim armies spilled blood there during the conquest was thus seen as a grave violation. It is reported that the Prophet said, “Truly God made Makkah sacred on the day that He created the heavens and the earth. Therefore, it is sacred until the Hour is come [i.e., the end of time]. And it was not made lawful (tuḥalla) to any before me and will not be made lawful to any after me; and it was only made lawful to me for one hour of a day” (IK, Q, R, Ts). Others say that this verse refers to God giving the Prophet free passage through Makkah, even if the Quraysh did not (Ts), for, as the Quraysh were the keepers of the Ka‘bah, it was a disgrace for them to not allow someone, let alone one of God’s messengers, access to it. The verse could also be read, “And thou art present in the land,” alluding to the fact that this land has been honored by God with the presence of His Messenger (R).

and [by] the begetter, and that which he begat,

3 The begetter, and that which he begat means Adam and his progeny, or every begetter and every begotten (Q, R, Ṭ, Ṭs), thus all of humanity from its beginning to its end. Or the phrase can be seen as a reference to Abraham and Ishmael (R, Ṭs) or to Ishmael and his progeny (Q), both linking it to this land because of Abraham’s association with Makkah and because Ishmael was seen as the father of the Arabs; see 2:126c. Another metaphorical interpretation states that the begetter is the Prophet and that which he begat is his community (Q). Some also read it as an allusion to the Prophet’s descent from Abraham (ST).

truly We created man in travail.

4 Many commentators relate this verse to the interpretation attributed to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, “Enduring the hardships of the world in life and the severities of the Hereafter” (IK, Q, Ṭs). Others relate it to 46:15, His mother carried him in travail and bore him in travail, and see it as a reference to the hardships of this world: from birth, to weaning, to earning a living, to growing old, to facing death (IK, R), for in life there is naught but toil and trial (R). Others see it as a reference to the trials of death, the grave, and the Day of Judgment (R). Travail translates kabad, which can also mean “erect” or “upright.” When read this way, this verse is sometimes interpreted as a reference to man being the only creature that walks upright upon two legs (Ṭ).

Does he suppose that none will ever have power over him?

He says, “I have squandered vast wealth!”

5–6 V. 5 asks, “Does man not think that he will be held accountable for all his actions?” In context, the implication is that those who are deluded by their own wealth do not realize that God outspreads and straitens provision for whomsoever He will (13:26; 17:30; 28:82; 29:62; 30:37; 34:36, 39) and can remove their wealth at any moment. It also implies both that people will be taken to account for how they have spent their wealth and that they are responsible for the manner in which wealth is obtained, no matter how philanthropic they may be. Some have said that v. 6 refers to Ḥarīth ibn ʿĀmir, who, when the Prophet advised him to pay money for the atonement of a sin, objected, “My money has gone to atonements and payments since the day I entered the religion of Muhammad” (Q, Ṭs), thus implying that he did not understand the spiritual value of his expenditures and thought he had squandered his wealth.

7 Does he suppose that no one sees him?

7 This verse asks, “Do people think that God will not ask how they obtained their wealth and how they spent it?” (R, Ṭ). Some say this refers to a specific individual who claimed to have spent money for Islam, though he had not spent anything (R, Ṭs). A hadīth says, “The servant does not move forward on the Day of Resurrection until he has been asked about three things: about his years, how he passed them; about his wealth, from what he acquired it and on what he spent it; and about his knowledge, what he did with it” (Āl); a Shiite version adds a fourth, “and about his love for the People of the Household [i.e., the family of the Prophet]” (Ṭs).

8 Did We not make for him two eyes,

9 a tongue, and two lips,

8–9 The implication is that one who is able to make these subtle instruments from which human beings derive great benefit would certainly be able to know every deed and hold human beings accountable for what they have done with these instruments.

10 and guide him upon the two highways?
The two highways are interpreted to be those of good and evil, as in a well-known hadith, “O people! There are only two highways: the highway of good and the highway of evil. Make not the highway of evil more beloved to you than the highway of good” (Q, Ṭ, Ṭs). Some commentators relate this to 76:3: Truly We guided him upon the way, be he grateful or ungrateful (IK, R).

Yet he has not assailed the steep pass.

And what will apprise thee of the steep pass?

Assail translates iqtabama, meaning to do something with great intensity (R, Z) or to throw oneself into something without consideration of the consequences (Āl, Q). The implication is that those who contribute money for religious purposes, but then regret it, saying, I have squandered vast wealth (v. 6), or those who have failed to engage fully in similar religious duties have not achieved the full measure of sincerity—have not fully embarked upon the highway of good—and are not thankful for the great blessings God has provided, such as those mentioned in vv. 8–9. Thus al-Zamakhsharī glosses v. 11 with 3:117: The parable of what they spend in this life of the world is that of a frigid wind that strikes the tillage of a people who have wronged themselves, destroying it. God wrongs them not, but themselves do they wrong. In this interpretation, the steep pass is a metaphorical reference to distributing wealth in the manner mentioned in vv. 13–17 and accomplishing meritorious deeds. It is thus likened to “striving” (mujāhadah) for God (Q, R), as in a famous saying attributed to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, “The steep pass of God is severe; it is the human being’s striving against his soul, his caprice, and his enemy, Satan” (Q, R). Some view the steep pass as an allusion to one or several of the obstacles that disbelievers will encounter in the Hereafter (Q, R, Ṭ). Given what follows in vv. 13–17, many read v. 12 to mean, “What will apprise thee of assailing the steep pass?” (Q). Al-Tustarī likens assailing the steep pass to attaining spiritual knowledge (maʿrifah), which can only be done through the power and strength of God by which one frees the soul of desire (ST).

[It is] the freeing of a slave,

13 A ḥadīth states, “Whoever releases a believing slave (raqabah), he will be his ransom from the Fire” (Q, T). There is a debate as to which is more praiseworthy, charity (ṣadaqah) or the manumission of a slave. Some point to the placement of this verse before the following verses as an indication that manumission is superior (Q, R). This verse can also imply that one should free one’s own neck (raqabah) through repentance (Bg, Ṭs) or by performing the acts of worship by which one attains Paradise, since that is considered to be the greatest freedom (R).

or giving food at a time of famine

14 This verse points to the fact that giving one’s wealth is more difficult in times of need, though of greater benefit. Thus al-Rāzī glosses this verse with 2:177; and 76:8: And give food, despite loving it, to the indigent, the orphan, and the captive.

to an orphan near of kin,

15 This verse constitutes two meritorious acts, as one should be generous toward orphans and toward relatives (Q, R). Most maintain that orphan (yatīm) indicates one whose father has passed away; while some maintain it is both parents (R).

or an indigent, clinging to the dust,

16 An indigent is one who has no home other than the dust (Q, T).

while being one of those who believe and exhort one another to patience, and exhort one another to compassion.

17 One does not assail the steep pass by simply performing the deeds mentioned in vv. 13–16; one must do so on the basis of belief in God, the requisite condition for God’s acceptance of such deeds, as in 9:54: And naught prevented their spending from being accepted from them, save that they disbelieved in God and in His Messenger, and only come to the prayer lazily, and only spend reluctantly (Q). Exhorting to patience (cf. 103:3) pertains to encouraging one another in maintaining religious practice in the face of difficulties and opposition, and exhorting to compassion pertains to encouraging one another toward mercy unto God’s creatures (R). As a famous ḥadīth states, “The merciful are those unto whom the Merciful is merciful. Be merciful unto those on earth, and He who is in Heaven will be merciful unto you.”

18 Those are the companions of the right.

19 And those who disbelieve in Our signs, they are the companions of the left.

18–19 For the companions of the right, who are said to be in Paradise, see 56:27–40, and for the companions of the left, who are said to be in the Fire, see 56:41–46. For the symbolic distinction between right and left, also see 17:71; 18:49; 56:8–9; 69:19–28; 84:7.

20 Upon them is a Fire enclosed.

20 Cf. 104:8–9. Enclosed here means locked, for the doors of Hell have been locked upon the disbelievers so that they cannot leave; none of their distress will be lifted from them, and no spirit will enter upon them (R, Ṭs). Enclosed translates muʾṣadah, which can also mean “covered over.”

Al-Shams is an early Makkan sūrah thought by most to have been revealed shortly after Sūrah 97, al-Qadr. It takes its name from the first oath that God takes in the sūrah: By the sun. The first ten verses emphasize the physical and spiritual polarity inherent in creation and the power of the Creator over it; the first eight do so through a series of oaths, the next two (vv. 9–10) by reflecting upon the human soul as it is situated between iniquity and purity. In this sense, the sūrah follows upon the previous sūrah, which distinguishes between the two highways (Āl; 90:10), and those of the left and those of the right. The last five verses focus on the story of the northern Arabian tribe Thamūd as an example of what befalls those who reject God’s messengers and disobey them, thus preferring iniquity to purity. That the story of the Thamūd is discussed here and in 54:23–31, two early revelations, and then expanded in later Madinan sūrahs (7:73–80; 11:61–69) indicates that it was well known to the Arabs.

Commentary

1 By the sun and its morning brightness;

For the meaning of ḍuḥāhā, here translated its morning brightness, see the introduction to Sūrah 93.

2 by the moon when following it;

This verse can be read as an allusion to the moon’s receiving its light from the sun (IK, Q, R) or to the new crescent moon, which at the start of each lunar month is visible above the horizon near where the sun sets and itself sets soon thereafter (IK, Q). It could also be seen as an allusion to the differing orbits of the moon and the sun, which can be used to measure the passage of time; see 36:40c.

3 by the day when disclosing it;

Cf. 92:2. It can be taken as a reference to the sun (Q, Ṭ) or to the world or the earth (Q). It can also be seen as a reference to “the darkness” (Ṭ), in which case the verse would read “by the day when dispersing it.” From a spiritual perspective, this verse can be read as an allusion to the light of faith extinguishing the darkness of ignorance (ST).

4 by the night when enshrouding it;

This verse refers to the night enshrouding the sun (Q, Ṭ) or enshrouding the world (Q); cf. 92:1. From a spiritual perspective, it can be read as an allusion to sins, persistence in which covers the light of faith (ST).
5 by the sky and the One Who established it;

5–7 According to some, the One Who in these three verses is not appropriate, since God could not swear upon Himself (R). They would thus read “that which” in place of the One Who. Or the three verses could be read, “its being established” (v. 5), “its being spread” (v. 6), and “its fashioning” (v. 7; Q, R, T), the reading preferred by al-Qurṭubī.

6 by the earth and the One Who spread it;

5–6 Cf. 51:47–48: And the sky We established with might; truly We make vast! And the earth We laid out—what excellent spreaders! V. 6 is taken by some to mean, “What He created in it,” and by others to mean that He proportioned it (IK).

7 by the soul and the One Who fashioned it

7 The One Who fashioned it means the One Who created the soul sound and well proportioned, as it was in the original primordial nature (fiṭrah), as indicated in 30:30: Set thy face to religion as a ḥanīf, in the primordial nature from God upon which He originated mankind (IK). Here the soul can be taken as an allusion to the soul of Adam, or the souls of all human beings. As such, it is a call to meditate upon the true nature of the human being, since God created man in the most beautiful stature (95:4; cf. 40:64: My). The invocation of the soul in the midst of this series of polarities implies that the soul has an inherent duality, as becomes clear in the following verses and in 79:37–41. This duality is seen by many in the pair the soul at peace (89:27), which is in control of its lusts and desires and has attained certainty, and the soul that commands to evil (12:53); an intermediate station between the two is the blaming soul (75:2); see 75:1–2c; 89:27c.

8 As translated, this verse indicates that God taught the soul the nature of evil and good and set the course for which it should follow. Thus some relate it to 90:8–10: Did We not . . . guide him upon the two highways? (Q, Sh). It could also be rendered, “He placed its iniquity and its reverence within it” (IK). In both translations it can be taken as a reference to God’s instillation of the knowledge of good and evil in every human soul, even before various prophetic revelations. As other verses indicate (e.g., 75:14–15; 81:14; 82:4–5), every soul is intrinsically aware of good and evil, right and wrong, its relation to God, and the covenant to which it attested (see 7:172).

These verses can also be read as an indication that God decrees all things for each human being, the reading preferred by most Ashʿarite theologians. Regarding this interpretation, it is reported that a man asked the Prophet, “O Messenger of God! Do you consider the actions of mankind and their struggles to be something ordained (qadāʾ) for them and coming to pass from a previous measuring out (qadar), or something written for them only after the Message came to them from their Prophet, when there will be a clear proof against them?” To which he replied, “Rather, it is ordained for them.” So the man said, “Then what is the point of our actions?” The Prophet replied, “Whosoever God created for one of the two positions [Paradise or Hell], He makes it easy for him [to attain]. The proof of that is in the Book of God: By the soul and the One Who fashioned it and inspired it as to what makes it iniquitous or reverent” (IK). It is also reported that when reciting this sūrah, the Prophet would stop at this verse and pray, “O God! Give my soul its reverence. Thou art its Protector and Master, and the best to purify it” (IK, Q).

9 Indeed, he prospers who purifies it.

10 And indeed he fails who obscures it.

9–10 These two verses have served as the inspiration for extensive literature on the “purification of the soul” (tazkiyyat al-nafs), which some argue is the entire purpose of the Quran. Most take v. 9 to be the beginning of the answer to the oaths taken in vv. 1–7 (Bg, Sh); others say that the answer has been omitted from the text and is only implied (Sh). The text speaks of those who cleanse the soul of lowly and despicable character traits (IK) and, conversely, those who dull the soul by neglecting it through heedlessness and disobedience (IK). According to some of the earliest commentators, these two verses could also be read with God as the subject, meaning, “He whose soul God purifies has indeed prospered, and he whose soul God obscures has indeed failed” (IK, Q, Ṭ). The ambiguity of the subject can also be seen as an allusion to the cooperation between God and human beings, who work together to purify the soul, for, on the one hand, Whosoever purifies himself purifies himself only for his own soul (35:18), and on the other, You do not will but that God wills (76:30); thus 4:49 states, Rather, it is God Who purifies whomsoever He will (cf. 24:21). Nonetheless, there is a subtle reciprocity in every step one takes toward God, for as 13:11 proclaims: Truly God alters not what is in a people until they alter what is in themselves. The literal meaning of purify (zakkā) is “to grow,” and according to most the literal meaning of obscure (dassa) is “to bury” (Sh, Z). These verses could thus be translated, “He prospers who grows it, and he fails who buries it.” V. 9 thus indicates those who make the soul grow through purification, while v. 10 indicates those whose souls are buried in reprehensible acts.

11 Thamūd denied in their rebelliousness,

12 when the most wretched of them was dispatched.

13 So the messenger of God said to them, “[This is] the she-camel of God; give her drink!”

14 But they denied him, then hamstrung her. So their Lord crushed them for their sin, then leveled it;

11–14 The tribe of Thamūd is cited as an example of those who “obscure” the soul through disobedience. They were a pre-Islamic northern Arabian tribe who rejected the Prophet Ţāliḥ; see 7:73–79; 11:61–68; 54:23–31. It is said that after Ţāliḥ made it clear to them that a particular she-camel that God had brought forth from a rock was a sign of God and exhorted them to justice and the distribution of water ordained by God, their leader proceeded to hamstring the she-camel and leave her for dead (54:23–30). For the she-camel of God, see 7:73. For give her drink, see 26:155c. According to some commentators, they had agreed that the she-camel would drink one day and the other animals would drink the next, and the people killed the she-camel because they did not like this arrangement (see 54:27–29).

It is recorded that the Prophet said that the most wretched of previous generations (al-awwalîn) are those who hamstrung the she-camel (IK, Q). Some interpret hamstrung her (‘aqqarūhā) as “slaughtered her”; see 7:77–78c. Crushed them (damdama ʿalayhim) indicates the most severe of punishments that came upon them suddenly, annihilating them and covering them entirely. Leveled it translates sawwāhā, which has a broad range of meaning; as translated it indicates that God razed their city or that he leveled the earth over them. It could also be rendered, “He distributed it equally,” meaning that God distributed the same punishment upon every member of the tribe (IK, Q). The verb sawwā is also translated fashioned in v. 7 and in relation to the creation of human beings in 18:37; 32:9; 75:38; 82:7. The use of sawwā in this context, in relation to both the creation of human beings in v. 7 and their destruction in v. 14, indicates, on the one hand, that God can destroy human beings as easily as He created them and, on the other, that God’s Punishment is part of the continuing process through which God fashions the human soul.

15 for He fears not the consequence thereof.

15 This verse means that God does not fear the consequences of destroying a people like the tribe of Thamūd (IK, Q). It is thus a warning to the tribe of Quraysh that God has no need of them and could wipe them out just as easily as He did the tribe of Thamūd. It could also be rendered, “And he did not fear its outcome,” in which case the subject is either the most wretched (v. 12), who hamstrung the she-camel and did not fear the outcome of his actions because of his heedlessness (Q), or the Prophet Šāliḥ, who did not fear the outcome because he had fulfilled his duty by transmitting God’s message and was spared their punishment (Q).

Al-Layl is an early Makkah sūrah, often considered the ninth in the chronological order of revelation. Some maintain that it is from the Madinan period, while others see it as part Makkah and part Madinan (Āl). Like the previous sūrah, it takes its name from the first oath that God takes in the sūrah. Similar to the first ten verses of the preceding sūrah, the first three verses of this sūrah focus upon the polarity inherent to the created order. The central theme is one found in many of the shorter sūrahs, that human beings have diverse ends. The remainder of the sūrah then emphasizes the disparity between those who perform good deeds and those who perform evil deeds and the opposite ends to which these courses lead.

Commentary

1 By the night as it enshrouds;

1 Cf. 91:2. The omitted direct object can be seen as an allusion to the world, the earth, the day (cf. 13:3), or all of creation (Q).

2 by the day as it discloses;

2 Cf. 91:3. This is one of several passages where an oath is taken by the alternation of night and day (see also 74:32–34; 81:17–18; 84:16–17; 89:1–4; 91:1–4; 93:1–2).

3 by Him Who created the male and the female,

3 Another reading is, “By the creation of the male and female” (Q, Sh). As with 91:5–7, some maintain this second reading is more appropriate, because God would not swear upon Himself. The creation of human beings in pairs is also presented as containing symbolic meaning in 78:8, and 53:45 states, He creates the two (zawjayn)—male and female, which are said to be mates (azwāj) created from a single soul (4:1; 7:189; 39:6). The reference to the male and female can be seen as an allusion to the outward polarity of created forms, while the remainder of the sūrah refers to the inner spiritual polarity between those who reverence the truth and those who deny it. In this context, it can also be read as an indication that the final ends of both males and females are not determined by their gender, but by the degree of their reverence, as in 49:13: O mankind! Truly We created you from a male and a female, and We made you peoples and tribes that you may come to know one another. Surely the most noble of you before God are the most reverent of you.

truly your endeavors are diverse.

In this context “endeavoring” (saʿy) can be taken as a synonym for doing or acting (ʿamal), implying that people work for either redemption or perdition and that there is no in-between (Sh).

As for one who gives and is reverent,

ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib related that the Prophet said, “There is no one among you except that his place is registered in either the Garden or the Fire!” Someone asked, “O Messenger of God, then what of works?” He said, “Perform works; everyone is eased unto that for which he was created,” and then he recited vv. 5–10 (IK). Citing the last part of this ḥadīth, al-Zamakhsharī says that the meaning is, “We will make it amiable to him and grant him success until obedience [to God] becomes the easiest and simplest of things for him, as in His saying, Whomsoever God wishes to guide, He expands his breast for submission [6:125].”

Gives is understood by most to mean giving in charity, but can also indicate giving God His proper due (Sh).

and attests to what is most beautiful,

What is most beautiful (al-ḥusnā), here and in v. 9, is taken by most to mean “There is no god but God” (Sh) or simply belief in God (Z), so that either of these is what is being attested to or denied; others see it as a reference to Paradise, which is referred to as the most beautiful reward in 3:148 and 3:195 (IK, Sh, Z). But it can also be seen as a reference to God Himself, for, as several verses attest, Unto Him belong the Most Beautiful Names (17:110; 20:8; 59:24; cf. 7:180).

We shall ease his way unto ease.
7 Cf. 87:8. As 2:185 states, God desires ease for you, and He does not desire hardship for you. Nonetheless, ease in one’s affairs derives from reverence, as in 65:4: And whosoever reverences God, He will appoint ease for his affair.

8 And as for one who is miserly and deems himself beyond need,

8 Cf. 96:6–7. Beyond need literally means “self-sufficient,” but beyond need better conveys the negative connotation of viewing oneself as “self-sufficient” vis-à-vis God. Being miserly toward those below one’s station and having the illusion of self-sufficiency in relation to what is above is an inversion of the proper balance between Heaven and earth or God and human beings, in which people must be obedient to God and generous toward others.

9 and denies what is most beautiful,

9 What is most beautiful here can mean the reward of the Garden, the reality of the Garden itself, the Reality of God, or all three; see also 92:6c.

10 We shall ease his way unto hardship;

10 Just as there is reciprocity when turning to God in repentance, so too there is reciprocity when turning away from God in disobedience. Hardship is glossed by many with “evil” (Sh). This can be taken to imply that when people disbelieve and commit evil deeds, God opens the way for them to commit further evil and it becomes increasingly difficult to turn back, as implied by the diverse nature of good and evil deeds alluded to in v. 4.

11 and his wealth shall not avail him when he perishes.
Alternately, “What will his wealth avail him when he perishes?” Perishes can be taken to mean when he dies or when he enters the Fire (IK, T).

Truly Ours it is to give guidance,

Some understand this verse to mean, “We will explain what is lawful and what is prohibited” (IK, Q, T). Others take it to indicate that one who travels the path of guidance will reach God in the Hereafter (IK). It can also be likened to other verses that explain that it is God’s place to guide and no one else’s, as in 16:9: And it is for God to show the way (IK, Q).

and truly unto Us belong the Hereafter and this world.

Cf. 53:25: Yet unto God belong the Hereafter and this world. Some commentators see this verse as a reference to the reward of the Hereafter and this world, as in 4:134: Whosoever desires the reward of this world, with God is the reward of this world and the Hereafter (Q), in which case, one could also see it as an allusion to the punishment of this world and the Hereafter, as in 79:25: So God seized him with a punishment exemplary in the Hereafter and in this world. Others see this verse as an indication that everything is God’s and He does with it as He wills (Sh).

Thus have I warned you of a raging Fire,

Elsewhere Hell is described as a crushing Fire (104:4–5).

which none shall enter, save the most wretched,

Several commentators say that the whole of this sūrah was revealed in reference to a Muslim of Madinah who had a palm tree, a branch of which was bent toward the house of a poor man who had a large family. Sometimes the owner of the palm tree would collect the fruit and, if by chance some dates fell in the poor man’s yard and his children picked them up, the owner would come and snatch them away from their hands and even from their mouths. The poor man complained to the Prophet, who then asked the owner of the tree if he would give him the tree in question in return for a palm tree in Paradise. The man declined, pleading that the dates of that tree, among all his numerous trees, were so delicate that he could not give up the tree. Another man heard what the Prophet had promised the owner and said, “O Messenger of God! Would you promise the same to me, were I to obtain the palm tree from the owner and give it to you?” The Prophet said, “Yes.” Whereupon he went to the owner of the palm tree and asked whether he wanted to sell it. The owner demanded forty palm trees, a sum he thought no one would pay. Though the buyer was astonished and told him that it was exorbitant, after a short pause he agreed to give him forty palm trees. Afterwards, he presented the palm tree to the Prophet, who then gave it to the poor man and his children. Vv. 15–16 refer to the man who refused to exchange his date palm for the promise of a tree in Paradise, while vv. 18–21 refer to the man who purchased the tree and gave it as charity (Q, Tś). If, however, this is an early Makkan sūrah, as some maintain, then the story would most likely not refer to such an incident, but would be a more general condemnation of those who did not accept Muhammad as a prophet.

16 who denies and turns away.

17 And the most reverent shall be removed from it,

18 who gives his wealth to purify,

The implication is that one purifies both oneself and one’s wealth when one gives charity in the Name of God. To purify translates tazakkā, which is etymologically related to the Quranic word for alms, zakāh. Some believe that the whole of this sūrah is related to the story of the date palm mentioned in the previous comment, but others say that vv. 18–21 were revealed about the first Caliph, Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, who used to buy weak slaves and then free them. When his father asked him, “Why do you not buy slaves who can defend you?” Abū Bakr responded, “It is not my defense that I seek,” and so vv. 17–21 were revealed extolling his generosity (IK, Q, W).

19 not recompensing any for a favor thereby;

20 save for seeking the Face of his Lord, the Most High, 21 and surely he shall be content.

19–21 One account of the revelation of these verses states that, upon embracing Islam, Bilāl, who was a slave of one ʿAbd Allāh ibn Judan, proceeded to the idols of the Kaʿbah and defecated on them. The idolaters complained to his master about what Bilāl had done and so he gave them Bilāl along with one hundred camels to be sacrificed to their gods. The idolaters took Bilāl and tortured him in the scorching desert. All he said while being tortured was “One! One!” as a testimony to the Oneness of God. The Prophet came upon this and said to him, “The One will save you!” He then informed Abū Bakr, saying, “Bilāl is being tortured for the sake of God!” Abū Bakr took with him a pound of gold and bought Bilāl. The idolaters said, “Abū Bakr did what he did only because he is obliged to Bilāl for a favor,” and so God revealed vv. 19–21 (W). Bilāl later became the first to lead the call to prayer (ʿadhān) and one of the Prophet’s personal treasurers.

19 This verse literally reads, “no one having with him any favor to be repaid.” In both translations the implication is that one is neither recompensing others for favors done in the past, nor expecting recompense from anyone in the future for what one does at present, but spending in charity only out of desire to do God’s Will.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Al-Ḍuḥā is an early Makkan sūrah, considered by many commentators to be fourth (others say seventh) in the chronological order of revelation and perhaps the first sūrah to be revealed in full at one time. Other commentators maintain that the first sūrah, al-Fātiḥah, was the first sūrah to be revealed in full.

The title, al-Ḍuḥā, is here translated as “The Morning Brightness” based upon the most common understanding of al-ḍuḥā as a reference to the light of the rising sun, but it can also refer to the period from daybreak until noon, as in 79:46, where it is translated morning. Others take al-ḍuḥā as a reference to the light of the sun or to the whole day, because it is illuminated by the sun (IK, Q, R). It can also be seen as a reference to the whole of creation, which is made visible through the light of the sun (Q). Al-ḍuḥā is also the name for one of the supererogatory prayers performed in the late morning hours.

According to several commentators, the Prophet had not received a revelation for some time (some say twelve days, others forty, and others fifty), and one of the idolaters said to him, “O Muhammad, it seems to me that your satan has forsaken you”; so God sent down this sūrah to reassure him (Bg, Q, Ṭ). Others say that it was in response to several idolaters saying, “Surely Muhammad’s lord has forsaken him and despised him” (Bg, Ṭ). In another account, the Prophet became sick and could not offer his supererogatory night vigil (tahajjud) for two or three nights. Then Umm Jamil bint Ḥarb, the wife of Abū Lahab, whose punishment is described in Sūrah 111, al-Masad, came and said, “O Muhammad! I think that your satan has forsaken you, for I have not seen him with you for two or three nights!” And then God revealed vv. 1–3.

The main theme of the sūrah is consolation of the Prophet. It begins with an assertion that God would not abandon the Prophet (vv. 1–3), then reminds him of God’s Favor toward him (vv. 6–8), and ends with an exhortation to care for the downtrodden and to preach God’s message (vv. 9–11).

Commentary

1 By the morning brightness,

2 and by the night when still,

1–2 In addition to some interpretations given in the introduction, the morning brightness (al-ḍuḥā) is understood here as a specific reference to the morning (ḍuḥā) on which God spoke to Moses, and the night as a specific reference to the Night Journey and Ascension (see 17:1c; introduction to Sūrah 53; Q, Sh); others say al-ḍuḥā refers to the hour at which the sorcerers who opposed Moses recognized the truth of his message and fell prostrate (see 20:59; Sh). According to al-Shawkānī, when al-ḍuḥā precedes the mention of night, as in this context, it refers to the entire day. It is also said that al-ḍuḥā is the light of the Garden and the night is the darkness of the Fire (Sh), for the Fire of Hell is said to be without light; or that al-ḍuḥā is the light within the hearts of those who know God (al-ʿārifūn) and that the night is the blackness of the hearts of the disbelievers. When still is said to refer to the darkness as it extends over the day (Sh). V. 2 is also interpreted to mean, “The night as it approaches” or “The night as it leaves” (Sh, Ṭ).

3 thy Lord has not forsaken thee; nor does He despise.

3 See the introduction to this sūrah. This verse constitutes what is known as the response to the oath. Although most interpret the second-person singular (thee) to be the implied direct object of despise, it is not present in the Arabic text. It could thus be taken as a general statement that it is not in God’s Nature to despise.

4 And the Hereafter shall be better for thee than this life.
This verse literally reads, “And the last shall be better for thee than the first.” Throughout the Quran the Abode of the Hereafter is considered better for human beings than the abode of this world (see also 16:30, 41; 28:60, 79–80; 29:64; 40:39; 42:36; 43:35; 57:20–21; 87:16–17). As 13:26 maintains, Compared to the Hereafter, the life of the world is but [fleeting] enjoyment. The Quran thus criticizes those who have purchased the world at the price of the Hereafter (2:86; cf. 4:74). It is reported that when the Prophet was given the choice between remaining in this life until the end of time and then going to Paradise or moving on to the Hereafter, he chose being with God over life in this world (IK).

And surely thy Lord shall give unto thee, and thou shalt be content.

5–8 Regarding the revelation of these verses, Ibn ʿAbbās reported that the Prophet said, “I have asked my Lord for something I wish I had not asked for. I said, ‘O my Lord! There were prophets before me, to some of whom you had subjugated the wind, [and he mentioned Solomon, son of David,] and some of whom could bring the dead back to life, [and he mentioned Jesus son of Mary,] and some of whom . . .’ God responded by saying, ‘Did I not find thee an orphan and shelter thee?’ I said, ‘Indeed, O my Lord.’ God said, ‘Did I not find thee astray and guide thee?’ I said, ‘Indeed, O my Lord.’ God said, ‘Did I not find thee in need and enrich thee?’ I said, ‘Indeed, O my Lord.’ God said, ‘Have I not caused thy breast to expand and lifted from thee thy burden? [see 94:1–2].’ I said, ‘Indeed, O my Lord’” (Q, Sh, W).

Did He not find thee an orphan and shelter,

6 The Prophet was orphaned at an early age. His father, ʿAbd Allāh, died while his mother, Āminah, was pregnant with him, and his mother died when he was six years old. After this he was under the guardianship of his grandfather, ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, until he died when the Prophet was eight years old. Then his uncle, Abū Ṭālib, took responsibility for him and continued to protect him, assist him, and even restrain the people from harming him when he began to declare the message of the Quran. He also found great refuge in his marriage to Khadijah, who was his most ardent supporter when the revelations first began.

7 find thee astray and guide,

7 This verse can be taken as reference to God’s teaching Muhammad his true nature as a messenger of God (Bg). Some understand this verse literally to mean that Muhammad had been astray and that God guided him to belief in the Oneness of God (tawḥīd) and the reality of prophethood (nubuwwah; Bg). This reading is supported by verses such as 12:3: We recount unto thee the most beautiful of stories by Our having revealed unto thee this Quran, though before it thou wert among the heedless. For others, this verse means that the Prophet had strayed in the sense that he did not follow a revealed law or rite (sharīʿah), as none was known to his people, but not that he had strayed from belief in the Oneness of God (tawḥīd). It can also be read as implying that, although he believed in the Oneness of God, he had no scripture and no direct guidance until the Quran was revealed. This reading is supported by 42:52: Thus have We revealed unto thee a Spirit from Our Command. Thou knewest not what scripture was, nor faith. But We made it a light whereby We guide whomsoever We will among Our servants. Some try to avoid the implication that the Prophet could have been astray in any religious or spiritual sense and read this verse as a reference to a time when the Prophet was lost in the streets of Makkah and God sent the Archangel Gabriel to guide him (Bg). Still others see it as a reference to a time when the Prophet was on a journey, his mount strayed from the road, and Gabriel came to set him back on the right course (Bg).

8 and find thee in need and enrich?

8 Some understand this verse as a reference to the Prophet’s enrichment through the wealth of his first wife, Khadijah (Bg). Others say it refers to the true wealth, which is spiritual contentment (see 58:22; 89:27–28; 98:8), as in a famous hadīth, “Wealth comes not from abundance of goods; rather, wealth is the wealth of the soul” (Bg).

9 So as for the orphan, scorn not.

9 On one level, this verse serves as a reminder from God that the Prophet should remember his own state as an orphan. On another level, it is an admonition to all of the Quraysh, because they were known to take the wealth of orphans and abuse their rights (Bg); see 89:17; 107:1–2c. In the Madinan revelations, many instructions are given to uphold justice for the orphans (4:127), and Muslims are enjoined, Approach not the orphan’s property, save in the best manner (6:152; 17:34); see commentary on 4:2, 3, 6, 10. In this regard a famous ḥadīth says, “The best house among the Muslims is a house in which an orphan has been treated well. And the worst house among the Muslims is a house in which an orphan has been treated poorly.” Then the Prophet pointed with his middle finger and his index finger and said, “I and the caretaker (kāfil) of an orphan are like this in the Garden” (Bg, Q), meaning that those who care for orphans will attain a high station and know the Prophet in Paradise.

10 And as for one who requests, repel not.

10 An exhortation for mercy and kindness toward beggars in general, this verse is seen by most commentators as a specific reference to the beggar who comes to the door, who should either be fed or turned away gently without rebuke (Bg). It is also interpreted as an exhortation to share knowledge of the religion with anyone who seeks it (Bg, IK).

11 And as for the blessing of thy Lord, proclaim!

11 This verse is a command to the Prophet meaning, “Spread that with which God has blessed thee through thanks and praise” (Q). The blessing of thy Lord can refer to the Quran itself (Bg, Q, Sh), the gift of prophethood (nubuwwah; Bg, Q, Sh), the blessing of guidance after the mention of being astray (v. 7; Sh), or any blessing God has bestowed upon a person (Bg, Q). In this regard, the Prophet is reported to have said during a sermon, “Whosoever does not give thanks for that which is little is not thanked for that which is much. And whosoever does not thank people does not thank God, and proclaiming [God’s] blessings is thanks, while abandoning it [i.e., proclaiming God’s Blessings] is disbelief (kufr)” (Bg, IK, Q, Sh, Sy). It is said that when this sūrah was revealed, the Prophet was joyous, proclaimed, “God is great (Allāhu akbar),” and counseled his followers to do the same whenever they read this sūrah (Bg, Q).

Expansion

al-Sharḥ

Al-Sharḥ is considered by most commentators to be a Makkan sūrah, most likely revealed immediately after the preceding one. Ibn ʿAbbās is reported to have said that it is Madinan, but this is a minority opinion. Some say only vv. 5–6 were revealed in Madinah (Āl). It takes its name from the reference to the expansion of the breast for religion in the first verse.

Some maintain that Sūrah 93 and 94 were originally one sūrah, as the Companions of the Prophet would recite them together in a single prayer cycle (rakʿah) without indicating any separation by citing the basmalah in between them (Ţs; see 1:1c). Linguistically 94:1 follows the same pattern as 93:6, Did He not find thee . . ., which is also implied in 93:7–8.

Thematically both sūrahs speak of the bounties that God has provided the Prophet Muhammad as relief for the difficulties that beset him; those in Sūrah 93 pertain more to external necessities, and those in Sūrah 94 pertain more to spiritual relief. The sūrah begins with another reminder of the blessings that God has bestowed upon the Prophet (vv. 1–4). This is followed by reassurance (vv. 5–6) and the command to exert oneself and turn to God (vv. 7–8).

Commentary

Did We not expand for thee thy breast,

1 The expansion of the breast relates to ease, especially in matters pertaining to religion, and is thus considered a characteristic of those who are rightly guided. This is particularly evident in the famous prayer of Moses when he received the call to prophethood: My Lord! Expand for me my breast! Make my affair easy for me, and untie a knot from my tongue, that they may understand my speech (20:25–28). In contrast, the constriction or contraction of the breast is seen as a characteristic of those who are astray, as in 6:125: Whomsoever God wishes to guide, He expands his breast for submission. And whomsoever He wishes to lead astray, He makes his breast narrow and constricted, as if he were climbing to the sky. Those who are rightly guided can also experience straitening of the breast through trials and hardship. In this vein the verse can be seen as an allusion to God’s providing the Prophet with the patience and forbearance necessary to bear the insults of his enemies (Ṭs), as in 15:97: And certainly We know that thy breast is straitened because of what they say. This verse has also been seen as an allusion to the manner in which God expanded the Prophet’s breast and made his heart a container for the wisdom of the revelation (Ṭ) or for prophethood and knowledge (Ṭs). According to some, this verse refers to the relief that came to the Prophet’s breast after a period of solitude on Mt. Hirāʾ. According to others, it refers to the end of a period in which the revelation was said to have been interrupted (see introduction to Sūrah 93). Still others read it as a reference to an episode in the Prophet’s youth when two angels opened his breast and removed a dark clot that is said to represent the root of malice and envy within the soul (Bd).

and lift from thee thy burden

2 This verse is seen by many commentators as an allusion to the Prophet’s being forgiven all sins (Ṭ), as in 48:1–2: Truly We have granted thee a manifest victory, that God may forgive thee thy sins that went before and that which is to come, and complete His Blessing upon thee, and guide thee upon a straight path (IK, Sh).

3 that weighed heavily upon thy back?

3 Weighed heavily (anqaḍa) implies something pushing down so hard that one’s back makes a sound (Bḍ). Some say this verse refers to God’s lightening the burden of prophethood (Sh). Vv. 2–3 can also be seen as a reference to the lifting of the burden of ignorance and confusion, said to have afflicted Arabia, through the revelation of God’s edicts and decrees (Bḍ).

4 And did We not elevate thy renown?

4 The Prophet’s renown was elevated when he was given the title “Messenger of God” (a title connected with the Name of God) and placed in the testimony of faith, “I bear witness that there is no god but God and that Muhammad is the Messenger of God” (Bḍ, Q, Sh), versions of which are recited in the call to prayer and in the greeting recited silently at the end of each prayer cycle (IK, Ṭ). The Prophet’s title is also closely connected to the Name of God in other verses of the Quran (e.g., 4:13, 59; 9:26). The strongest indicator of the Prophet’s great renown is in 33:56: Truly God and His angels invoke blessings upon the Prophet. O you who believe! Invoke blessings upon him, and greetings of peace! According to some it is such blessings to which v. 4 refers (Sh). Others say that this verse refers to the mention of the Prophet Muhammad in previous scriptures (Sh).

5 For truly with hardship comes ease!

6 Truly with hardship comes ease!
5–6 These verses can be read as indicating that enduring hardship with patience results in ease in this life and the Hereafter. A well-known ḥadīth states, “One instance of hardship (‘usr) will never overcome two instances of ease (yusrayn)” (Āl, IK, Q, Sh, Sy). Also see, 65:7: God tasks no soul beyond that which He has given it. God will bring ease after hardship; and 2:185: God desires ease for you, and He does not desire hardship for you.

7 So when thou art free, exert thyself;

7 Or, “So when thou art relieved [of thy burden], toil,” meaning that after completing the obligatory devotions, one should supplicate the Lord and perform supererogatory devotions (Bḍ, JJ, Ṭ), or when free from worldly affairs, one should pray (Ṭ). Or, “So when thou art devoted [to God], exert thyself,” meaning that one should always seek to deepen one’s prayers. Or, “So when thou art spent, toil,” meaning one should never cease to strive in the way of God and cease to exert oneself more to do God’s Will. It can also be taken to mean, “When thou art free from striving against thine enemies, exert thyself in worshipping the Lord” (Bḍ, Sh, Ṭ).

8 and let thy desire be for thy Lord.

8 This verse is understood to mean, “Do not desire this world—let your desire be for God alone” (Ṭ). On the one hand, this is an exhortation to prayer; on the other, it is an exhortation to pray only to God and to do good deeds only to please God.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
A Makkan sūrah, al-Tīn was most likely revealed in the early part of the middle Makkan period, shortly after Sūrah 85, al-Burūj, although some maintain that it is Madinan (Āl). It takes its name from the mention of the fig in the first verse. The main theme is found in vv. 4–6, which are among the most famous verses in the Quran. They speak to the human condition, which originated as the most exalted of creation, but can fall to the lowest of the low (v. 5) when human beings fail to live in accord with their true nature, a message similar to that of 103:2–3: Truly mankind is in loss, save those who believe, perform righteous deeds, exhort one another to truth, and exhort one another to patience. According to an oft cited ḥadīth, the Prophet said, “Whosoever among you recites By the fig and the olive through to is not God the most just of judges and says, ‘Indeed’ (balā), I am among the witnesses unto that” (Āl, Q, Z).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

What then will make you deny religion? 8. Is not God the most just of judges?
Commentary

1 By the fig and the olive,

   1 For most commentators, the fig and the olive refer to the fruits of the earth, by which God swears due to the blessing and benefits contained in them (Bg, Sh, Ṭb). For others they have a symbolic value: the fig symbolizes the mosque (meaning place of prostration, as there would not have been a building for that purpose at the time of the revelation) in Damascus, which may be a reference to the “mosque” of Noah, where the Ark landed on Mt. Jūdī (see 11:44c), and the olive symbolizes “the Holy House,” that is, the “mosque” in Jerusalem (IK, Sh, Ṭ); or the fig refers to the mount on which Damascus is built, and the olive, the mount on which Jerusalem is built (Q, Ṭb); others say that they refer to the cities themselves (Q). Another interpretation takes the fig as a reference to the “mosque” of the Companions of the Cave (18:9) and the olive as a reference to the “mosque” in Jerusalem (Q), while yet another sees them as two mountains in the Levant (Q). Others say that the fig refers to the leaves of the Garden (7:22), with which Adam and Eve covered themselves, and the olive refers to the blessed olive tree in 24:35 (Q). This last interpretation could be seen as a symbolic foreshadowing of vv. 4–6 in that fig leaves allude to what is lowest in human beings, since they were used to cover their private parts, while the blessed olive tree is seen by many as the symbolic source of the human “light of understanding” or “intellect”; see 24:35c.

2 by Mount Sinai,

   2 According to most commentators, Mount Sinai is also referred to by name in 23:20 and simply as the Mount (al-Ṭūr) in eight other verses (2:63, 93; 4:154; 19:52; 20:80; 28:29, 46; 52:1, though others say such verses do not necessarily refer to Mount Sinai; see 23:20c). It is also sworn by in 52:1. In 23:20 saynāʾ is used for “Sinai,” but here the word is sinīn, which some say is actually taken from the Ethiopic for “beautiful” and in this context means “the blessed beautiful Mount” (Q, Sh, Ṭ). Others say that it means every mountain upon which there are fruit-bearing trees (Q, Sh).

3 and by this land made safe,

3 In pre-Islamic Arabia Makkah was a refuge in which no fighting was allowed (see the introduction to Sūrah 105); hence it was a secure land, or a land made safe; cf. 29:67: Or have they not considered that We have made a secure sanctuary while people are snatched away all around them? Some say that the fig and the olive (v. 1) is a reference to Jerusalem, where Jesus was sent, Mount Sinai is a reference to the place where God spoke to Moses, and this land made safe is a reference to the place where the Prophet Muhammad was sent (IK).

4 truly We created man in the most beautiful stature,

4 This verse begins the response to the oath taken in vv. 1–3. It is one of the most emphatic affirmations of humanity’s exalted status, before which the angels were ordered, Prostrate unto Adam (2:34; 7:11; 17:61; 18:50; 20:116). Although the human being is made of clay, God declares in 38:72, I have proportioned him and breathed into him of My Spirit. Here man is taken to mean all of humanity, male and female, believer and disbeliever alike. Taqwīm, translated stature, is a verbal noun from the verb qawwama, “to raise, shape, form, or arrange.” Here it is taken to indicate something that has become what it truly ought to be by achieving harmony and balance (R). An indication of this stature is that the human being stands upright while every other creature is created with his face stooped down (67:22; Āl, Q, R, Sh, Ṭ). Yet the most beautiful stature is not taken as a reference simply to the human physical form, since the physical is also a symbol of “inner comportment,” as human beings are “the best of God’s creation both outwardly and inwardly” (Q), as expressed in a famous ḥadīth qudsī, “Truly God created Adam in His image” (Āl, Q, Sh; cf. Genesis 1:27). This ḥadīth is understood to mean that human beings are created with such attributes as life, knowledge, power, will, speech, hearing, and sight (the qualities most often used in Islamic theology to describe God), which are in fact Divine Attributes that God has caused to be reflected in human beings (Q).
Human beings are able to manifest all of the Divine Names and Qualities, whereas all other created beings are only able to manifest a limited range of the Divine Names and Qualities (see 2:31c). “For this reason the philosophers say that [man] is a microcosm, since all that makes up created entities is gathered within him” (Q). Verses such as 30:8 and 51:21 can be seen as a call to human beings to reflect upon their exalted status and live in accord with it. When vv. 1–3 are taken as a reference to the locations of revelation, that human beings are created in the most beautiful stature can be seen as a reference to that aspect of their nature that is receptive to revelation.

5 then We cast him to the lowest of the low,

With regard to the outward human form, this verse can be seen as a reference to old age, when faculties are diminished, sometimes to the point of decrepitude (IK, Q, R, T), similar to 36:68: And whomsoever We give long life, We cause him to regress in creation (see also 16:70). With regard to the inner reality, it can be taken as a reference to human beings falling below their true nature and consequently being cast into the Fire (Āl, IK, Q, R, T); such people are the lowest of creation for failing to fulfill the requirements of being created in the most beautiful stature (Āl). In this vein, the lowest of the low can be understood as a reference to the state of disbelievers, of whom 7:179 says, Such as these are like cattle. Nay, they are even further astray, or as a reference to the place in which they will be cast (Āl).

According to some, the lowest of the low should be read “the lowest, lowly,” with “lowly” (sāfilīn) referring to the state of abasement experienced by those who are cast down and implying that their own condition has condemned them.

6 save those who believe and perform righteous deeds; for theirs shall be a reward unceasing.

This verse makes it more likely that the preceding verse refers to the inner reality of human beings. A reward unceasing (cf. 41:8; 68:3; 84:25) is one that is never decreased or cut off in this life or the next (R). Regarding this world, it is said to refer to the fact that if people maintain religious practice, they continue to receive reward for required acts of worship even when sickness renders them unable to perform them or travel causes them to shorten prayers or break the fast (Āl, Q), as is permitted under Islamic Law. Regarding the next world, it refers to the bounties of Heaven.

7 What then will make you deny religion?

As translated, this verse is a question posed to those who deny the revelation, the Resurrection, and other aspects of religion. It may also be addressing belief in the Prophet specifically, as if to say, “Who would deny thee, O Messenger, after the appearance of these proofs of religion” (Q, R, T), though this reading is considered grammatically problematic by some (Āl). The verse also indicates amazement that anyone could witness human beings coming from a drop (see 16:4; 18:37; 22:5; 35:11; 36:77; 40:67; 53:46; 75:37; 76:2; 80:19) and rising to the most beautiful stature, yet still deny the Resurrection (Āl, Q, R).

8 Is not God the most just of judges?

Cf. 6:57: Judgment belongs to God alone; He relates the Truth, and He is the best of deciders; 11:45. God is also referred to as the best (or most just) of judges (7:87; 10:109; 12:80). In relation to the preceding verses, the implication is that human beings differ, because some leave the state of the most beautiful stature and descend to the lowest of the low, while others remain in the most beautiful stature, and it is only logical that they would differ in recompense according to God’s most just judgment (Ṭb). As the Prophet is commanded to say in another verse, God will judge between you on the Day of Resurrection concerning that wherein you used to differ (22:69). This is in reference to the great difference between believers and disbelievers, and the good and the wicked indicated in several verses (e.g., 5:100; 6:51; 13:16; 32:18–22; 35:19–22; 38:28; 39:9; 40:58; 59:20).

The Blood Clot

_al-ʿAlaq_ is an early Makkan sūrah. The first five verses are considered by most to be the first verses of the Quran to be revealed; the remaining verses were revealed later in the Makkan period when opposition to the revelation arose among the leaders of the Quraysh. This initial revelation is said to have taken place during the last third of the month of Ramadan, in 610 of the Christian era, twelve years before the migration to Madinah (ḥijrah) in 622, which marks the beginning of the Islamic calendar.

According to the Prophet’s wife ʿĀ’isha, “The first thing that began happening with the Messenger of God from the revelation were dreams he would see in his sleep that would come true. He would not see any dream except that it would come to be, like the break of day in the morning. Then seclusion became beloved to him. So he used to go to the cave of [Mount] Ḥirāʾ and devote himself to worship there for a number of nights, and would bring provisions. Then he would return to [his wife] Khadijah and replenish his provisions for a similar number of nights. This continued until the revelation suddenly came to him while he was in the cave of Ḥirāʾ.

“The Archangel [Gabriel] came to him while he was in the cave and said, ‘Recite!’ The Messenger of God said, ‘I replied, “I am not a reciter.”’ Then he said, ‘So he seized me and pressed me until I could no longer bear it. Then he released me and said, “Recite!” So I replied, “I am not a reciter.” Then he pressed me a second time until I could no longer bear it. Then he released me and said, “Recite!” So I replied, “I am not a reciter.” Then he pressed me a third time until I could no longer bear it. Then he released me and said, “Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created” until he reached that which he knew not.’

“Then he [the Prophet] returned with those verses and with his heart trembling until he reached Khadijah and said, ‘Cover me, cover me.’ So they wrapped him up until his fear went away. Then he said to Khadijah, ‘What is wrong with me?’ and told her what had happened and said, ‘I fear for my soul.’ She replied, ‘Never! By God, God will never disgrace you. You keep good relations with your relatives, you speak the truth, you help the poor and the destitute, you serve your guests generously, and you help the deserving who are afflicted by misfortune.’

“She then accompanied him to her cousin Waraqah ibn Nawfal, who, during the period of ignorance in pre-Islamic Arabia, became a Christian and used to write the scriptures in Arabic. He would write from the Gospel in Hebrew as much as God willed for him to write. He was then an old man and had lost his eyesight. Khadijah said to him, ‘O my cousin! Listen to the story of your nephew.’ Waraqah asked, ‘O my nephew! What have you seen?’ The Messenger of God described what he saw. Waraqah said, ‘This is the Nāmūs [from the Greek nomos, indicating a revealed law] that God sent to Moses. I wish I were young and could live until the time when your people will drive you out.’ The Messenger of God said, ‘Will they drive me out?’ Waraqah replied, ‘Yes, no man has come with something similar to what you have brought but that he was treated with hostility and enmity; and if I should remain alive till that day, then I would firmly support you’” (Bg, IK, Q). The sūrah begins with an injunction to recite (vv. 1–5) followed by an admonition of mankind in general (vv. 6–8) and a more specific admonition of those who prevent others from practicing religion (vv. 9–16). It concludes with a challenge to those who call upon what is other than God to protect them (vv. 17–19).

Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created, created man from a blood clot. Recite! Thy Lord is most noble, Who taught by the Pen, taught man that which he knew not. Nay, truly man is rebellious in that he considers himself beyond need. Truly unto thy Lord is the return. Hast thou seen him who prohibits a slave when he prays? Hast thou seen if he does so out of guidance, or to enjoin reverence? Hast thou seen if he denied and turned away? Does he not know that God sees? Nay, but if he ceases not, We shall surely seize him by the forelock—a lying, iniquitous forelock. So let him call his cohorts. We shall call the guards of Hell. Nay! Obey him not! But prostrate and draw nigh.
Commentary

1 Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created,

1–5 For the account of the revelation of these verses, see the introduction to this sūrah. These verses begin by discussing creation; the first mention of creation in v. 1 can be taken as a reference to the fact that God creates all that exists from nothing (Aj). The passage then moves to the creation of the human being, who is honored and ennobled through knowledge, the faculty that distinguished Adam from the angels (IK). The creation of the human being and knowledge are related in the first revelation, because human beings are created for knowledge of God and His creation, and God teaches Adam and thus all humanity the names of all things (2:31) before commanding, providing laws, and judging. According to some, the mention of recitation precedes that of writing because, although both are means of conveying knowledge, there could be speech without writing, but not writing without speech (IK). Thus although recite could also be translated “read,” recite is the better option because the Prophet was not given something to read and is reported to have been “unlettered” (see 62:2c).

2 Several verses refer to different periods of gestation as a sign of God’s creative power. The blood clot appears to be the third stage in the most extensive Quranic account of gestation: O mankind! If you are in doubt concerning the Resurrection, [remember] We created you from dust, then from a drop, then from a blood clot, then from a lump of flesh, formed and unformed, that We may make clear for you. And We cause what We will to remain in the wombs for a term appointed (22:5). For the stages that follow the clot, see 23:14; 40:67c; 75:38. Vv. 1–2 can also be seen as a commentary on 95:4–5, where created in v. 1 refers to creating man in the most beautiful stature (95:4) and v. 2 refers to casting him to the lowest of the low (95:5).
Recite! Thy Lord is most noble,

Or, “Recite, for thy Lord is most noble.” In pre-Islamic Arabia nobility or magnanimity (karāmah) was considered the highest of all virtues, implying an unblemished pedigree, all virtuous character traits, and unbounded generosity; see 49:13c. In accord with the third quality, this verse could also be understood to mean, “Recite, for thy Lord is most generous,” for He blesses human beings with the greatest of blessings (Aj), creation and revelation. In pre-Islamic poetry, karīm, meaning “noble” or “generous,” was said of people, but not of God. The Quranic usage of the term thus introduced an aspect of God hitherto unknown to the pagan Arabs.

Who taught by the Pen, taught man that which he knew not.

That God teaches human beings and brings them out of darkness into light (14:1, 5; 33:43; 57:9; cf. Isaiah 42:16; 1 Peter 2:9) is the extension and continuation of His unbounded generosity. Some say that pens are of three principal types: the first, corresponding to the Logos or Intellect, is the one that God commanded to write all that would be until the Day of Resurrection; the second are those with which the angels record the deeds of human beings (see commentary on 18:49; 82:10–12); and the third are those with which human beings write (Q). According to some, man indicates Adam, of whom 2:31 says, and He taught Adam the names, all of them (Q). Others say that it indicates the Prophet Muhammad, as in 4:113: God has sent down unto thee the Book and Wisdom, and has taught thee what thou knewest not; God’s Bounty toward thee is great indeed (Q). But here most commentators take taught man to mean that this verse refers to the manner in which God teaches all human beings, not only prophets. God’s teaching by the Pen can also be seen as an allusion to the Divine Intellect inscribing knowledge upon the tablet of the human soul. For more on the symbolism of the pen, see 68:1c.
6 Nay, truly man is rebellious

6–19 These verses were reportedly revealed several years after vv. 1–5 in reference to Abū Jahl, the leader of the Quraysh, who rejected the prophethood of Muhammad and tried to hinder the practice of Islam (Aj, IK, Q).
6 The use of the emphatic particle nay (kallā) here implies that despite the great blessings of creation and of knowledge, people deny them and are unthankful for them; thus they are disbelievers and rebels (Aj). In this context, rebellious can thus be seen as an allusion to those who rebel against what God teaches.

7 in that he considers himself beyond need.

7 Beyond need is literally “self-sufficient,” but beyond need better conveys the negative connotation of viewing oneself as “self-sufficient” vis-à-vis God. Such self-sufficiency can then be seen as the root of all rebelliousness (Aj).

8 Truly unto thy Lord is the return.

8 The return to God is among the most central themes of the Quran; see commentary on 2:156: Truly we are God’s, and unto Him we return.

9 Hast thou seen him who prohibits

9–10 These verses are usually understood as a direct reference to Abū Jahl’s preventing the Prophet from praying at the Ka‘bah (Aj, IK, Q).
Hast thou seen if he does so out of guidance, or to enjoin reverence?
Hast thou seen if he denied and turned away?
Does he not know that God sees?

11–14 These verses are taken as a rebuke to Abū Jahl (IK, Q), meaning, “Do you have the capacity to judge whether the Prophet is guided?” This particular referent does not, however, contravene the general castigation of all who question the veracity of the Prophet and the Quran. Although some take vv. 13–14 as a continuation of the admonishment in vv. 11–12, in which case he continues to refer to the Prophet, others see the referent as Abū Jahl (Q).

Nay, but if he ceases not, We shall surely seize him by the forelock—a lying, iniquitous forelock.

15–16 These verses are taken by most as an answer to v. 14, meaning that Abū Jahl did not know that God sees. Thus Abū Jahl would not cease to attempt to prohibit the Prophet from praying. The application is nonetheless general, as in 55:41: The guilty shall be known by their marks; and they shall be seized by the forelocks and by the feet. From a Quranic perspective, there is no creature that crawls, but that He holds it by its forelock (11:56).

So let him call his cohorts.
We shall call the guards of Hell.
17–18 Cohorts is seen by most as a reference to the other members of the Quraysh who supported Abū Jahl. According to Ibn ʿAbbās, the Prophet was praying when Abū Jahl came to him and said, “Did we not warn you about this?” The Prophet went to him and reproached him. Abū Jahl retaliated by saying, “Indeed, you know very well that there is no one in Makkah who has more guards than me,” and as a response God revealed vv. 17–18. Ibn ʿAbbās is said to have commented, “By God, had he called, God would have sent the guards of Hell against him” (Aj, IK, Q).

19 Nay! Obey him not! But prostrate and draw nigh.

19 Nay is either another rebuke to Abū Jahl or an address directly to the Prophet and his followers indicating that they should pay no heed to Abū Jahl and his threats, and persist in prostrating to God. Obey him not is echoed in 68:8: So obey not the deniers. More generally, these verses can be taken as an indication that people should not heed any who deny religion or the efficacy of prayer and should continue to prostrate and draw nigh through prayer, for that is the means by which one draws closer to God. According to a ḥadīth, “The closest that a servant can be to his Lord is when he is prostrating” (IK, Q; for the spiritual significance of prostration, see 32:15c; 19:58c).

This verse is one of fifteen verses after the recitation of which one is enjoined to prostrate; see 19:58c.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
An early Makkan sūrah, al-Qadr is believed to have been revealed after Sūrah 80, ʿAbasa. The sūrah is famous for its declaration regarding the Night of Power (Laylat al-Qadr), during which the Quran was first revealed. This is universally believed to have occurred during the month of Ramadan, as stated in 2:185: The month of Ramadan is that wherein the Quran was sent down as guidance to mankind, as clear proofs of guidance, and as the Criterion. Muslims maintain that the Night of Power comes again every year. Many reports say that the Night of Power occurs during the last ten nights of Ramadan (IK, Ės). On the basis of another ḥadīth, most maintain that it occurs on one of the odd-numbered of these last ten nights: “Look for the Night of Power in the last ten nights of Ramadan, on the night when nine or seven or five nights remain out of the last ten nights of Ramadan.”

The Prophet himself would usually practice spiritual retreat (iʿtikāf) during the last ten days of Ramadan, abstaining from conjugal relations, fasting, and praying throughout the night, and he advised his followers to do so as well. According to another ḥadīth, “Whoever stands [in prayer] during the Night of Power out of belief and seeking reward, his previous sins are forgiven” (IK). The Prophet advised that during this night one should pray, “My God, truly thou art a pardoner who loves pardoning; so pardon me” (Āl).

This sūrah can be understood as forming a pair with the following sūrah in that the first discusses the conveyance of the revelation and the second focuses upon the importance of acting in accord with it.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1) Truly We sent it down in the Night of Power. 2) And what shall apprise thee of the Night of Power? 3) The Night of Power is better than a thousand months. 4) The angels and the Spirit descend therein, by the leave of their Lord, with every command; 5) peace it is until the break of dawn.
Commentary

1 Truly We sent it down in the Night of Power.

2 And what shall apprise thee of the Night of Power?

1–2 It refers to the Quran. According to several commentators, these verses indicate that the Quran was revealed in its entirety at once (Bd, IK, Q, Т, Тs). This is understood to be the first stage of revelation from the Preserved Tablet (85:22) to the lowest heaven, that of this world (Bg, Т, Тs), or more specifically to the House of Might (bayt al-ʿizzah), which is in the lowest heaven (IK, Sh); see also 44:3–5c. The second stage of revelation is then understood to have occurred gradually over a twenty-three-year period from 610 to 632. For a discussion of the second stage of revelation, see 17:106c; 25:32c. There are over forty interpretations of what is meant by the Night of Power (Sh). According to Mujāhid, it is “the night of ḥukm,” “the night of judgment/decree” (Sh), meaning that on this night God decrees (qaddara) all things for the following year (Sh, Тs), or meaning God’s Decree for the whole of creation, or both. Others do not see a necessary relation to God’s Decree, saying that this night is so named to convey its honor and greatness (Тs). Others say that the name relates to the power of acts of obedience and worship performed during it, which have “a great power and a tremendous reward” (see the introduction to the sūrah; Sh, Тs). The rhetorical question in v. 2 is an emphatic expression of the utter holiness of this night, implying that true knowledge of it is beyond human understanding and belongs only to God (Sh).

3 The Night of Power is better than a thousand months.

3 The merit for acts of worship performed during this night is greater than that for those performed during a thousand other months (R, Sh, Т). Here and in other verses (e.g., 22:47; 32:5), a thousand need not be taken literally, but as emphasis. According to some, the meaning of a thousand months is “all time”
The angels and the Spirit descend therein, by the leave of their Lord, with every command;

4 Cf. 44:3–4. On this night the angels descend to bless and bring peace to the believers, although many ḥādīth affirm that this function is not restricted to this night, but only more effulgent in it. Most interpret the Spirit as a reference to the Archangel Gabriel, who is the angel of revelation (IK, Sh, T); others say it is a reference to a type of angel, those who are the most noble of them (Sh), which some say are the angels at the lote tree of the boundary (see 53:14–15c; Āl, R); others say this verse refers to a special group of angels whose only function is to descend on this night (Aj, Āl, Sh); still others say the Spirit refers to another archangel. It can also be seen as a reference to God’s Mercy (raḥmah; Aj, Āl, Sh); also see the discussion of “Spirit” (rūḥ) in 78:38c. Therein (fīhā) could also be taken to mean “among them,” meaning that the Spirit descends with the angels (Āl). By the leave of their Lord is interpreted by some to mean “by the Command of their Lord” (Sh), as in 19:64, where the angels say, We descend not, save by the Command of thy Lord (R). With every command, or “with every decree,” has many interpretations. The most prevalent is that it means on account of everything that God has ordained (qaḍā) for the following year (Bḍ, Sh, T); see 44:3–5c. An alternate reading of this verse is min kulli imriʾin, meaning, “for every human being” (Bḍ, Sh, T).

5 peace it is until the break of dawn.

5 Many say this verse refers to greetings of peace that the angels bestow upon those who spend this night in prayer (IK, R, Sh). Others say it indicates that this night itself is naught but peace (Bḍ, Sh), which is interpreted to mean that there is no evil in this night whatsoever (Āl, IK, R). Some say it indicates that there is peace in everything that God decrees or ordains for the following year during this night (Āl). It can also be seen as conveying the pregnant quietude that precedes the emergence of the Divine Word in the human world and by analogy the stillness of heart required for the true remembrance of God.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Many commentators take al-Bayyinah to be a Madinan sūrah (Āl, IK, Sh), although others claim that it is more widely known as a Makkān sūrah (Aj, Sh). It takes its name from the mention of the clear proof (al-bayyinah) in the first verse, a word used throughout the Quran as a reference to the content and function of revelation. This sūrah is also known by the first two words, lam yakun, “They Will Not” (when standing alone), and as al-Qiyāmah, “The Resurrection,” among other titles (Āl).

Bayyinah derives from the verb bayyana, meaning “to make or to become clear, evident, manifest, plain, or apparent,” as in 2:219: Thus does God make clear unto you the signs, that haply you may reflect (cf. 2:266); and 3:118: We have indeed made clear the signs for you, were you to understand (cf. 2:187, 242; 3:103; 4:176; 5:89; 24:58–59, 61). Both the Prophet Muhammad (16:64) and Jesus (43:63) are described as “making clear.” And in 2:159–60 those who “make clear” are distinguished from those who conceal what has been revealed to them.

In the Quran, clarity and exposition of truths are attributes of God’s revelations and the teachings of God’s prophets. To follow a clear proof is to follow the way of truth, as in 47:14: Is one who stands upon a clear proof from his Lord like one whose evil deeds are made to seem fair unto him, and like those who follow their caprices? In this way, all revelation is presented as a clear proof. As 57:25 states: We have indeed sent Our messengers with clear proofs (cf. 5:32). Other verses present Moses (2:87, 92; 7:105), Jesus (2:87, 253; 5:110; 43:63; 61:6), and other prophets as having come with clear proofs. Here, as in most instances, clear proof is employed to demonstrate the stark contrast between those who follow a clear proof and those who do not.

The sūrah begins with an assertion that those who disbelieve will continue to oppose the Prophet until a clear proof comes to them (vv. 1–5), and the last three verses (vv. 6–8) contrast the fate of the disbelievers with that of the believers.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Those who disbelieve among the People of the Book and the idolaters will not desist until the clear proof comes unto them, 2 a messenger from God reciting scriptures purified, 3 wherein are books upright. 4 Those who were given the Book did not become divided until after the clear proof had come unto them. 5 They were not commanded but to worship God, devoting religion entirely to Him, as ḥanīfs, and to perform the prayer, and to give the alms—that is the upright religion. 6 Truly the disbelievers among the People of the Book and the idolaters are in the Fire of Hell, abiding therein; it is they who are the worst of creation. 7 Truly those who believe and perform righteous deeds, it is they who are the best of creation. 8 Their reward is with their Lord, Gardens of Eden with rivers running below, abiding therein forever, God being content with them and they being content with Him. That is for whosoever fears his Lord.
Commentary

1 Those who disbelieve among the People of the Book and the idolaters will not desist until the clear proof comes unto them,

Some commentators consider this verse to be among the most difficult verses of the Quran (Sh, W). According to most commentators, those who disbelieve among the People of the Book refers to disbelievers among both Jews and Christians (Bḍ, IK, Q, Sh), though some say it refers only to the Jews of Madinah (Q). Most read this verse to mean that disbelievers will not leave their disbelief until the clear proof of revelation has come to them (Q, R, Sh, Z). Others say that it could mean that they will not be punished or destroyed until the proof of revelation has been brought to them (Sh); in which case the idolaters will not desist could be translated “the idolaters will not be abandoned,” meaning that God will send them the clear proof and they will then be rewarded or punished based upon their acceptance or rejection of it. This interpretation accords with many passages confirming that God will not punish any for wrong belief until they have been presented with the truth and then rejected it, as in 17:15: And never do We punish till We have sent a messenger (see 79:18–19c). In this vein, the verse can be seen as a specific reference to disbelief in the prophethood of Muhammad (Q), not necessarily to disbelief in God. Most interpret the clear proof as a reference to the Quran (Q, R, Sh), as in 6:57: Truly I stand upon a clear proof from my Lord, and you have denied Him. Others take clear proof as a reference to the Prophet Muhammad (Q, R, Sh). But it can also be seen as a reference to the phenomena of revelation and thus to the books and prophets sent to all communities, since the dozens of references to clear proof(s) throughout the Quran are used in relation to many different prophets and the books with which they were sent (see the introduction to this sūrah). In this interpretation, disbelievers among the People of the Book refers to those who are said to have altered the scriptures that had been sent to them through previous prophets; see 2:75c; 3:78c.

2 a messenger from God reciting scriptures purified,
The majority of commentators interpret scriptures purified as a reference to the Quran and a messenger as a reference to Muhammad (Bg, IK, Q, T). Messenger can, however, also be read as a reference to the Archangel Gabriel (Bd), and both terms could be seen as references to the messengers and revelations that each community has been sent, since, as several verses attest, there has been no community but that a warner has passed among them (35:24). Scriptures purified can also be read as a reference to the Preserved Tablet (85:22; Sh), from which all revelation is said to descend; see 85:22c; 97:1–2c.

3  Books upright indicates that they are free from errors and mistakes because they are from God (IK, Sh), distinguishing between truth and falsehood with no crookedness therein (18:1; R), since they are on pages honored, exalted and purified (80:13–14; Q); see also 85:21–22.

Those who were given the Book did not become divided until after the clear proof had come unto them.

This verse is similar to 45:17: And We gave them clear proofs from the Command. And they differed not till after knowledge had come unto them, out of envy among themselves (cf. 2:213; 3:19, 105; 10:93; 23:53; 43:63–65). Given this tendency among human beings, 3:105 counsels, Be not like those who became divided and differed after the clear proofs had come to them. From one perspective, this means that people had been unified in their disbelief, but that after the clear proofs of revelation came, they differed: among them were those who believed, and among them were those who disbelieved (2:253). Others claim that it alludes to those among the People of the Book who believed that a messenger would come, but, when the Prophet Muhammad was sent, denied his prophethood, as in 2:89: *And when there came to them a Book from God, confirming that which they had with them—and aforetime they used to ask for victory over those who disbelieve—so when there came to them that which they recognized, they disbelieved in it (R). Others see this verse as a reference to the corruption of pure revelation by previous religious communities, who argued with one another and divided into different sects (firqaḥ; IK), as in 11:110; 27:76; and 41:45. In this vein they cite a famous ḥadīth, “Verily, the Jews differed until they became seventy-one sects. And verily, the Christians differed until they became seventy-two sects. And this community [i.e., the Muslim community] will divide into seventy-three sects, and all of them will be in the Fire except one.” The Prophet was then asked, “Who are they, O Messenger of God?” He replied, “[Those who follow] what I and my Companions follow” (IK, Q).

5 They were not commanded but to worship God, devoting religion entirely to Him, as ḥanīfs, and to perform the prayer, and to give the alms—that is the upright religion.

5 The first phrase is understood to mean that those who came before were only ordered to do that which was enjoined upon them in order to worship God (Sh, Z), and is taken to imply that they sought other objectives and mixed other practices and beliefs into the pure religion that God had sent them (Ṭ). Devoting . . . entirely translates mukhliṣ, which implies making something pure and doing something with complete sincerity. It can be taken to mean both that they purify the religion for God, meaning their practice and understanding of the religion, and that they purify themselves (Sh). Ḥanīf (pl. ḥunafāʾ) derives from the verb ḥanifa, meaning “to incline.” It is employed in the Quran to indicate one who inclines away from idolatry and toward belief in the Oneness of God (tawḥīd). Abraham is thus described as a ḥanīf in several verses (2:135; 3:67, 95; 4:125; 6:79, 161; 16:120, 123). And in 10:105, the Prophet is enjoined, Set thy face toward the religion as a ḥanīf, and be thou not among the idolaters; see also 22:31; 30:30. For the meaning of ḥanīf, see 2:135c. Alms translates zakāh, which is the technical term for the Muslim mandatory alms (see 2:277c), but is also used to indicate the alms mandated for previous religious communities (see 2:43, 83, 177, 277; 4:77, 162; 7:156; 19:31, 55; 21:73; 22:41; 24:37), and at other times for all forms of charitable giving. The root meaning of zakāh is purification, implying that giving wealth purifies both the giver and the wealth.
In this context, zakāh can be more broadly conceived as all acts of kindness toward the poor and needy (IK), especially if this is a Makkan sūrah revealed before the formal institutionalization of the alms.

The upright religion is seen by some as a reference to the religion of Abraham and his followers, the religion that was taught in the scriptures purified (v. 2). For the meaning of the upright religion, see 30:30c. In this context some understand it as a direct reference to the religion with which the Prophet Muhammad was sent (Ṭ), while others see it as a more general reference to all those who follow what has been revealed to them through a prophet.

Truly the disbelievers among the People of the Book and the idolaters are in the Fire of Hell, abiding therein; it is they who are the worst of creation.

6–8 That human beings can be both the best of creation and the worst of creation testifies to their unique place in the cosmos, as in 95:4–5: Truly We created man in the most beautiful stature, then We cast him to the lowest of the low. On the one hand, human beings are favored above all else, as in 17:70: We have indeed honored the Children of Adam, and We carry them over land and sea, and provide them with good things, and We have favored them above many We have created. On the other hand, when they do not live up to their potential, they are below all else, as in 25:44: Truly they are but as cattle. Nay, they are further astray from the way. Vv. 6–7 can also be taken as a reference to those who are the worst or the best of the age in which they live, as in 2:47, which addresses the Children of Israel, Remember My Blessing which I bestowed upon you, and that I favored you above the worlds (Q). According to both Shiite and Sunni sources, the Prophet said to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib regarding the best of creation, “That is you and your partisans (shīʿah) on the Day of Resurrection, content, contenting [89:28]” (Kā, Sh, Sy).

The combination of the best of creation and the mutual contentment mentioned in v. 8 indicates that human beings have an illustrious station (IK). Based upon these and other verses, some scholars have argued that believing and righteous human beings are better than the angels (Āl, IK). Others see an allusion to believers as the best among the created beings in this world.
Regarding the latter, the Prophet is reported to have said to some Companions, “Shall I not inform you of the best of creation?” They said, “Of course, O Messenger of God!” He replied, “A man who takes the reins of his horse in the way of God, and whenever there is a cry from the enemy, he mounts it. Shall I not inform you of the best of creation?” They said, “Of course, O Messenger of God!” He said, “A man who has a flock of sheep, and he establishes the prayer and gives alms. Shall I not inform you of the best of creation?” They said, “Of course.” He said, “The person who is asked for the sake of God (bi’ Llāh), yet does not give for His sake” (IK, Sh). According to another ḥadīth, “The believer is more noble in the Eyes of God than some of His angels” (Q).

7 Truly those who believe and perform righteous deeds, it is they who are the best of creation.

8 Their reward is with their Lord, Gardens of Eden with rivers running below, abiding therein forever, God being content with them and they being content with Him. That is for whosoever fears his Lord.

8 For God being content with them and they being content with Him, see also 5:119; 9:100; 58:22c; 89:28c. According to some, the Garden of Contentment (jannat al-ridwān) is the second highest level of Paradise, just below the Garden of the Essence (jannat al-dhāt).

The Earthquake

al-Zalzalah

Al-Zalzalah is believed to be either a late Makkan sūrah or a Madinan sūrah revealed in 623, soon after the Prophet’s emigration in 622 (Āl). It takes its name from the reference to the shaking of the earth in the first verse. The first five verses provide a powerful and extended discussion of the quaking of the earth, which is said to be one of the events of the Day of Judgment to which reference or allusion is made in many other verses. The last three verses convey details regarding the Final Judgment, in which every good and evil deed will be weighed.

According to a ḥadīth, “A man came to the Messenger of God and said, ‘Teach me what to recite, O Messenger of God!’ The Prophet said, ‘Recite three from those [that begin] with the letters Alif, Lām, Rā [i.e., Sūrahṣ 10–12, 14–15].’ The man then said to him, ‘I have become old in age, my heart has hardened, and my tongue has become harsh.’ The Prophet said, ‘Then recite from those [that begin] with the letters Ḥā, Mīm [i.e., Sūrahṣ 40–46].’ The man said the same thing that he had said before; so the Prophet said, ‘Recite three from the Musabbiḥāt [i.e., sūrahṣ whose first verse mentions the glorification of God by all of creation: 57, 59, 61, 62, 64].’ The man again said the same thing that he had said before. Then the man said, ‘Rather, give me something to recite that comprises [all of these], O Messenger of God.’ So the Prophet told him to recite, When the earth is shaken with her shaking. Then when he [the Prophet] finished reciting the sūrah to him, the man said, ‘By Him Who has sent you with the truth as a Prophet, I shall never add anything else to it.’ Then the man turned away and left, and the Prophet said, ‘The little man has prospered; the little man has prospered’” (IK).

According to a saying attributed to Ibn ēAbbās, “When [the earth] is shaken is equal to half of the Quran” (Āl, Q, Sy). In other words, if the Quran is divided into the edicts regarding the Hereafter and those regarding this world, this sūrah would comprise in summary fashion all of those edicts that pertain to the Hereafter (Āl).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. When the earth is shaken with her shaking, 2. and the earth yields up her burdens, 3. and man says, “What ails her?” 4. That Day she shall convey her chronicles; 5. for thy Lord inspired her. 6. That Day mankind shall issue forth upon diverse paths to witness their deeds. 7. So whosoever does a mote’s weight of good shall see it. 8. And whosoever does a mote’s weight of evil shall see it.
Commentary

1 When the earth is shaken with her shaking,

   1 The shaking of the earth is considered to be one of the signs of the Hour (cf. 19:90; 27:88; 56:4–6; 69:14; 73:14; 89:21). Many other verses also refer to the distress that human beings will experience when the world comes to an end (e.g., 22:1–2).

2 and the earth yields up her burdens,

   2 This verse is similar to 84:3–4: And when the earth is stretched out, and casts forth what is in it, emptying itself (cf. 54:7; 101:4). A ḥadīth says of this event, “The earth will throw out the pieces of its liver [i.e., its contents]. Gold and silver will come out like columns. A murderer will come and say, ‘I killed for this!’ The one who broke the ties of kinship will say, ‘For this I severed the ties of kinship!’ The thief will say, ‘For this I had my hands amputated!’ Then they will leave it there, and no one will take anything from it” (IK).

3 and man says, “What ails her?”

   3 This verse can be seen as a reference to all human beings who are alive when this event occurs or only to the disbelievers (Bḍ, Q, Sh). With regard to the latter, the believers know that the world is ephemeral, whereas the disbelievers will be astonished when it fades away.

4 That Day she shall convey her chronicles;

   4 The earth will speak of what its inhabitants did while upon it. It is reported that the Prophet said, “Verily, her chronicles means that she will testify against every male and female servant, about what they did upon her surface. She will say that he did such and such on such and such a day. So this is her chronicles” (IK).

***

5 for thy Lord inspired her.

5 The earth is inspired or instructed to convey all of the deeds performed by those who dwelled upon her.

6 That Day mankind shall issue forth upon diverse paths to witness their deeds.

6 Upon diverse paths translates ashtātan, implying that people’s ends will diverge greatly and thus alluding to the contrast between those destined for Heaven and those destined for Hell. Ashtātan could also be taken to imply that they are dispersed and scattered, as in 101:4: A day wherein mankind shall be like scattered moths (see also 54:7). Though on the Day of Judgment people are said to stand in groups according to their particular religious communities (see 16:84, 89; 28:75; 36:69), every person will be resurrected alone and stand in judgment alone, with none of the things people rely upon in this life or thought they might be able to rely upon in the Hereafter. See 6:94: And [God will say], “Now you have come unto Us alone, just as We created you the first time, and you have left behind that which We had bestowed upon you. We see not with you your intercessors—those whom you claimed were partners [unto God]. Now the bond between you has been severed, and that which you once claimed has forsaken you.”

7 So whosoever does a mote’s weight of good shall see it.

8 And whosoever does a mote’s weight of evil shall see it.
Cf. 34:3: Not a mote’s weight evades Him in the heavens or on earth, nor smaller than that, nor larger, but that it is in a clear Book (cf. 10:61; 54:52–53). According to Muqātil ibn Sulaymān, one of the earliest Quran commentators, “These two verses were revealed about two men. One of them deemed it unworthy to give beggars one date, a small piece of bread, or one walnut, saying to himself, ‘Such things are nothing. We only get rewarded when we give away something that we love.’ The other man used to belittle minor sins such as small lies, backbiting, and looking at that which is unlawful, saying to himself, ‘No onus is upon me because of engaging in this, for God only threatens those who commit major sins with Hellfire.’ And so God revealed these two verses, encouraging people to perform even small acts of goodness, since they add up in the end, and cautioning them against even small sins, since they add up in the end” (W). There are many ḥādīth that reinforce this message, among them, “Fear the Fire, even if by giving half a date in charity, and even if by saying a single word of good” (IK). The Prophet’s wife ʿĀʾishah is reported to have said, “He used to say, ‘O ʿĀʾishah! Beware of the sins that are belittled, for indeed they will be taken account of by God’” (IK). That everything will be recorded in a book or in a clear book is reiterated in several verses (6:59; 10:61; 11:6; 20:52; 22:70; 27:75; 34:3; 35:11; 57:22; 78:29). Sometimes this record is understood as a reference to all deeds and at other times as a reference to all that exists. For a discussion of the book in which the deeds of human beings are recorded, see 18:49c and 69:19–29.
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Most commentators maintain that al-ʿĀdiyāt was revealed in the early Makkah period, most likely soon after Sūrah 101, al-Qāriʿah. Others maintain that it was revealed in the beginning of the Madinan period (Āl, Ṭṣ). The case for Makkah attribution is supported by its similarity in style to other Makkah sūrah, while the case for Madinan attribution is supported by some interpretations of the subject matter.

The sūrah takes its name from the mention of the chargers in the first verse. There are several different accounts regarding the occasion of revelation. In the first, it is reported that the Prophet sent a military expedition under the command of al-Mundhir ibn ʿAmr al-Anṣārī to a clan of Banū Kinānah. When news of the expedition was delayed, the hypocrites said, “They have all been killed,” and so God gave news about this expedition and revealed By the panting chargers, meaning the horses of that expedition (Ṭṣ). Others have said that the verses refer to the Battle of Badr, but according to an account attributed to ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib there were only two horses at Badr; the rest of the mounts were camels. Another account attributed to ʿAlī sees these oaths as depictions of that portion of the ḥajj pilgrimage in which the pilgrims rush on their mounts from Mt. ʿArafat to Muzdalifah and on to Minā.

The sūrah begins with five oaths by various forms of charging horses (vv. 1–5). The next three verses (vv. 6–8) discuss the state of human beings and their ingratitude toward God, while the last three verses (vv. 9–11) warn that God is aware of all things and that on the Day of Judgment one will have to answer for what lies within one’s breast.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

１ By the panting chargers, ２ by the strikers of sparks, ３ by the raiders at dawn, ４ raising thereby a trail of dust, ５ penetrating to the center altogether, ６ truly man is ungrateful to his Lord, ７ and truly he is a witness to that, ８ and truly he is fierce in his love for good things. ９ Does he not know that when what lies within graves is turned inside out, １０ and what lies within breasts is made known, １１ truly on that Day their Lord shall be aware of them!
Commentary

① By the panting chargers,

1–5 According to al-Bayḍāwī, the oaths in these verses can also be seen as an allusion to “charging souls” who, when something of the light of holiness appears unto them, convey it to others, strike the sparks of spiritual knowledge (al-maʿārif), raid caprice and bad habits, raise desire for God, and finally penetrate altogether into the midst of those who are in ʿIlliyyūn, considered by some to be the highest Garden of Paradise (see 83:18–19).

1 The various occasions of revelation reported imply that this verse refers to either horses in battle or camels on the pilgrimage (Bḍ), but it can be seen as applying to both, as each is understood as fulfilling a function considered worthy of being sworn upon by God.

② by the strikers of sparks,

2 The striking of hooves on rocks causes sparks to fly (IK).

③ by the raiders at dawn,

④ raising thereby a trail of dust,

3–4 The camels that rush from Mashʿar to Minā do so at dawn on the Day of Sacrifice, the last day of the ḥajj (see 2:196–200).

⑤ penetrating to the center altogether,

5 This verse alludes to the manner in which the horses penetrated to the center of the enemy troops (Bḍ) or to the rush of camels from Mashʿar to Minā.

6 truly man is ungrateful to his Lord,

6 This verse constitutes the response to the oaths in the first five verses. Kanūd, here translated ungrateful, indicates a land where nothing grows or a person who is petty and miserly.

7 and truly he is a witness to that,

7 He can be read as a reference to either God or human beings (Bḍ, IK, Ṭs). God as Witness is attested in many other verses (3:98; 4:33; 5:117; 22:17; 33:55; 58:6; 85:9). As to the latter, it can be taken to imply either that human beings are aware of their sins in this life or that they will be aware of them on the Day of Judgment, as in 67:11: Thus do they admit their sin (see also 35:37; 42:35). Other verses attest that on the Day of Judgment people will be made to testify against themselves (6:30; 24:24; 36:65; 41:20); see 36:65c.

8 and truly he is fierce in his love for good things.

8 Most commentators equate good things with wealth, but the term can also be seen as a more general reference to all things of this world for which human beings have excessive love at the expense of loving God and the blessings of the Hereafter, as in 3:14: Made to seem fair unto mankind is the love of passions, among them women, children, hoarded heaps of gold and silver, horses of mark, cattle, and tillage. Those are the enjoyment of the life of this world. And God, with Him is the beautiful return.

9 Does he not know that when what lies within graves is turned inside out,

9 All human beings will be resurrected (see also 82:3–4; 84:3–4; 99:2c). The image of graves being turned inside out is another example of apocalyptic inversion (see, e.g., 81:1–6; 82:1–4) that evokes the idea of all one’s past being resurrected for judgment (cf. 35:22; 60:13).

10 and what lies within breasts is made known,

11 truly on that Day their Lord shall be aware of them!

10–11 On the Day of Resurrection the good will be clearly distinguished from the bad (Sh), and the true nature of all actions and hearts will be known. The Day of Judgment is thus referred to in 86:9 as the Day when secrets are tested, for on this day everyone’s true nature will become known. As dozens of verses attest, God is at all times aware of all that human beings do (e.g., 2:134, 221; 3:153, 180; 17:30; 24:30; 27:88; 57:11) and of what lies within breasts (cf. 3:119, 154; 5:7; 8:43; 11:5; 31:23; 35:38; 39:7; 42:24; 57:6; 64:4; 67:13). The specific reference to God’s Awareness on the Day of Judgment in this verse can thus be understood as an indication that on this day human beings will themselves become cognizant of the fact of God’s ever present awareness and will no longer be able to deceive themselves or deny the intentions that lay behind their actions. In other verses, the disbelievers even bear witness that they deserve Hellfire (see 39:71; 67:11).

The Calamity

_ al-Qāriʿah_ is a Makkan sūrah, most likely revealed just after Sūrah 106, Quraysh. It takes its name from the mention of the calamity in the first three verses, which according to some is one of the names of the Day of Judgment. The first five verses provide a vivid description of the destruction of the earth on the Day of Judgment. The last six verses (vv. 6–11) contrast the recompense of one whose scales are heavy with good deeds to one whose scales are light.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1. The calamity; 2. what is the calamity? 3. And what shall apprise thee of the calamity? 4. A day wherein mankind shall be like scattered moths, 5. and the mountains shall be like carded wool. 6. As for one whose scales are heavy, 7. he shall enjoy a life contenting. 8. And as for one whose scales are light, 9. an abyss shall be his mother. 10. And what shall apprise thee of her? 11. It is a raging fire.
Commentary

1 The calamity;

2 what is the calamity?

3 And what shall apprise thee of the calamity?

1–3 Calamity translates qāriʿah, which comes from the verb qaraʿa, meaning, “to beat or strike something so that it makes a deafening sound.” The repetition of the question in vv. 2–3 (which is similar to 69:2–3) is meant to emphasize that the true nature of the calamity, which is thought to be the Day of Judgment, is difficult if not impossible to comprehend. Thus the following verses do not define the calamity, but describe some of its marks.

4 A day wherein mankind shall be like scattered moths,

4 Like scattered moths indicates that human beings will be bewildered, running to and fro with no direction, as if they were drunk, though drunk they will not be (22:2). This is similar to 54:7: With their eyes humbled they emerge from the graves as if they were scattered locusts (cf. 99:6), though 54:7 refers to the Resurrection, while the present verse most likely refers to the end of time. As the present verse is in the accusative in Arabic, there is an implied word before the sentence, which could be a command to the Prophet, such as “Mention” (udhkur; Āl), or a verb following upon the previous verse, such as “strike” (qaraʿa; Z), meaning, “It strikes on a day when . . .”

5 and the mountains shall be like carded wool.

5 Cf. 70:9. Several verses speak of mountains made firm (e.g., 13:3; 16:15; 21:31; 41:10) as one of the signs of God. But on the Day of Judgment, the mountains are set in motion (81:3), scattered (77:10), and are like heaps of shifting sand (73:14); see also 18:47; 19:90; 20:105–6; 27:88; 52:10; 56:5–6c; 69:14.

6 As for one whose scales are heavy,

7 he shall enjoy a life contenting.

8 And as for one whose scales are light,

9 an abyss shall be his mother.

6–9  Cf. 7:8; 23:102. Scales are heavy with good deeds. Mawāzīn, here translated scales is the plural of mīzān, which elsewhere is translated balance (6:152; 7:85; 11:84–85; 42:17; 55:7–9; 57:25). Balance (mīzān) is employed in the Quran to indicate revelation itself and the establishment of a just order that accords with what has been revealed (see 57:25c), whereas scales (mawāzīn) is employed in relation to the measuring of one’s deeds on the Day of Resurrection (see 21:47). The plural, scales, speaks to how each individual will experience the weighing of his or her deeds, but according to most, it is in fact one scale, hence one balance, in which all deeds are weighed (Āl). From a Quranic perspective, the good deed and the evil deed are not equal (41:34), and good deeds remove those that are evil (11:114). Good deeds thus significantly outweigh evil deeds, as in 6:160: Whosoever brings a good deed shall have ten times the like thereof; but whosoever brings an evil deed shall be recompensed only with the like thereof. But it is the character and intention behind deeds that establish their true weight. Regarding character, a ḥadīth states, “There is nothing placed in the Balance that is heavier than goodness of character (ḥusn al-khuluq).” Regarding intention, another ḥadīth states, “Deeds are only in accord with their intentions. And every person has only what he intended.” From one perspective, although all deeds will be weighed, it is nonetheless through God’s Mercy that salvation occurs, for God is not bound by human actions. As a ḥadīth states, “None of you will enter Paradise by his deeds.” Someone asked, “Not even you, O Messenger of God?” He said, “Not even me, save that God shelter me with His Mercy.” For he shall enjoy a life contenting, cf. 69:21. For one whose scales are light, cf. 7:9; 23:103.

Mother translates umm, which derives from the verb amma, meaning, “to betake oneself to” or “direct one’s course to.” In this context it indicates that those who do not perform good deeds direct themselves to the abyss of Hell. In this sense it is similar to verses that speak of those who wrong themselves (e.g., 3:117; 7:177; 9:70; 10:44; 16:33, 118) and to those verses that refer to Hell and the Fire as the refuge of the disbelievers (e.g., 3:162, 197; 9:73; 13:18).

10 And what shall apprise thee of her?

11 It is a raging fire.

11 This verse is taken to mean that the Fire has reached the greatest heat possible (Sh) and that, when viewed in relation to this Fire, no other fire is truly raging (R).
بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
Most maintain that al-Takāthur is a Makkan sūrah, believed to follow Sūrah 108, al-Kawthar, in the chronological order of revelation, while a minority maintain that it is a Madinan sūrah (Ṭs). It takes its name from the mention of takāthur (vying for increase) in the first verse and was reportedly called “The Sūrah of the Grave” by some Companions of the Prophet (Āl).

According to the most well attested occasion of revelation, this sūrah was revealed about two clans of the Quraysh, Banū ʿAbd Manāf and Banū Sahm, who heaped abuses upon each other, leading them to count the respective chiefs, leaders, and members of each clan in order to see which one of them had more. The Banū ʿAbd Manāf said, “We have more leaders, chiefs, and members!” The Banū Sahm said the same. When it appeared that the Banū ʿAbd Manāf had more members, they said, “Let us also count the dead among us.” They visited the graveyards, counted the dead, and concluded that the Banū Sahm had more, for they were greater in number in the pre-Islamic period (Q, W). Others say that these verses are a reference to the People of the Book or specifically to the Jews of Madinah (Q, Ṭs).

The first two verses speak of the delusion of accumulating worldly goods, which is referenced throughout the Quran (e.g., 3:14; 9:24), while the remaining verses (vv. 3–8) promise that those who persist in such behavior will know Hellfire with certainty.
In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

① Vying for increase distracts you, ② till you visit the graves. ③ Nay! Soon you will know. ④ Indeed! Soon you will know. ⑤ Nay! If you knew with the knowledge of certainty, ⑥ you would surely see Hellfire. ⑦ Then you would surely see it with the eye of certainty. ⑧ Then surely you will be questioned that Day about the blessing.
Commentary

1 Vying for increase distracts you,

Vying for increase in worldly gains distracts people from obedience to God and remembering the Hereafter (Q, Ṭs). “Distraction” (lahw) indicates an amusement, something that keeps people from achieving their real goals (Āl, Iṣ). In this vein, the Quran advises, Let not the life of this world delude you (31:33; 35:5; see also 45:35). Vying for increase translates takāthur, which implies both competing and boasting. It can pertain to anything that people seek for the gratification of their egos rather than for God’s sake. According to a saying attributed to the Prophet, it means gathering wealth without right, withholding it from those to whom it rightfully belongs, and hoarding it (Q). It is reported that a Companion of the Prophet came upon him while he was reciting, Vying for increase distracts you, and the Prophet said, “The son of Adam says, ‘My wealth! My wealth!’ But do you get anything from your wealth except what you have eaten and finished, or what you have clothed yourself with and worn out, or what you have given as charity or spent?” (IK, Q, Ṭs). Another ḥadīth states, “If the son of Adam had a valley of gold, he would wish for it to be two valleys” (IK, Q).

2 till you visit the graves.

This verse can be interpreted according to the first occasion of revelation mentioned in the sūrah introduction or as implying that people will continue to be distracted and not repent before they die (Q, Ṭs). Regarding the first interpretation, ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib is reported to have said, “How neglectful are these visitors and how difficult is the affair. They took no lesson from something that was full of lessons, but took lessons from far-off places. Do they boast about the dead bodies of their forefathers, or do they regard the number of dead people as grounds for feeling boastful of their numbers? They want to revive bodies that have become spiritless and moments that have passed that are more appropriate as lessons than as sources of pride and that are more suitable as a source of humility than of honor” (Nahj al-balâghah, Sermon No. 221).

3 Nay! Soon you will know.

4 Indeed! Soon you will know.

3–4 This verse means that people will know at the moment of death. The repetition in these verses can be viewed as emphasizing that people cannot evade the outcome of their actions (Āl, Q, Ṭs) and that in the Hereafter they will know the real value of the things they prized when on earth. The repetition can also be taken as a reference to the punishment realized in the grave (v. 3) and then to the punishment realized after the Final Resurrection (v. 4; Āl, Q, Ṭs). According to some, the first is addressed to disbelievers and the second to believers (IK, Q). The emphatic particle kahiba can indicate either negation or affirmation; it is thus rendered Nay in v. 3 and v. 5 and indeed in v. 4, though it could also be rendered nay for each or indeed for each (Q).

5 Nay! If you knew with the knowledge of certainty,

5–7 These verses can be taken to mean that if people knew now as they will know then, vying for increase (v. 1) would not distract them (IK, Q), and they would turn to God at every moment (Aj) rather than to the world.

5 The answer to the conditional phrase if you knew is dropped for rhetorical emphasis. Some say the implied answer is “then vying for increase would not distract you” (R); others say it is intentionally vague to let people wonder at the consequences and realize the gravity of their condition (R). The knowledge of certainty can be interpreted to mean “the knowledge of that which is certain” (Sh), meaning the Resurrection (Ṭ). It is also interpreted by many to mean the truth of certainty (56:95). Most Sufis see the knowledge of certainty, the eye of certainty (v. 7), and the truth of certainty as three levels of spiritual development. In this respect the knowledge of certainty can be likened to knowledge obtained through hearing about something, the eye of certainty can refer to knowledge obtained by seeing or touching something, and the truth of certainty can refer to sapiential knowledge obtained by tasting, or experiencing something directly. In his Makkan Openings, Ibn ʿArabī says that the truth of certainty is what is obtained through knowledge of the direct cause, the eye of certainty is what is provided by witnessing and spiritual unveiling, and the knowledge of certainty is what is provided by an indication (dalīl) in which there are no obscurities (Futuḥāt, II 132. 27–29). Basing his words on the famous saying “He who knows himself knows his Lord,” he further states that “one who witnesses himself witnesses his Lord and thereby moves from the certainty of knowledge to the certainty of the eye; then when he returns to his body, he returns to the certainty of truth from the certainty of the eye, not to the certainty of knowledge” (Futuḥāt, III 390.1–3; cf. 2:42; 3:71).

6 you would surely see Hellfire.

7 Then you would surely see it with the eye of certainty.

6–7 These verses can be understood as repetition for emphasis, similar to vv. 3–4; or v. 6 can be taken as an indication that people will see Hellfire before entering it and v. 7 as an indication that they will know it with certainty when they enter into it (Āl, Q, Ṭs).

8 Then surely you will be questioned that Day about the blessing.

8 People will be questioned about what they have done with the blessings that God bestowed upon them while on earth (IK, Ṭs), as in 17:36: Truly hearing, and sight, and the heart—all of these will be called to account (Sh). In this vein the Prophet is reported to have said to some of his Companions after they had found food for which they had left their homes in the middle of the night, “By Him in Whose Hand lies my soul, you shall be questioned about this blessing on the Day of Resurrection. Hunger brought you out of your homes, and you did not return before this blessing came to you.” Some say this verse means people will be questioned about the Prophet, since he is considered the greatest blessing sent by God (Ṭs). According to some this verse is addressed only to the disbelievers; according to others it is addressed to all those who are responsible for their actions (al-mukallafūn). When viewed as addressed only to the disbelievers, it can be seen as a reference to 67:8, where they are asked by the keepers of Hell, Did not a warner come unto you? It can also be seen as an indication that human beings will be asked which are the true blessings: the delights of this world or those of the Hereafter (K).

The Declining Day

al-ʿAṣr

A Makkan sūrah, al-ʿAṣr most likely follows Sūrah 94, al-Sharḥ, in the chronological order of revelation. It takes its title from the first word, al-ʿaṣr, which can be understood to mean the late afternoon (hence the translation declining day), the last hour of the afternoon, the entire afternoon, the later afternoon prayer, or a period of time in the sense of an epoch. It is said that whenever two Companions of the Prophet would meet they would not part company until one of them had recited al-ʿAṣr in its entirety and one of them had given greetings of peace to the other (IK). When viewed in relation to the previous sūrah, ʿaṣr can be understood as a reference to time in general, meaning that vying for increase (102:1) prevents people from spending their time in the most beneficial manner and that the blessing of time is that for which people will be questioned (102:8). From one perspective, these three short verses contain the entire message of the Quran, namely, that human beings are in loss unless they turn to God. In this vein, the famous legal scholar al-Shāfiʿī is reported to have said, “Were the people to ponder this sūrah, it would suffice them” (IK).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 By the declining day, 2 truly mankind is in loss, 3 save those who believe, perform righteous deeds, exhort one another to truth, and exhort one another to patience.
Commentary

By the declining day,

1 For the possible meanings of the declining day (al-ʿaṣr), see the introduction to this sūrah. Linguistically, ʿaṣr derives from the verb ʿasara, meaning “to squeeze,” and thus relates to time that is declining or fading quickly. Among those possible meanings, many judge the most likely to be the ʿaṣr prayer (Bd, Q, Z), which is considered to be the prayer referred to as the middlemost prayer in 2:238, though that verse is also interpreted in many different ways. Some also say the term in this verse refers to the “era (ʿaṣr) of the Prophet because of its bounty (fadl) through the renewal of prophethood in it” (Q). In this vein, this sūrah can be seen as pertaining to both the life of the individual and that of the human species; according to traditional Islamic belief, the fall of humanity continues as the historical cycle unfolds, and each generation is a degree below the generation before it.

truly mankind is in loss,

2 Vv. 2–3 are the response to the oath in v. 1 and are similar in meaning to 95:5–6: Then We cast him to the lowest of the low, save those who believe and perform righteous deeds; for theirs shall be a reward unceasing. The term mankind can be seen as a reference to disbelievers (Bg, Q) or to humanity in general (Q). Seen in light of the reference to the declining day, it can also be taken as a reference to humanity during the latter days of the historical cycle. According to 35:39, the disbelief of the disbelievers increases them in naught but loss. The Quranic understanding of loss pertains to losing this world and the Hereafter (22:11). The losers are thus those who lose what they value most in this life, although not necessarily purely material things, and in the next life, as in 39:15: Truly the losers are those who lose their souls and their families on the Day of Resurrection. Yea! That is the manifest loss. From a spiritual perspective, loss can also be seen as a reference to losing faith and attachment to God. When ʿaṣr is understood as a reference to time, v. 2 indicates that people who do not use their time properly are in a constant state of loss.

3 save those who believe, perform righteous deeds, exhort one another to truth, and exhort one another to patience.

3 In this context, truth can mean God (Q), the Quran (Bg, Q, Ṭs), or faith and professing Divine Unity (Bg, Ṭs); it can also mean that at the moment of death one says to those one leaves behind, and die not except in submission (3:102; Ṭs). Elsewhere believers are commanded, Be patient, vie in patience (3:200). Exhorting to patience (cf. 90:17) can be interpreted as encouraging one another in maintaining religious practice in the face of difficulties and opposition (R). The exhortation to truth and patience can thus be seen as an exhortation paralleling that between belief in God and performing righteous deeds (Sh) and, by extension, between all that one must know (discerning truth from falsehood) and all that one must do (maintaining the practices and principles of religion, no matter the obstacles). In this sense, this verse reflects the manner in which righteous deeds are believed to arise from and are always conjoined with faith and belief in God. In a broader sense, the sūrah emphasizes the two virtues of clinging to the truth and being patient in a world that has been spiritually darkened in general and at times full of spiritual crisis for a human being in particular.

Al-Humazah is an early Makkan sūrah, most likely revealed after Sūrah 75, al-Qiyāmah. It takes its title from the condemnation of every slandering backbiter in the first line. It was reportedly revealed regarding a man by the name of al-Akhnas ibn Shurayq (Q, Z), who was known to slander people both to their faces and behind their backs. According to others it was revealed in relation to al-Walīd ibn al-Mughirah (Q, Ṭ, Z), one of the leaders of the Quraysh who was openly hostile toward the Prophet, slandering him to his face and in his absence. Others say that it is a general condemnation, not one revealed in relation to any specific person or instance (Ṭ), although it is permissible to view something revealed in relation to a specific instance as having a general application (Z). Like several other Quranic passages, the nine verses of this sūrah focus upon the torment that awaits one who spends the life of this world hoarding wealth.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Woe unto every slandering backbiter 2 who amasses wealth and tallies it, 3 supposing that his wealth makes him immortal. 4 Nay! He shall surely be cast into the crushing Fire. 5 And what shall apprise thee of the crushing Fire? 6 The Fire of God, ignited, 7 which engulfs hearts. 8 Truly it is enclosed upon them 9 in pillars outstretched.
Commentary

1 Woe unto every slandering backbiter

Woe translates wayl, which indicates that punishment or destruction will befall them (Sh), and is taken by some as the name of a valley in Hell (Ṭ), in which case the verse could be rendered, “[The valley of] Wayl is for every slandering backbiter” (see 2:79c). According to Mujāhid, humazah, here translated slandering, refers to harm done to others with one’s hands and eyes, while lumazah, here translated backbiter, refers to harm done with one’s tongue (IK). According to others, humazah indicates any form of calumny, while lumazah indicates verbal reproach and accusation (Ṭ). Yet others maintain the opposite, stating that lumazah literally means to eat the flesh of others (Ṭ; regarding backbiting, see 49:12). Despite the different interpretations, all point to the moral decrepitude of those who slander others whether in public or in private. It can also be taken as a more general rebuke to any who are more concerned with the faults of others than with their own (Aj).

2 who amasses wealth and tallies it,

3 supposing that his wealth makes him immortal.

2–3 For a similar statement see 70:18. The punishment for those who hoard is most vividly described in 9:34–35: [As for] those who hoard gold and silver and spend it not in the way of God, give them glad tidings of a painful punishment, on the Day when it will be heated in the Fire of Hell, and their foreheads, their sides, and their backs will be branded with it. “This is what you hoarded up for yourselves; so taste that which you hoarded.”

***

4 Nay! He shall surely be cast into the crushing Fire.
5 And what shall apprise thee of the crushing Fire?

6 The Fire of God, ignited,

4–6 The crushing Fire (al-ḥaṭamah) is one of the descriptive names of Hell indicating that it crushes everything that enters it. It derives from the verb ḥaṭama, meaning “to break, shatter, smash, or crush.”

7 which engulfs hearts.

7 Hearts translates af’idah, which is said to indicate the very center of the heart, the subllest faculty of the human being, which feels pain and suffering most severely (Z). This verse indicates both that the fire touches the very core of one’s being, thus consuming all that one is, and that it is more painful than any burning experienced in this world.

8 Truly it is enclosed upon them

9 in pillars outstretched.

8–9 These verses are taken by most as an allusion to the closing of the doors of Hell upon the disbelievers, as in 90:20: Upon them is a Fire enclosed. Enclosed translates mu’ṣadah, which can also mean “covered.” The pillars are the pillars of the Fire, similar to 18:29: Verily We have prepared for the wrongdoers a Fire whose canopies will encompass them (Qu). V. 9 could also be translated, “as pillars outstretched.”

Al-Fīl is an early Makkan sūrah believed to have been revealed after Sūrah 109, al-Kāfirūn. It takes its title from the discussion of the masters of the elephant, whose destruction it relates. It is said that Abrahah, an Abyssinian general who ruled Yemen, had built a church in Sanāʿ in order to divert pilgrims from the Kaʿbah in Makkah. But when the pilgrims did not abandon their worship at the Kaʿbah, Abrahah sent an army against Makkah in the year 570, the same year in which the Prophet Muhammad is believed to have been born. According to some, a few members of the Quraysh had either defiled or burned down Abrahah’s church. Along with the largest army that had ever been assembled in Arabia, Abrahah sent an elephant, which he intended to use to pull down the Kaʿbah. God, however, protected the Quraysh and the Kaʿbah by sending against them a swarm of birds that pelted them with stones.

Many interpret Sūrah 105 and 106 together as a warning to the Quraysh that they were not protected because of their status, as they were given to believe, but because God wished to protect the Kaʿbah and to make way for the coming of His final Messenger (IK). It is said that the Prophet Muhammad invoked the memory of this event during his conquest of Makkah, saying, “Verily, God restrained the elephant from Makkah and has given His Messenger and the believers authority over it. And He has returned its sanctity (ḥurmah) to

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Hast thou not seen how thy Lord dealt with the masters of the elephant? 2 Did He not make their scheming go astray, 3 and send against them birds in swarms, 4 pelting them with stones of baked clay, 5 such that He made them like devoured husks?
Commentary

1 Hast thou not seen how thy Lord dealt with the masters of the elephant?

2 Did He not make their scheming go astray,

1–2 Though elephant appears here in the singular, some say that Abrahah had eight or twelve elephants with his army (IK). According to the earliest histories, when commanded to approach Makkah, the elephant knelt and would not be moved, despite being beaten by the army. When turned in any other direction, it would rise and walk, but when turned toward Makkah, it would again kneel and refuse to move (IK; Ibn Ishāq). The linguistic structure of the verse indicates that the story was well known to the Arabs. They are thus being asked how it is that, knowing the story of how God protected the Kaʿbah, they do not derive the proper lessons from it and believe in God (Sh). That God made Abrahah’s scheming go astray alludes to the manner in which God allowed them to plan the entire expedition and carry it out to their own demise, since from a Quranic perspective God is the best of plotters (3:54; 8:30), and the scheming of the disbelievers is naught but astray (40:25).

3 and send against them birds in swarms,

4 pelting them with stones of baked clay,

3–4 Swarms here translates abābīl, which is interpreted to mean “in groups,” “in successive groups,” “many,” or “coming upon them from every direction” (IK, Ṭ). According to most authorities, God sent birds from the sea, such as swallows and herons, each carrying three stones the size of chickpeas or lentils, one in each claw and one in the beak (IK, Ṭ). Every soldier that was hit by one was destroyed, though not all met this fate. They did not die instantly. Some are said to have lingered for many days as they tried to make their way back to Yemen (IK). According to some, sijjīl, here translated stones of baked... clay, is a contraction of two Persian words, sang (sanj in Arabic), meaning “stones,” and jīl, meaning “clay” (IK).

5 such that He made them like devoured husks?

5 Devoured husks renders cāsfīn ma’skūl, which indicates the remains of leaves eaten by animals. The whole of the sūrah thus likens what was the greatest army known in the recent history of Arabia to one of the most insignificant of things known to the Arabs.

Quraysh is a Makkan sūrah that takes its name from the mention of the Prophet’s tribe in the first line. According to several commentators, Ubayy ibn Ka‘b’s manuscript of the Quran had al-Fīl and Quraysh together as one sūrah (Bg, Z). Ibn Ḥajar al-ʿAsqalānī (d. 852/1448) regards Ubayy ibn Ka‘b’s version as evidence that this is the proper reading (Fatḥ al-Bāriʾ). According to al-Zamakhsharī and al-Rāzī, ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb is said to have recited the two sūrah as one when leading prayer. Ibn Kathīr and others argue that, although the two are connected in meaning, they are to be considered separate sūrah.

The first two verses of this sūrah remind the Quraysh of the blessing they have received in God’s having preserved them and provided them with means for prosperity. Vv. 3–4 provide the central theme, that one should worship God, since all prosperity and protection come from Him.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

(1) For the secure passage of the Quraysh, (2) their secure passage in the journey of winter and of summer; (3) so let them worship the Lord of this house, (4) Who relieved them of hunger and made them safe from fear.
Commentary

1 For the secure passage of the Quraysh,

2 their secure passage in the journey of winter and of summer;

1–2 Reading this verse as a continuation of the previous sūrah, it can be understood as an allusion to God’s saving the Quraysh from the elephant of Abrahah (see the introduction to Sūrah 105). Secure passage translates ělāf, which comes from a root (ʾ-l-f) indicating that one is familiar with something or resorts to it habitually. It came to be connected with secure passage when ělāf and the related word ilf were used as names for the grants of security that the Quraysh reportedly received from the surrounding powers: Byzantium, Persia, Abyssinia, and Yemen. In the winter the Quraysh would travel to Yemen, where they purchased spices and other commodities coming from India. Then in the summer they carried these to Syria, where they sold them and purchased agricultural products. According to some this verse is an allusion to the respect the Quraysh received as keepers of the Ka‘bah, which compelled other tribes to grant them safe passage and thus contributed to their wealth (IK). In this vein, it is related to 29:67: Or have they not considered that We have made a secure sanctuary while people are snatched away all around them? Do they believe in that which is false? And are they ungrateful for God’s Blessing?

3 so let them worship the Lord of this house,

4 Who relieved them of hunger and made them safe from fear.

3–4 This house means the Ka‘bah. These verses implore the Quraysh to acknowledge that it is not through anything of their own doing or through the idols they worship that they have been made safe, but through Divine Protection alone. In the overall context of the Quran, these verses allude to the fate that will befall those who reject the Prophet Muhammad. The best example of this theme is 16:112–13: God sets forth a parable: a town secure and at peace, its provision coming unto it abundantly from every side. Yet, it was ungrateful for the blessings of God; so God let it taste the garment of hunger and fear for that which they had wrought. A messenger from among themselves had surely come unto them, but they denied him. And so the punishment seized them while they were wrongdoers (see also Abraham’s prayer in 2:126).

Small Kindnesses

al-Māʿūn

Most commentators maintain that al-Māʿūn is an early Makkan sūrah, most likely revealed after Sūrah 102, al-Takāthur, although some maintain that vv. 4–7 were revealed in Madinah. Given that all of its verses treat heedlessness and hypocrisy in the performance of religious obligations, including specifically prayer (vv. 4–5), the entire sūrah may be from the Madinan period, as it was not until political advantages could be gained by following the Prophet that hypocrisy became an issue for the early Muslim community (see commentary on 63:1–8). Nonetheless, hypocrisy in religion was not seen as limited to Muslims alone. The sūrah takes its name from the word māʿūn in the last verse, which in its widest sense indicates any act of kindness, charity, or assistance.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Hast thou seen the one who denies religion? 2 That is the one who drives away the orphan, 3 and does not urge feeding the indigent. 4 So woe unto the praying 5 who are heedless of their prayers, 6 those who strive to be seen, 7 yet refuse small kindnesses.
Commentary

1 Hast thou seen the one who denies religion?

2 That is the one who drives away the orphan,

1–2 There are two opinions regarding the referent of the one. Muqātil and al-Kalbī said, “This sūrah was revealed about al-ʿĀṣ ibn Wāʾil al-Sahmī” (W). Conversely, Ibn Jurayj said, “Abū Sufyān was in the habit of slaughtering two camels every week. On one occasion, an orphan came to him asking him for something. Abū Sufyān responded by hitting him with a stick. So God revealed, Hast thou seen the one who denies religion? That is the one who drives away the orphan” (R, W). Even if it was first recorded in reference to a specific individual, it still has a general implication. Religion here translates dīn, and denying religion implies denial of all aspects of the message that was sent through the Prophet. Dīn could also mean “judgment” and relate to the denial of the Resurrection and other events of the Afterlife. When vv. 2–7 are viewed in relation to v. 1, the implication is that denying dīn, whether it be religion or judgment, is the root of all other sins and transgressions (R).

Cf. v. 2 with 89:17–19. The accusation of driving away the orphan also alludes to the habit of devouring the inheritances of orphans that is addressed in 2:220; 4:2–3, 8–10, 127; 6:152.

3 and does not urge feeding the indigent.

3 Cf. 89:17–18; 69:34. If v. 2 can be seen as a reference to all that one who denies religion does in opposing the proper moral order, v. 3 can be seen as a reference to all that one does not do. This verse could also be rendered, “And does not encourage giving the food of the indigent,” implying that the food being withheld from the indigent is actually something to which the indigent have a right, for the believer is one in whose wealth is an acknowledged due for the beggar and the deprived (70:24–25; cf. 51:19). On the one hand, the present verse admonishes those who do not themselves feed the indigent. On the other, it admonishes those who implore others not to do so and who are therefore not only stingy with their own money, but encourage stinginess in others. This is related to 36:47, where those who do not wish to feed the needy offer a pseudo-theological excuse for not doing so, saying, Are we to feed those whom, if God willed, He would feed?

4 So woe unto the praying

5 who are heedless of their prayers,

4–5 For the possible meanings of woe (wayl), see 2:79c; 104:1c. These verses could be seen as a reference to the prayer of the disbelievers, about which another verse says, Their prayer at the House is naught but whistling and clapping. So taste the punishment for having disbelieved! (8:35). Nonetheless, the majority of commentators interpret them as a reference to those who, because of their heedlessness, receive no benefit from their prayers when they perform them and fear no retribution when they do not (Q) or to the hypocrites, who pray in public, but not in private (IK, T). These verses can also be taken to indicate those who fail to perform their prayers at the proper time or who do not complete the required bows and prostrations (IK, Q), or interpreted as applying to those who perform all of the prayers properly, but fail to do so with humility, contemplation, and remembrance of God. A ḥadīth states, “This is the prayer of the hypocrite. He sits watching the sun until it is between the two horns of Satan [i.e., just above the horizon]. Then he stands and pecks out four [prayer cycles] in which he remembers God but little” (IK). Regarding the implications of neglecting prayers, see 19:59c.

6 those who strive to be seen,

6 Those who strive to be seen are the hypocrites, of whom the Quran says, When they perform the prayer, they perform it idly and to be seen of men, and they remember God but little (4:142), which is to say that they do not perform prayer out of worship, but only to increase their reputation, as opposed to those who are constant in their prayers (70:23) and those who are mindful of their prayers (70:34). For the Quranic treatment of hypocrisy and dissimilitude, see 63:1–8.

7 yet refuse small kindnesses.

7 This verse is understood to indicate those who perform their devotions well but do not act kindly toward others (IK). Small kindnesses translates māʿūn in accord with a widespread interpretation that sees it as an allusion to utensils or tools that people would share and lend to one another, such as a pickax, a pot, a bucket, or other items of this nature (IK, Q, Ṭ). It can also be seen as an allusion to anything in which there is benefit (Q). Many take refuse small kindnesses to indicate refusal to pay the obligatory zakāh (Q, Ṭ); others say that māʿūn means property (māl) in general in the Qurayshī dialect (Q, Ṭ); and others say the verse means to refuse guests. According to all of these interpretations, the verse indicates the stinginess exhibited by hypocrites, who only come to the prayer lazily, and only spend reluctantly (9:54).

Most commentators maintain that al-Kawthar is an early Makkan sūrah, but some exegetes, such as Ibn Kathīr, take a report from Anas ibn Mālik that this verse was revealed “while the Messenger was among us in the Mosque” as an indication that it was revealed in Madinah at the Prophet’s Mosque. If this is an authentic report, then it is most likely from the Madinah period, as Anas ibn Mālik did not meet the Prophet until after the Prophet’s migration to Madinah. The shortest sūrah of the Quran, it takes its name from the mention of abundant good (kawthar) in the first verse, a reference to the blessings of Heaven that is subject to various interpretations.

According to al-Wāḥidī this sūrah was revealed in response to a specific incident: “Whenever the Messenger of God was mentioned, al-‘Āṣ ibn Wāʾil al-Sahmī would say, ‘Leave him be. He is just a man without posterity; he has no offspring [alluding to the fact that the Prophet’s son ʿAbd Allāh died as a child]. Were he to die, no one would mention him again, and you would be rid of him.’ And so God revealed from Truly We have bestowed abundant good upon thee to the end of the sūrah” (IK, W).

According to another account, Anas ibn Mālik said, “While we were with the Messenger of God in the Mosque, he dozed off into a slumber. Then he lifted his head, smiling. We said, ‘O Messenger of God! What has caused you to laugh?’ He replied, ‘Verily, a sūrah was revealed unto me.’” Then he recited the sūrah and said, “Do you know what Kawthar is? It is a river that my Lord has promised me, and it has abundant goodness. It is a pool to which my community (ummah) will be brought on the Day of Judgment. Its containers are as numerous as the stars in the sky” (IK, Q).

Commentary

 Truly We have bestowed abundant good upon thee.

1 Abundant good translates kawthar, which derives from kathīr, meaning “much,” “abundant,” or “copious”; it is used to indicate something that is abundant in number, measure, weight, or quality, and there are at least sixteen different opinions regarding its meaning in this context (Q). The most widespread opinions regard it as a proper name referring to a river or pool in the Garden. Some Muslims will thus use the phrase “sitting by Kawthar” as a reference to being in Paradise. Other opinions relate abundant good to the gift of prophecy, the Quran (Q, Tṣ), or various aspects of Islam, such as the daily prayers, the two testimonies (shahādatayn), “There is no god but God, and Muhammad is the Messenger of God,” or the light within the breast that guides one to religion (Q). Some commentators take abundant good as a reference to the abundance of the Prophet’s progeny (Tṣ). The association with a river in Paradise finds the strongest support in the Ḥadīth literature (Q). In a widespread account, Anas ibn Mālik said, “When the Prophet was made to ascend to the heavens, he said [after his return], ‘I came upon a river the banks of which were made of tents of hollow pearls. I asked Gabriel, ‘What is this river?’ He replied, ‘This is Kawthar’ ” (IK). According to another account, “Kawthar is a river in the Garden whose banks are of gold, and it flows over pearls and rubies. Its scent is finer than musk, and its water is sweeter than honey and whiter than milk” (IK, Q). Another account joins the river to the other gifts bestowed upon the Prophet. It is related that Abū Bishr mentioned, “Saʿīd ibn Jubayr said that Ibn ‘Abbās said regarding Kawthar, ‘That is the good that God has bestowed upon His Messenger.’ I said to Saʿīd ibn Jubayr, ‘But the people claim that it is a river in the Garden.’ Saʿīd said, ‘The river in the Garden is part of the good that God has bestowed upon His Messenger’” (IK; for references to the river or pool in the Hadīth literature, see the introduction to the sūrah). Al-Ṭabarṣī notes that all these sayings are particular aspects of the whole, which is the abundant good in the two abodes: Heaven and this world.

2 So pray to thy Lord and sacrifice.

2 Most interpret so pray as a command to perform the obligatory prayers (Q). As it is connected to the command to sacrifice, others say it indicates the prayer of the Feast of Sacrifice (‘īd al-adhā), which is part of the rites of the ḥajj and comes at its end (Q). In accordance with this verse and a well-known hadīth, most maintain that the prayer must precede the sacrifice in order for the sacrifice to be accepted (IA, Q). And sacrifice translates waʾnḥar, which could also mean, “and raise your hands.” In this interpretation it is taken as a reference to the practice of raising the hands to the ears during prayer (Ṭs). All schools of law agree that this should be done at the opening of the canonical prayer while saying, “God is greatest” (Allāhu akbar), marking the entry into the sacred rite. According to the Mālikī and Ḥanafī schools of law, the hands should only be raised in this fashion at the opening of the prayer (IA, Q); some other schools maintain that it should be done at the opening, when bowing, and when prostrating (Q).

3 Truly thine enemy shall be the one without posterity.

3 The one without posterity translates abtar, which can be used to refer to anything whose effects do not produce any good (Q, Ṭ). Abtar was used by Arabs to refer to one whose sons had died, but who still had daughters (Q). At the time at which this sūrah was most likely revealed, the Prophet had sired two sons, Qāsim and ʿAbd Allāh, both of whom died while toddlers. He later had a third son, Ibrāhīm, who also died as a toddler. It is reported that whenever the Prophet was mentioned in the presence of al-ʿĀṣ ibn Wāʾil, he would say, “Leave him, for indeed he is a man who is cut off, having no descendants. So when he dies, he will not be remembered.” So God revealed this sūrah in response (IK, Ṭ). A less accepted account of the revelation reads abtar as a reference to being “cut off” from one’s tribe. According to Ibn ʿAbbās, Kaʿb ibn Ashraf, the leader of one of the Jewish tribes of Madinah, came to Makkah and the Quraysh said to him, “You are the leader of the people. What do you think about this worthless man who is cut off (abtar) from his people? He claims that he is better than us, while we are the people of the sanctuary, the people of custodianship over the Ka‘bah, and the people who supply water to the pilgrims.” And Ka‘b replied, “You are better than him.” So God revealed this sūrah in response (IK, Q); for other verses connected to this incident, see 4:51–52 and commentary. In either interpretation, it indicates the importance of loving the Prophet and the dire consequences of hating him as well as the idea that true posterity or legacy lies in belief and deeds, not children, for the Day of Judgment is the Day when neither wealth nor children avail, save for him who comes to God with a sound heart (26:88–89).

Al-Kāfirūn is an early Makkan sūrah believed to have been revealed shortly after Sūrah 107, al-Māʿūn. It takes its name from the fact that the whole of the sūrah is presented as a direct address to the disbelievers. It is said to have been revealed in response to a proposal from the leaders of Makkah, who approached the Prophet and said, “Muhammad, come let us worship what you worship, and you worship what we worship. We will come together in this matter. If what you worship is better than what we worship, we shall take a share of it, and if what we worship is better than what you worship, you shall take a share of it.” He replied, “God forbid that I associate anything with Him,” and so God revealed from Say, “O disbelievers!” up to the end of the sūrah. The Prophet then went to the Sacred Sanctuary, which was full of people, and recited to them the sūrah. It was at that point that they despaired of leading him away from his religion (Q).

Many ḥādīth claim that it is “one-fourth of the Quran” (IK, Q, Sy) and that the Prophet would often recite this sūrah along with Sūrah 112, al-Ikhlāṣ, in his supererogatory prayers before the obligatory morning prayer and after the obligatory sunset prayer (IK, Sy).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful
1) Say, “O disbelievers! 2) I worship not what you worship; 3) nor are you worshippers of what I worship; 4) nor am I a worshipper of what you worship; 5) nor are you worshippers of what I worship. 6) Unto you your religion, and unto me my religion.”
Commentary

1 Say, “O disbelievers!

Though the circumstances of revelation indicate that disbelievers refers specifically to the leaders of the Quraysh (see the introduction to the sūrah), it can also be understood as applying to all disbelievers (IK).

2 I worship not what you worship;

3 nor are you worshippers of what I worship;

4 nor am I a worshipper of what you worship;

5 nor are you worshippers of what I worship.

2–5 According to some, the repetition in these verses is for emphasis (Q). Others say that the repetition serves to negate the repeated propositions from the leaders of the Quraysh that the Prophet mix his religion with theirs (Q; see also 39:64c). Another opinion is that the different statements refer to the present and the future, as if to say, “I do not now worship what you worship; nor are you now worshippers of what I worship; nor will I ever be a worshipper of what you worship; nor will you ever be worshippers of what I worship.” Still others say, Nor am I a worshipper of what you worship negates the past (Q), meaning, “Nor have I ever worshipped what you worship.”

6 Unto you your religion, and unto me my religion.”

6 This verse is similar to 28:55, which says of the believers, And when they hear idle talk, they turn away therefrom and say, “Unto us our deeds, and unto you your deeds. Peace be upon you! We do not seek out the ignorant” (cf.
10:41). On the one hand, this verse is a criticism, but on the other, it implies that believers should not argue with disbelievers, but simply leave them to their own devices, for God will deal with them accordingly. Thus in 68:44–45 God commands the believers: So leave Me with those who deny this discourse. We shall lead them on little by little, whence they know not. And I shall grant them respite; truly My scheme is firm; and in 86:17: So be gentle with the disbelievers; grant them respite for a while.

According to some this verse was abrogated by the Sword Verse (Q), which commands, Slay the idolaters wheresoever you find them, capture them, besiege them, and lie in wait for them at every place of ambush. But if they repent, and perform the prayer and give the alms, then let them go their way (9:5). Others say the entire sūrah was abrogated. Still others say that the verse is not abrogated, because it is only a report (khabar), not a command (Q), and according to most scholars abrogation only applies to commands. But the two verses are not necessarily contradictory: the Sword Verse may be considered to deal with a political question, whereas this sūrah addresses a theological question.

Religion can be taken either to mean the religion of Islam with all of its rites and creeds or to imply, “You shall have the reward of your religion, and I shall have the reward of my religion” (Ts), indicating that the end of each will not be the same. Insofar as dīn, here translated religion, can also mean “judgment,” this verse can also indicate, “You will have your judgment, and I shall have mine.”

The majority of exegetes agree that al-Naṣr is a late Madinan sūrah. It is most likely the last sūrah to have been revealed in its entirety, although a few verses from al-Baqarah (Sūrah 2), *al-Nisāʾ (Sūrah 4), al-Tawbah (Sūrah 9), and perhaps al-Māʾidah (Sūrah 5) are believed to have been revealed after it. Some maintain that this sūrah was revealed at the plain of Minā, which lies between Mt. Ṭā'āruf and Makkah, on the tenth of Dhu’l-Ḥijjah, during the Prophet’s Farewell Pilgrimage (Āl), the day after 5:3 had been revealed, while others argue that it was revealed just before 5:3 (Q). Still others maintain that it was revealed in Madinah after the Prophet had returned from the Farewell Pilgrimage. The majority of those who maintain that it was revealed in Madinah and those who maintain that it was revealed during the Farewell Pilgrimage agree that 2:281 was revealed after it; some say that 4:176 and 9:128 were revealed in the interval between al-Naṣr and 2:281, while others maintain that only 2:281 was revealed after al-Naṣr (Q).

A minority maintain that this sūrah was revealed after the Treaty of Ḥudaybiyah in 6/628 (Ṭb). According to al-Wāḥidī, it was revealed when the Prophet left for the Battle of Ḥunayn in 8/630. The Prophet lived for only two years after this battle. Ibn ʿAbbās is reported to have said, “When the Messenger of God returned from the battle of Ḥunayn and God revealed
When God’s Help and Victory come, he said, ‘O Ṭālib! O Fātimah! God’s Help and Victory have come. I have seen people entering the religion of God in throngs. I therefore hymn the praises of my Lord and seek forgiveness of Him, for He is Ever Relenting.’” According to Ibn ʿAbbās, through this surah the Prophet was informed that his death was near. For this reason, Ibn Masʿūd has said that it is called “The Farewell Sūrah” (Āl).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 When God’s Help and Victory come 2 and you see mankind entering God’s religion in throngs, 3 hymn the praise of thy Lord, and seek forgiveness from Him. Truly He is Ever Relenting.
Commentary

1 When God’s Help and Victory come

1 Many commentators read this verse in the past tense, in which case Victory is taken as an allusion to the conquest of Makkah in 8/630 (Āl, Q, Qu, Ṭ; which some Muslims believe was foreshadowed in Deuteronomy 33:2 and Song of Solomon 5:10). Others read it as an allusion to the Treaty of Ḥudaybiyah in 6/628 (see the introduction to Sūrah 48; Āl). When read in the future tense, this verse is seen by many as an allusion to the conquests by which Islam spread beyond the borders of Arabia after the death of the Prophet (Āl, Q). It also has a continuous meaning, as attaining Paradise is the final victory. In this vein, al-Baqī writes, “The Victory (fatḥ) is the opening (infitāḥ) of the doors of arrival and the unveiling of the lights of Beauty and Majesty.”

2 and you see mankind entering God’s religion in throngs,

2 Some say that mankind indicates the Arabs in general; others say it indicates a large group from Yemen who had recently accepted Islam (Āl). When the sūrah is taken as a reference to the conquest of Makkah, it denotes the many tribes that had been reluctant to enter Islam as long as the Prophet’s own city remained beyond his dominion. Then when it was conquered, this final obstacle was removed and they entered Islam in throngs. Before the conquest, people had entered one or two at a time, sometimes a few more, but afterwards tribes from all regions of Arabia entered en masse (Sh).

3 hymn the praise of thy Lord, and seek forgiveness from Him. Truly He is Ever Relenting.

3 According to some, the meaning of hymn the praise in this verse is “pray” (Q). This may follow from the fact that Muslims, following the wont of the Prophet, recite various formulas of praise and glory during both the bowing and the prostrations of prayer, formulas such as “Glory be to Thee, O God, our Lord, and praise unto Thee, our Lord. O God, forgive me” (Q). In general, the verb sabbaḥa, translated throughout as glorify or glorifies (e.g., 57:1; 59:1; 61:1; 62:1), when combined with ḥamd (“praise”) as hymn the praise (lit. “glorify the praise”; cf. 15:98; 20:130; 32:15; 40:7, 55; 42:5; 50:39; 52:48), indicates the recognition that God is beyond all that anyone can attribute to Him (see 57:1c). The Divine Name “the Relenting” is also coupled with the Merciful in several verses (see 2:37, 54, 128, 160; 4:16, 64; 9:104, 118; 49:12). God is portrayed as relenting unto human beings throughout human history, beginning with Adam and Eve (see 2:37c), and every revelation can be seen as a form of God’s relenting. The word for human repentance and for Divine relenting are the same in Arabic (tawbah; verbal form tāba/yatūbu). It thus represents a subtle reciprocity between Divine action and human action, as in 5:39: But whosoever repents (tāba) after his wrongdoing, and makes amends, God will relent (yatūbu) unto him. Though human beings can play some role in seeking their own forgiveness, ultimately it is God Who must first turn to human beings, as in 9:118: Then He relented unto them, that they might repent; see 2:37c and the essay “Translating the Quran.”

Al-Masad is believed to be among the earliest Makkan sūrahs. It takes its name from the last word, which is said to refer to a specific form of punishment in Hell (see 111:5c). It is also known as al-Lahab, meaning “The Flame” (IK). It is said to have been revealed in response to the Prophet’s uncle ʿAbd al-ʿUzzah ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, known by the nickname Abū Lahab, “The Father of Flame,” because of his bright red complexion. One day the Prophet climbed one of the hills just outside of Makkah and yelled, “Come to me!” the way one would call if an enemy were approaching. All the Quraysh gathered around and said, “What ails you?” He replied, “Were I to tell you that the enemy is going to attack you in the morning or in the evening, would you not believe me?” They said, “Yes, for we have not found you telling anything other than the truth.” He said, “In that case, I am a warner sent to you against a tremendous punishment.” Abū Lahab responded, “May your hands perish all this day. Is this why you have summoned all of us here?” Then God revealed the five verses of this sūrah (IK).

Many say this revelation occurred immediately after the revelation of 26:214: And warn thy tribe, thy nearest kin. The five short verses all describe the form of punishment that Abū Lahab and his wife suffer in Hell.

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful
May the hands of Abū Lahab perish, and may he perish! His wealth avails him not, nor what he has earned. He shall enter a blazing Fire. And his wife, carrier of firewood, upon her neck is a rope of palm fiber.
Commentary

1 May the hands of Abū Lahab perish, and may he perish!

Abū Lahab was the wealthiest of the Prophet’s uncles and one of the Qurayshī leaders who most opposed the Prophet and persecuted his followers. “May [his] hands perish” is an idiomatic expression meaning, “May his power perish and all that he possesses.” Abū Lahab did not go forth to the Battle of Badr, but is reported to have died soon thereafter from a festering wound inflicted by his sister-in-law Umm al-Faḍl in retaliation for his abuse of one of her slaves who had become Muslim.

2 His wealth avails him not, nor what he has earned.

What he has earned, or “what he has committed,” is interpreted by many to mean his children (IK, Q, Ṭ). This verse is said to be a response to Abū Lahab’s remark, “Even if what my nephew says is true, I will ransom myself . . . with my wealth and my children” (IK).

3 He shall enter a blazing Fire.

And his wife, carrier of firewood,

3–4 Abū Lahab’s wife, Umm Jamīl bint Ḥarb, was said to support fully his position and to have mocked the Prophet when he was ill and unable to offer supererogatory prayers, saying, “O Muhammad! I think that your satan has forsaken you” (see the introduction to Sūrah 93). Therefore, just as she aided him in defying God’s Messenger, part of her punishment is to aid him in Hell, carrying the firewood that will feed the flames of his punishment. As she was among the leading women of the Umayyad clan, to carry firewood would also imply that she was now doing the work of those in a lower station. In a variant reading, v. 4 can be read, “And his wife is a carrier of firewood,” or “is carrying firewood.”

5 upon her neck is a rope of palm fiber.

5 The palm fiber indicates a rope of palm fiber that has been put upon her neck in Hell and set aflame. This is said to be in retribution for her vow to sell a precious necklace in order to spend the proceeds on a campaign against the Prophet. Others say that it refers to an iron chain or heavy iron necklace that will be placed upon her neck in Hell.

Most commentators say that al-Ikhlāṣ is from the early Makkan period, although some allow that it may be from the Madinan period (Āl, Ţs, Z). This is one of only two sūrah that do not take its name from something mentioned within it. The title, al-Ikhlāṣ, instead describes its content, as it denotes a combination of sincerity, devotion, and purity and can also indicate being saved (khalaṣa).

This sūrah has been known by at least twenty different epithets (R), among them “The Absolver” (al-Barāʾah), because anyone who recites it with sincerity is absolved of the practice of idolatry (Āl, R); “The One That Casts Away” (al-Munaffirah), because it casts Satan away from one who recites it (Āl, R); “Deliverance” (al-Najāh), because it delivers one from ascribing likeness (tashbīḥ) unto God (Āl, R); “Recognition” (al-Maʿrifah), because true knowledge of God can only be obtained by recognizing the truth of what this sūrah contains (Āl); “The Reminder” (al-Mudhakkirah), because it reminds one of Divine Unity (tawḥīd) in a pure and simple form (Āl); and “The Light of the Quran” (Nūr al-Qurʿān), because of a ḥadīth that says, “Everything has a light, and the light of the Quran is Sūrat al-Ikhlāṣ” (Āl, R).

Regarding the occasion of revelation, Ubayy ibn Ka'b relates that the idolaters asked the Prophet, “What is the lineage of your Lord?” and so God revealed this sūrah, which begins, Say, “He, God, is One, God, the Eternally Sufficient unto Himself.” The Eternally Sufficient unto Himself is He Who begets not; nor was He begotten, for anyone who is begotten will certainly die, and it is only for those who die that one can speak of a lineage. According to other accounts, this sūrah was revealed in response to a group of Jews who asked the Prophet for “the lineage of His Lord” (R, Ṭ, Ṭs). A third perspective says that it was revealed in relation to a similar question posed by a group of Christians (R).

A ḥadīth qudsī echoes the words of vv. 2–4 of the sūrah: “God said, ‘The son of Adam tells a lie against Me, though he has not the right to do so. He abuses me, though he has not the right to do so. As for his telling a lie against Me, it is his saying that I will not re-create him as I created him for the first time. In fact, the first creation was no easier for Me than a new creation. As for his abusing Me, it is his saying that God has begotten children, while I am the One, the Eternally Sufficient unto Himself; I beget not, nor was I begotten, and none is like unto Me.’”

According to many early authorities, the Prophet said that this sūrah is “equivalent to one-third of the whole Quran” (Āl, IK, Q, R, Ṭs), which is understood by some to mean that the message regarding the Oneness of God is one-third of the Quran’s message. It has been reported on the authority of the Prophet’s wife ṢĀ‘īshah that the Prophet would recite al-Ikhlāṣ and the two immediately following it, al-Falaq and al-Nās, together while breathing into his palms, and then rub them over himself every night. The three together are thus understood to provide protection.

This sūrah is second only to Sūrah 1, al-Fātiḥah, in Muslim devotional life and is often recited in both canonical and supererogatory prayers as well as supplications (duʿāʾ). According to some, it is closely connected to Sūrah 109, al-Kāfirūn, as the two together are said to constitute the complete expression of Divine Unity: al-Kāfirūn provides a firm denial of all falsehood, and al-Ikhlāṣ provides a complete affirmation of all truth (Āl). Thus the two sūrahs are known together as “The Two Cures” (al-Muqashqishatān) and are often recited together, especially in the two cycles of the morning prayer (fajr), the morning supererogatory prayer (ḍuḥā), and the supererogatory prayer after the sunset prayer (Āl). Al-Ikhlāṣ is also usually the first sūrah that one memorizes after the Fātiḥah. In summarizing the merits and the centrality of this sūrah, al-Rāzī writes, “The entire Quran is an oyster, and the pearl is His statement Say, ‘He, God, is One.’”

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

１Say, “He, God, is One, ２God, the Eternally Sufficient unto Himself. ３He begets not; nor was He begotten. ４And none is like unto Him.”
Commentary

1 Say, “He, God, is One,

Some of the Companions of the Prophet are said to have read this sūrah without reciting Say (qul) at the beginning. While most retain it, those who omit it argue that it is not possible for the Prophet to have been unaware of God’s Oneness; thus he would not have needed to be instructed in this fashion (Āl, R). This verse can also be read, “Say, ‘He is God, One.’” Many commentators distinguish between the meaning of aḥad (“One”), which is used in this verse, and wāḥid (“One”), which is known as one of the Divine Names, as in the One, the Paramount (12:39; 13:16; 14:48; 38:65; 39:4; 40:16), and which some early Muslims are said to have recited in this verse rather than aḥad (Ṭ, Z). The most widely held interpretation is that wāḥid is a numerical one to which another number can be added, while aḥad denotes an Absolute Oneness that is unique and cannot take a second or be divided (Ṭs). Some view aḥad and wāḥid as synonyms (Āl, R). Others say that aḥad indicates negation, as when one says mā ra’aytu aḥad (“I did not see anyone”), while wāḥid indicates affirmation, as when one says ra’aytu rajul wāḥid (“I saw one man”; R, Ṭs). Both names denote oneness, but whereas aḥad conveys an “internal oneness,” something that is one unto itself, wāḥid conveys an “external oneness,” something that is one in relation to others. Aḥad is thus seen by many as conveying a higher degree of Divine Oneness without any consideration of its relation to the multiplicity of creation, while wāḥid is seen as conveying the Oneness of the Divine Being in relation to the multiplicity of Divine Attributes and of creation (K).

As Muslims meditated upon the relationship between the One God and the multiplicity of creation that God brings forth, the opening words of this sūrah came to be employed to identify different aspects of Divine Oneness. According to some commentators, He (huwa) designates God in and of Himself, the undifferentiated Divine Self or Essence (Kā, R). Huwa would thus be the greatest Name of God (al-ism al-aʿẓam; Ṭs), and one of the most effective formulas for calling upon Divine aid would be yā huwa yā man lā huwa illā huwa, “O He. O the One other than Whom there is no He” (Ṭs), or “O He. O the One Who is He, other than Whom there is no god” (Āl). For al-Rāzī huwa indicates a degree of Divinity above that designated by the Name Allāh, when Allāh is understood to indicate God in relation to the multiplicity that the Divine Essence or Self brings forth. For others, huwa indicates the Essence qua Essence beyond consideration of Its Attributes, and Allāh indicates “the Essence with the totality of the Attributes” (K). This, however, is not a difference in degree of Divinity, but in inner dimensions. According to al-Rāzī, Allāh can also be seen as conveying the totality of positive Divine Attributes (e.g., Creator, Knewer, Powerful), and aḥad can be seen as conveying the totality of negative Divine Attributes (e.g., without body, substance, or accident); the two together, Allāh aḥad (“God, One”), thus communicate the complete understanding of God. In this context, the Name Allāh is sometimes referred to as the “Gathering Name” (al-ism al-jāmiʿ), because all of the other Divine Names and Attributes are in principle gathered within it.

God, the Eternally Sufficient unto Himself.

2 Eternally Sufficient unto Himself translates the Divine Name al-Ṣamad, which occurs in the Quran only this once and is applied only to God. Its lexical, nontheological meaning indicates something solid and impenetrable or simply “not hollow” (AḤ, Q, R, Ṭ). In this regard, some take al-Ṣamad to indicate something that is beyond all comprehension (My). Theologically al-Ṣamad is interpreted by some as an allusion to the Primary or Initial Cause of all things, an eternally self-sufficient independent Being Who continues to exist after His creation has ceased to exist, “the One Who has always been and will always be” (Ṭs). According to al-Zamakhsharī, in this context, “Al-Ṣamad is a verb taking the meaning of the passive participle, the One to Whom one betakes oneself (man ʿumida ilayhi) when one seeks Him (idhā qaṣadahu). And He is the Master Who is Sought (al-sayyid al-maṣmūd) in [all] needs. The meaning then is, ‘He is God of Whom you are aware and Whom you affirm as the Creator of the heavens and of the earth, and as your Creator. And He is the One (al-Wāḥid) unified in Divinity, in which none shares. And He is the One Whom all that is created seeks (yaʿsamadu); none are independent of Him, though He is independent of them.’” The enigmatic nature of al-Ṣamad has led to many interpretations, most of which are different formulations confirming that God is the Master and ontological Source of all things and that all things are dependent upon Him, while He is independent of all things.

3 He begets not; nor was He begotten.

3 This verse was read by some as two verses (Āl, Ṭs). It denies categorically any form of Divine progeny and is thus seen by the vast majority of Muslims as repudiating any and all such claims. Although this verse is interpreted as denying that Jesus is the “Son of God” (see 4:171; 9:30; 19:35, 91–92), it should be noted that the Christian notion of sonship is not the same as that held by the pagan Arabs, who are criticized in other verses for ascribing offspring to God (usually daughters), as in 16:57: And they assign unto God daughters (see also 6:100; 43:16). Attempts to link this verse to discussions of Christianity are thus somewhat tenuous, and it is best understood in relation to the possible occasions of revelation mentioned in the sūrah introduction and to the Quranic critique of the pagan Arab notions of Divine procreation, as in 37:149–53: So ask them, does your Lord have daughters while they have sons? Or did We create the angels female, while they were witnesses? Behold! It is of their own perversion that they say, “God has begotten,” while truly they are liars. Has He chosen daughters over sons? (see also 39:2–3; 52:39). Such notions are distinct from the Christian understanding of Divine sonship in that the meaning of “son” in the phrase “Son of God” employed in the Christian creed is very different from the meaning of “son” in the Quran. For Christianity, the term “Son of God” refers to Jesus as the pretemporal, uncreated Word of God that is begotten of the Father before time. For the pagan Arabs, however, the progeny of God had a distinctly temporal and physical connotation; see 4:171c.

4 And none is like unto Him.”

4 This verse underscores the previous verses by emphasizing that God is not only One, but also unique. As created things can be described by attributes such as living, seeing, and hearing, by which God is also described, the meaning here is that nothing bears any likeness or equality with God’s Essence or Self (Aj, Sh), as in 42:11: Naught is like unto Him. Nonetheless, nothing can exist independently of God. With regard to the Divine Essence, God is absolutely transcendent, for all things perish, save His Face (28:88). Yet with regard to the manner in which God manifests in the world (see 57:4c), He is immanent, for wheresoever you turn, there is the Face of God (2:115); for the manner in which God is both near and far, similar and dissimilar, or transcendent and immanent, see 2:115c; 24:35c; 41:53c; 50:16c. According to Mujāhid, this verse means that God does not have a spouse (IK), as in 6:100–101: They make the jinn partners with God, though He created them, and falsely attribute sons and daughters to Him, without any knowledge. . . . How should He have a child when He has no consort, and He created all things? (see also 16:57; 43:16). It is also taken as a refutation of the pre-Islamic Arabs, who had ascribed jinn as partners to God, as in 37:158: They have made kinship between Him and the jinn—yet the jinn know that they will surely be arraigned.

Most commentators believe that Sūrah 113 and 114 were revealed during the Makkah period, although some believe that they were revealed in Madinah (IK, R); still others leave the question open due to lack of conclusive evidence (Bḍ, Bg, Z). Al-Falaq takes its name from the daybreak, by which the Prophet is told to swear in the first verse.

Among those who maintain that Sūrah 113 and 114 are Makkah, many say they were revealed in relation to an incident in which the Prophet was stricken with an illness as a result of a spell put upon him by a sorceress, a practitioner of black magic. The Archangel Gabriel is said to have told him the location of a knotted string upon which the sorceress had whispered her spell and then revealed these two sūrah as a means of undoing the spell. The Prophet sent ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib to obtain the string and whisper over it these fourteen verses, which would undo the fourteen-knot spell (Q). Together, the two sūrah are known as al-Muʿawwidhatān, “The Two Protectors,” and are used by Muslims to this day for protection from many evils, including the evil eye and the casting of spells.

According to the early accounts, there was some debate among the Companions of the Prophet as to whether these sūrah were part of the Quran or were a special supplication that the Prophet had been given by God apart from the Quran. Regarding this opinion Zirr ibn Hubaysh said, “I asked Ubayy ibn Kaʻb, ‘O Abū al-Mundhir! Your brother Ibn Masʿūd said so-and-so [i.e., “The Two Protectors”] do not belong to the Quran.’ Ubayy said, ‘I asked God’s Messenger about them, and he said, “They have been revealed to me, and I have recited them [as a part of the Quran].”’ Then Ubayy added, ‘So we say [of these verses] what God’s Messenger has said.’”

1 Say, “I seek refuge in the Lord of the daybreak 2 from the evil of what He has created, 3 from the evil of darkness when it enshrouds, 4 from the evil of those who blow upon knots, 5 and from the evil of the envier when he envies.”
Commentary

1 Say, “I seek refuge in the Lord of the daybreak

   1 Daybreak translates falaq, which indicates “the light of dawn” or “the rising dawn” (Sh). The root verb falaqa means “to cleave.” In this context it indicates the manner in which the night appears to be cleaved from the day (Sh). Hence God is described as the Cleaver of the dawn in 6:96. Falaq can also be used metaphorically to indicate “the emergence of truth after uncertainty” (Tāj al-ʿarūs). Hence this verse can be read as indicating that God is the source of all true understanding, such that to seek refuge in Him is to seek refuge in truth from falsehood, as in 17:81: Truth has come, and falsehood has vanished. Truly falsehood is ever vanishing. For a discussion of the Quranic symbolism of light, see 24:35c. Falaq is also taken by some as a name of Hell, a prison in Hell, or one of the trees or mountains in the Fire (Q, Sh, Ṭ).

2 from the evil of what He has created,

   2 This verse can be understood as a reference to Satan and his ilk or to Hellfire; it may also be a general reference to all that is evil (Q) or to all the evil that is committed or manifested by those whom God has created (Z). It can also be understood as a reference to creation itself, which acts as a veil that both hides the Creator and reveals His Qualities and Attributes.

3 from the evil of darkness when it enshrouds,

   3 Most interpret this verse as a reference to the darkening of the night, but some take the verb waqaba, here translated enshrouds, as a reference to the cooling of the night (Q). In both interpretations, refuge is sought because it is the time when those inclined to evil spread mischief and corruption, as in 4:81 and 4:108, which speak of those who conspire by night (Q). In the present verse, darkness translates ghāsiq, which is also interpreted as a reference to the moon, based upon a ḥadīth in which the Prophet looked to the moon and said to his wife, “O Āʾishah, seek refuge in God from this, for this is al-ghāsiq when it sets (waqaba)” (Q). A minority say that the verse refers to “the Pleiades when it sets,” because of the disease and pestilence believed to become prevalent during the period when this luminous star cluster declines (Q).

4 from the evil of those who blow upon knots,

4 Those who blow upon knots (naffathāt) refers specifically to those engaged in the practice of tying knots in a string and whispering incantations over them (see the introduction to the sūrah), but can also be taken to indicate all those who engage in black magic. Though the noun is in the feminine plural, it is not necessarily limited to women, but may indicate human beings in general (R, Z). In this sense it could be understood as a reference to general evil as practiced in this specific case by the women who blow on knots.

5 and from the evil of the envier when he envies.”

5 According to some, the refuge sought in this verse is freedom from the effects of envy. In this vein, the Umayyad Caliph ʿUmar ibn ʿAbd al-Azīz (r. 717–20) is reported to have said, “I cannot think of any wrongdoer more likely to be wronged than one who envies another” (Z). From one perspective, envy is the root of all evils, as the first sin to be committed in the celestial realm was Satan’s envy of Adam (see 2:34–36; 7:11–13) and the first sin to be committed on earth was Cain’s envy of Abel (see 5:27–31; Q). It is thus said that those who envy the favor bestowed upon others oppose the blessings of God (Q).

Mankind

al-Nās

For some issues relating to al-Nās, see the introduction to Sūrah 113. Like the previous sūrah, this sūrah takes its name from what the Prophet is told to swear by in the first verse, in this case mankind. Together these two sūrah are known as al-Mu‘āwwidhatān, “The Two Protectors,” since their recitation together is thought to provide protection from all manner of evil and misfortune. Regarding the exalted status of the two sūrah, the Prophet said, “God has sent verses down upon me of which none has seen their like: Say, ‘I seek refuge in the Lord of the daybreak’ to the end of the sūrah and, Say, ‘I seek refuge in the Lord of mankind’ to the end of the sūrah” (Q).

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful

1 Say, “I seek refuge in the Lord of mankind, 2 the King of mankind, 3 the God of mankind, 4 from the evil of the stealthy whisperer, 5 who whispers into the breasts of mankind, 6 from jinn and mankind.”
Commentary

1. Say, “I seek refuge in the Lord of mankind,
2. the King of mankind,
3. the God of mankind,

1–3 These three verses are seen as an indication that, in order to find true refuge from Satan, people must recognize the complete sovereignty of God, that He is the only One to be worshipped and the only One upon Whom they can call for help, unlike those who take others as lords apart from God (9:31; Sh). From a Quranic perspective, it is by forgetting that God is the Lord, King or Sovereign, and God of mankind that human beings arrogate self-sufficiency to themselves, as when Pharaoh declares, I am your lord most high (79:24), Is not the sovereignty of Egypt mine (43:51), and I know of no god for you other than myself (28:38). Thus it is as if human beings are here being ordered to seek refuge from the illusion of self-sufficiency that is the root of all sin through acknowledging their complete dependence on God by saying, “Oh my Lord! Oh my King! Oh my God!” (R).

4 from the evil of the stealthy whisperer,

4 Satan is here described as the stealthy whisperer because he withdraws from the heart whenever one remembers God and whispers to it whenever one is heedless of God (Bg, R, Sh). Technically whispering (waswasah) refers to something said quietly and repeatedly. Here it is taken to indicate all manner of temptation. The first sin of Adam and Eve was to listen to the whispers of Satan (7:20). Elsewhere Satan is described as the Deluder (31:33; 35:5); he seduces (47:25), causes people to forget (6:68; 12:42; 18:63; 58:19) or to slip (3:155), makes what is evil seem fair (6:43; 8:48; 16:63; 27:24; 29:38), desires to lead astray (4:60), and incites to evil (12:100). He is thus described in many verses as a manifest enemy (e.g., 2:168, 208; 6:142; 7:22; 12:5; 17:53).
5 who whispers into the breasts of mankind,

5 Here it is Satan who whispers into the breasts of mankind, but elsewhere it is the soul that is described as whispering (50:16), prompting to evil (5:30; 20:96), and seducing (12:18). However, the reference here is not to the soul as such, but to the passionate soul, or the soul that commands to evil (al-nafs al-‘ammārah bi-l-suʾ; 12:53), regarding which a famous hadīth says, “Truly Satan flows in the blood of the son of Adam” (Q). From one perspective, it is Satan who suggests, tempts, prompts, and whispers, and the passionate soul then follows the caprices that arise rather than the commands of God. From another perspective, only the soul that commands to evil has this propensity. In this vein, 43:36 says, And whosoever turns blindly away from the remembrance of the Compassionate, We assign to him a satan who is then a companion unto him (see also 7:27); regarding the soul that commands to evil, see 12:53c; 75:1–2c; 89:27c.

6 from jinn and mankind.”

6 This verse refers to what whispers into the souls of jinn and mankind, or to the jinn who whisper into the souls of people and to people who heed the advice of their own whispering soul rather than the Guidance of God and thus fail to take God as their Lord, King, and God. It can also be seen as a reference to both the jinn and people who whisper into souls (Q, R), since there are said to be satans from among mankind and jinn (6:112). It may also indicate what whispers into the “breasts” of both the jinn and mankind, for although nāṣ (here translated mankind) is usually taken as a reference to human beings, there is a hadīth stating that there was a “people” (nāṣ) among the jinn, in the same way that the word rijāl, which usually designates human men, is also used in reference to individuals (rijāl) among the jinn in 72:6 (R, Sh). Vv. 5–6 also have the meaning of seeking refuge from the one who whispers into the breasts of mankind and seeking refuge from the jinn and from mankind (Sh).
ESSAYS
The reading of scripture can be intimidating. At the very least, we know that the sacred texts of each of the world’s major religions are revered by millions of people. Authored books—novels, poetry, and plays—might also have coteries of passionate readers, but scriptural communities are invested more deeply and comprehensively in the meaning they ascribe to their texts than the most devoted readers of any secular book. When we open scripture, we realize we are entering a universe of meaning fraught with spiritual, emotional, historical, and even political dimensions. Knowing this, some might be tempted to stay away from such contested territory. But we also know that those who have not as yet delved into sacred texts will encounter new and challenging experiences through which they will grow, that travel and adventure beyond familiar territory are enriching, and that knowledge is the best antidote to fear and uncertainty.

All those who embark upon reading the Quran—Muslims and non-Muslims, religious and secular people—can learn something about the world and about themselves through engagement with it. Those who will learn the most are those who are prepared to explore three contexts that will allow them to go beyond a “naive” reading. The first is the context in which the Quran was revealed and has been transmitted, interpreted, and read over the centuries. The second is the reader’s own personal context—that is, one’s own background, assumptions, and prejudices, which will inevitably affect the “lens” through which one reads the text. What are you, the reader, bringing to the Quran as you open it now, perhaps for the first time or perhaps after many years of reading? And the third context is an understanding of the inner meaning of revealed terms.

Those who are new to the Quran surely realize that they cannot without preparation encounter this text “objectively,” even if they intend to adopt a laudable openness to learning about it. Moreover, today Islam and Muslims are too much in the news of the contemporary world and too enmeshed in world history for literate non-Muslims, even in the West, to be without at least a vague opinion about this religion and its followers. Before you approach the Quran, then, review what you “know” about Islam and Muslims and what the source of this knowledge is. Consider that your information might have originated with a prejudicial or deficient source. At least considering this possibility might help you identify potential cognitive and emotional barriers to having an authentic encounter with the Quran.

It is not only non-Muslims influenced by negative news about Islam and Muslims who will have to overcome assumptions and acquired biases about the Quran in order to be able to read it with an open mind. If you are a Muslim, you too have a cultural context and formative experiences that have shaped your understanding of the Quran. Indeed, some born into Muslim families and communities might have a more difficult time opening their hearts fully to the Quranic message than new readers, because they have been taught to understand verses in a particular narrow, sectarian way. This is not to say that this is the experience of most Muslims. Certainly, many Muslim parents, teachers, and religious leaders preach and teach a love for the Quran that allows for a continuing, engaged, and dynamic reading throughout one’s life. But this is not true for everyone.

It is important for all readers to examine their assumptions about the way the Quran should be read and understand the ways it is interpreted by those who believe it is God’s Word. It is true that Muslims believe that the original Arabic-language Quran is a record of the precise words enunciated by the Prophet Muhammad as he received them from God through the Archangel Gabriel. Many people express this Islamic theological belief by saying, “Muslims believe the Quran is the verbatim Word of God.” This is true. At the same time, this does not mean that the Quran is supposed to be read literally, if that means denying the historical meaning of terms and expressions, ignoring the social context of particular rulings, or neglecting its symbolic and inner meanings. To research the linguistic and historical dimensions of the Quran or to seek its inner meaning is not a modern innovation; rather, these kinds of interpretation began with the Prophet Muhammad and his Companions and continue today. Readers of the Quran must shed the notion that a literalist reading of the Quran is somehow more authentic or pious than an informed interpretation. Ironically, the minority of Muslims who apply a narrow “fundamentalist” hermeneutic to the Quran find as their allies a small group of anti-Muslim bigots who similarly take verses out of context to prove their hateful assertions.

Believers in scriptures other than the Quran will need to be careful not to automatically apply their hermeneutical traditions to the Quran, but some Muslim readers also need to explore the possibility that what they have been taught about the way the Quran should be interpreted might not be in accord with the understanding of many other Muslims. When you read other essays in this Study Quran about traditional exegesis or various approaches to deriving law, spiritual practices, or spiritual understandings from the Quran, you might be surprised by what you read. You may have been taught to relate to the Quran in a particular manner, for example, by using it as a proof text, that is, proving a particular legal judgment by citing a singular verse. Alternately, you may have been taught to minimize the import of verses with detailed legal content while prioritizing verses articulating general spiritual principles, such as There is no coercion in religion (2:256). Are these approaches to the Quran contradictory? If not, how have they been reconciled?

Take seriously your responsibility to identify the method you currently use for reading the Quran and evaluate this approach in light of the new knowledge you gain from the rich scholarly, spiritual, and juridical traditions of exegesis. Mature believers take upon themselves the responsibility for evaluating to the best of their ability what they have learned and accept those scholars’ opinions that are the most convincing, not simply the most expedient or convenient. Nonbelievers can also learn much by being open to the diverse traditional interpretations of the sacred scripture of Islam.

What Kind of Book Is the Quran?

In the world of modern publishing, books can look deceptively uniform. Most books are designed to be portable and manageable and to fit on a standard bookshelf. They are hardcover or paperback and mostly in rectangular form. The front cover displays the author and title; the back cover usually gives some information about the book’s contents. If a book deviates from these norms, for example, by having an octagonal shape or being excessively large or small, it is probably an art book or a children’s story; in any case, the appearance of a book can send a useful message about the unusual or challenging contents of the book. We might be better prepared to tackle the difficult style of James Joyce’s Ulysses or Friedrich Nietzsche’s Ecce Homo if their contents did not lie behind deceptively banal dime-store covers, but, rather, were edged in molting felt or encrusted with broken glass.

Today, publications of scripture often display some gilding on the title or on the edges of the pages. In a bookstore filled with dramatic cover art and design, this fact does not do much in itself to prepare us for an encounter with a radically different kind of text. We need to prepare ourselves, then, as we embark upon a reading of scripture, to engage with a different kind of book; we must open ourselves to being surprised, inspired, disturbed, and sometimes confused by the words and ideas we encounter. All scriptures, including the Quran, draw on themes, images, symbols, language, and literary styles that were not wholly unfamiliar to their initial audiences—that is, to the historical peoples who initially received and then transmitted the sacred words. But we are far away in time from those people who first heard or read the various books of the Bible or the Quran, and we need to understand something about those people and their societies, language, and worldview if we are to avoid misinterpreting much of the language and style of these holy texts. Even the category of “scripture” implies a uniformity of style among the world’s sacred texts that is far from being the case. As we approach the Quran, then, we need to take this book on its own terms and embrace its unique style and arrangement.

A distinctive aspect of the Quran is its assertion of its own identity as both an oral revelation and a written text. The Quran calls itself al-Qur’ān ("The Recitation"), a term that signifies an oral revelation, as well as a "book" (kitāb), a term that signifies a written revealed text. The verses most scholars believe to be the earliest revealed to the Prophet Muhammad include commands to recite (iqraʾ) in the Name of thy Lord and describe God as having taught humanity by the Pen (96:1–4). Other early verses tell believers to “chant” (rattil) the Quran at a measured pace and to “recite” as much of the Quran at a time as is easy and practical. The Quran itself, therefore, indicates that it is a book that should be recited as well as read.

What we see when we open a copy of the Quran is that it is divided into 114 *sūrah*s. The best translation of the word sūrah is probably “division” or “section,” although it is usually translated “chapter.” The latter can be especially misleading, because it sets up in the minds of some the expectation that the *sūrah*s of the Quran are organized systematically according to certain thematic or expository principles, which is not outwardly the case. Rather, with the exception of al-Fātiḥah ("The Opening"), the *sūrah*s are organized roughly according to length, with the longest at the beginning of the book and the shortest at the end. The second sūrah, “The Cow,” has 286 verses (āyāt), while the last sūrah, “Mankind,” has 6 verses. The verses themselves vary significantly in length; the shortest verses consist of only two words, while the longest verses are more than a hundred words.

The Quran is arranged in this distinctive manner because the Prophet Muhammad did not “compose” the Quran and then teach it to his community. Rather, the Quran is a collection of the revelations the Prophet Muhammad received from God from the inception of his call to prophethood at age forty until his death at age sixty-three. It is as though the Prophet Muhammad had a mental notebook whose blank pages he filled in with the revelations he received over the twenty-three years of his prophetic calling. As long as the Prophet was alive, new verses were revealed and inserted before, after, or in between existing verses within any sūrah according to the instructions the Prophet received from the Source of the revelation. For this reason, the Quran cannot be arranged chronologically, because some sūrahs contain verses revealed later than other verses.

It was only the death of the Prophet that cut off any possibility of further revelations to be added to the Quran. At this point it was the responsibility of his Companions to preserve the revealed text. Muslims believe that the order of the verses within each sūrah was fixed by the revelation itself, while the order of the sūrahs relative to one another in the written Quran (known as the mushaf) was determined by the Companions on the basis of the instructions the Prophet Muhammad received from the Archangel Gabriel. The arrangement according to length was also in accordance with the order given by the Prophet and reflected in the way in which the Prophet himself generally recited the sūrahs as well as his practice of beginning the canonical prayer with al-Fātiḥah and then reciting longer sūrahs before the shorter ones. Muslims believe that the order of the sūrahs of the Quran is Divinely revealed and that any written Quran must retain this original ordering. There are in fact no variations in the order of the sūrahs in any text of the Quran throughout the Islamic world. At the same time, Muslims are permitted to read or recite from any place in the Quran for worship or learning.

Stylistic Harmony in the Quran

The content of the Quranic revelations is as varied as the diversity of the worldly and transcendent concerns of humanity. Just as individuals are rarely concerned with only one aspect of their life at any time, but are constantly shifting their attention from one concern to another—from marital relations, to finances, to anxiety about a child’s defiance, to, on another level, spiritual pain or difficulty in making a moral decision—the Quran rarely focuses for an extended period on only one concern. Further, the Quran addresses both individuals and communities, and these communities changed internally and in relation to each other even over the course of the more than two decades during which the Quran was revealed. This multiplicity of audiences and topics that the Quran addresses, sometimes in quick succession with little “filler” to separate the units of meaning, can be disorienting to someone expecting a straightforward, linear narrative.

Readers of the Quran, therefore, need to be mentally and emotionally agile, ready to be moved quickly in a new direction. After the death of the Prophet Muhammad, a class of Muslim scholars arose who combed through the Quran collecting and organizing verses that pertained to specific subjects, such as legal issues, theological matters, stories about the prophets, descriptions of how to pray, and directly spiritual and metaphysical teachings. Each of their books was carefully composed to allow readers to learn about the Quranic perspective on a particular topic. But the Quran itself, the source of these books, resists such a rigid imposition of external structure. Readers of the Quran, like each one of us in our daily lives, must be prepared to quickly shift attention to a new concern at any moment.

This is not to say that the Quran lacks overall unity or coherence. In fact, it possesses a remarkable inner unity and coherence. Unlike the Hebrew Bible or the New Testament, whose various books were composed or collected by many people at different times, the Quran is the collection of revelations to only one man, the Prophet Muhammad, over a relatively short period of time. Thus, although the Quran addresses different topics in the various styles most fitting to convey the knowledge being imparted—parables woven through stories of the prophets, straight prose for legal injunctions, lyrical passages for praising God—it is all expressed in the same eloquent Arabic language.

In this respect, the Quran assumes great importance as recitation. The beauty of the language of the Quran has always deeply moved Arabs and even non-Arab Muslims from the time of its revelation and has been a topic of extensive study by scholars over the centuries. That the Quran employs apropos vocabulary and concise but powerful turns of phrase is something that necessarily escapes readers not familiar with Arabic, but the power of its recitation resulting from the spiritual presence contained in it transcends the world of those who know Arabic. The Quran’s use of rhyme and rhythm and other techniques to create aural harmony can be evident to anyone listening to its recitation.

It is probably easiest for new readers of the Quran to identify these techniques by first listening to the shorter sūrah near the end of the Quran; or a number of well-known passages from the longer sūrah, such as the Pedestal Verse (āyat al-kursī; 2:255) or the Light Verse (āyat al-nūr; 24:35); or the sūrah al-Raḥmān, “The Compassionate” (55), Yā Sīn, “Yā Sīn” (36), or al-Wāqiʿah, “The Event” (56). Here we find successive verses ending in various kinds of rhymes. For example, in al-Māʿūn, “Small Kindnesses” (107), the verses follow two imperfect rhyming patterns in which the first four verses end in -īn (dīn, yatīm, miskīn, muṣallīn) and the final three verses end in -ūn (sāhūn, yurāʿūn, māʿūn; here the rhyming is even more sophisticated, as we note the consistent ā followed by a glottal sound before the final rhyming syllable). Similar blocks of various kinds of rhymes are also found in some of the longer sūrah, where, in addition to creating aural harmony, they often signify a shift in semantic focus or emphasis.

Readers of the Quran need to pay attention not only to the way verses end, but to their beginnings as well. In recitation, rhythm and continuity in sūrah is frequently established by the sentence connectors that begin the verses: interjections, interrogatories, conjunctions, or other short words that often rhyme. For example, in al-Balad, “The Land” (90), the first five verses begin with words sharing a similar sound: lā (“verily”), wa (“and”), wa (“and”), laqad (“indeed”), and a (an interrogatory); the rest of the sūrah continues in a similar fashion. Readers who do not know Arabic will probably need to listen to the recitation a few times in order to notice the pleasing rhythm created by these connectors, as they are less obvious than the effect created by the rhymed endings of verses.

All sūrah of the Quran (except one) are preceded by the invocation In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful (biʾsmiʾLlāh al-Raḥmān al-Raḥīm). Many sūrah also conclude with a verse that includes a supplication, doxology, or exhortation such as Praise be to God, Lord of the worlds, or Glory be to God, or Truly God is with the virtuous (e.g., 1:2; 23:91; 29:69). The sacred Attributes or Names of God often serve an epitomizing function at the end of sūrah or at the end of a group of related verses in longer sūrah. Examples of the way these Names of God are referenced include: Truly God is the Forgiving, the Merciful (al-Ghafūr, al-Raḥīm; 42:5); He is the Hearing, the Knowing (al-Samīʿ, al-ʿAlīm; 2:137); and He is the Wise, the Aware (al-Ḥakīm, al-Khabīr; 6:18). The Divine Names create both semantic and aural harmony, as many of the Names rhyme or are assonant. It is recommended that those new to the Quran read the last three verses of al-Ḥasr, “The Gathering” (59), which list a number of the Divine Names; this will make it easier to identify the Names later when they appear in other sūrahās. Beginners are also advised to read short sections at each sitting, not great numbers of pages at a time as if they were reading a novel or an ordinary nonfiction book.

Unifying Themes of the Quran

It is perhaps helpful, before beginning a reading of the Quran, to be familiar with some of its major themes, many of which are addressed from multiple perspectives throughout the scripture. Although the Quran addresses many diverse topics, it most commonly describes itself as a book of guidance (hidāyah). In fact, one of the traditional names of the Quran is al-Hudā, “The Guide.” All topics addressed in the Quran are ultimately linked to this goal of guiding people toward God. Spiritually, the Quran addresses our need for knowledge about God—to know that He is One, the Creator and Ruler of the universe—as well as our need to learn how to show our gratitude and obedience to God through prayer, other acts of worship, and other human actions that are to be carried out according to Divine injunctions.

With a few exceptions, most of the Prophet Muhammad’s contemporaries did not believe in life after death. Belief in the immortality of the soul, Resurrection, and an ultimate accounting of each soul before God is therefore identified and emphasized throughout the Quran, along with belief in God, as a necessary component of faith for all true religions. For example, after mentioning Christians, Jews, and Sabeans, the Quran says, Whosoever believes in God and the Last Day and works righteousness, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve (5:69). In order to guide humanity to do what is right and prepare for this accounting, the Quran entices human beings with descriptions of Paradise and the ultimate bliss of being in the Divine Presence, while warning them about the consequences of evil acts by describing in very vivid terms the pain and despair of those whose actions lead to Hellfire.

The Quran does not teach that people should be detached from worldly affairs in order to attain this spiritual state. Rather, it is opposed to otherworldliness. It is by struggling to do what is right and good in our lives on this earth that we develop our spiritual depth and awareness. It is for this reason that the Quran addresses our closest and sometimes most contentious relationships—with family, neighbors, and business partners—emphasizing the need for integrity and honesty. The Quran also addresses the stresses that can emerge within the faith community. Al-Ḥujarāt, “The Private Apartments” (Sūrah 49), for example, discusses the corrosive effects of gossip, backbiting, and social marginalizing and emphasizes the need for a sense of community among Muslims.

The Quran stresses both the individual moral responsibility of adults (e.g., None shall bear the burden of another; 6:164; 17:15; 35:18; 39:7; 53:38) and the need for individuals to work collectively to establish communities and cultures where such morality is nurtured. The Quran calls upon people to work together to implement the teachings of the prophets throughout the ages that foster ethical and righteous living.

Those acquainted with the Hebrew Bible and the Christian Gospels will meet many familiar figures in the Quran. Adam, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Jacob, Isaac, Mary, John the Baptist, Jesus, and many other prophets and righteous guides appear throughout the Quran. Christians and Jews think of these men and women as “Biblical” figures, and it can be jarring to them to read their stories, which sometimes differ from those in the Bible, in the Quran.

What is important to understand is that the Biblical stories themselves drew upon a much older oral tradition that did not disappear when the various books of the Bible were written. The pre-Islamic Arabs, for example, were well aware that they were descendants of Abraham through his son Ismāʾīl (Ishmael) and his mother, Hājar (Hagar). Further, the history of the prophets was known not just through written and oral literature, but through the existence of holy sites throughout the Arabian Peninsula and the Near East. The burial place of Abraham, the baptism site of Jesus, Mt. Sinai, Jerusalem, and the Kaʿbah in Makkah—all these sites and many others served as epicenters of religious education and formation, often across parochial boundaries. Readers of the Quran who realize that the Biblical figures had a much richer and wider presence among Near Eastern monotheists outside the Bible will perhaps be better prepared to encounter new perspectives and previously unknown stories about them. But such readers must also remember that, for Muslims, accounts of earlier prophets are not based on stories that were prevalent in Arabia, but on Divine Revelation about these prophets and are therefore completely independent of historical sources.

Muhammad: Messenger of God and Bringer of the Quran

The Quran stresses the important role of Muhammad as Messenger—the one who transmitted the message from God to humanity. The Prophet was a perfect receptor of the Word of God, which he transmitted faithfully without adding or subtracting anything of his own. Moreover, he was also the person most familiar with the Quran and interpreted it according to the needs of his community as well as for later generations of Muslims. In fact, he can be said to be the first commentator on the Quran.

After the Prophet died, his sayings (ahādīth) were assembled in various collections, which differ in some matters, but are in agreement concerning the authenticity of the vast majority of the sayings. This body of literature, the Ḥadīth, traditionally accepted as canonical by both the Sunni and Shiite communities, has been revered over the ages as a key for the elucidation of the meaning of the Quran, sources of Law after the Quran, and along with the Quran the source of everything Islamic. Over the ages scholars of Ḥadīth have discussed and sometimes disputed the meaning of certain sayings and actions of the Prophet; some distinguish between those of enduring religious and spiritual significance to Muslims and those that were related to passing social or political situations. In any case, the study of Ḥadīth became a major Islamic science, and this body of literature plays a very important role in the understanding of the Quran.

All Muslims agree that the context of the initial revelation to the Prophet Muhammad is of great significance. Much traditional Quranic interpretation in fact involves an examination of the linguistic, social, moral, and political context of the initial conditions of the revelation of a particular verse or set of verses of the Quran, or what is called sha’n (or asbāb) al-nuzūl of the Quran, in addition to an analysis of the relationship of various Quranic verses to each other. The primary teachings of Islam found in the Quran—witnessing to the reality that is God, the dependence of creation upon Him, and belief that human beings will answer to God for their actions on the Day of Judgment—are clear and need little explanation. But to ignore the conditions of the Prophet’s community when verses treating such topics as gender relations, religious diversity, and political authority were revealed is to risk misunderstanding the Quran. For this reason, one must not be hasty in drawing conclusions about legal judgments and other norms on the basis of a surface reading of a few verses from the Quran. As is explained in the essay “The Quran as Source of Islamic Law,” the Quran is a source of law; it is not a book of law. Even apparently unambiguous declarations might, in fact, be limited in application or scope.

How the Quran Is Read in Muslim Societies

Quranic literacy varies widely in Muslim societies and does not necessarily correlate with general literacy and educational achievement. Quranic education formed the foundation of literacy in traditional Muslim societies, but modernity has severed that connection in many places, although this is not true everywhere. Muslims should acquire four skills in order to employ the Quran themselves in religious and moral life and derive benefit from it as a source of guidance. The first skill is the ability to read the Arabic script, since the original language of the Quran is Arabic. The beginning of religious education for most Muslim children and for non-Arab converts has always been to learn the Arabic alphabet and then how to string the letters together to sound out words and sentences.

    The second skill is learning Quranic Arabic well enough to be able to understand the meaning of the words and sentences. For Arabic-speaking children, an understanding of the meaning of the words comes at first as a consequence of their general knowledge of the Arabic language, which is then supplemented by their teachers. The majority of Muslims throughout history, however, have not been Arabs, although most Muslim peoples, like the Persians, the Turks, the Indian Muslims, and the Malays, adopted the Arabic script for their various languages. To understand the Quran, non-Arab Muslims need extra preparatory education consisting of either learning basic Arabic vocabulary and grammar or having access to translations in their native language. For both Arabs and non-Arabs, a scholarly grasp of the Quran requires years of advanced study—and non-Arabs have excelled in this alongside Arabs since the early days of Islamic civilization. In fact, most classical works of Arabic grammar were written by Persians.

    The third skill, which helps a great deal in grasping the spiritual presence of the text, is the ability to recite the Quran in a proper manner. Parts of the Quran are recited orally in the daily ritual prayers that all Muslims are required to perform; so every Muslim needs some basic recitation skills. The art of tajwīd (“good” or “beautiful” recitation) includes pronouncing the letters correctly, knowing which sounds should be elided, emphasized, or elongated, and using the proper tone. Proper recitation should be melodic, so that it is pleasant to hear, but not musical in the usual sense of the word, lest the recitation turn into a performance of personal artistry. Apart from their own recitation, most Muslims experience the Quran through hearing its recitation by accomplished reciters, who can be found throughout the Islamic world in non-Arab countries as well as in Arab ones. In fact, many of the best reciters are not Arabs, and some reciters are men and others women. Also, accomplished scholars of the Quran, not all of whom are reciters, can be found in every Islamic country.

The fourth skill, which makes a person intimate with the Quran, is memorization of at least a few verses and sūrahs. In each ritual prayer, the sūrah al-Fātiḥah must be recited, followed by a sūrah or group of verses chosen by the worshipper. These portions of the Quran are not recited from the text; so they need to be memorized. Someone who memorizes the complete Quran is known as a ḥāfīz, a “memorizer” or “preserver” of the Quran. Implicit in this title is the understanding that the ḥāfīz not only acquires personal spiritual benefits by knowing by heart the Word of God, but also benefits society by serving as a vessel for the preservation and propagation of the Sacred Text.

Muslims have taught these skills for experiencing the Quran through a variety of ways, according to the means and abilities of each community. Institutions for religious education in which Quranic studies are pursued run the gamut from one-room neighborhood schools for small children (maktabās) to enormous seminaries (usually known as madrasahs) serving an often cosmopolitan student body. For most of Islamic civilization, learning to read and recite the Quran was the beginning of education and an incentive to literacy.

The Quran is also widely read and recited outside of ritual prayers by ordinary Muslims across the world. Some try to read a small portion of the Quran each day, while others might devote time to reading particular sūrahs on Fridays, the holiest day of the week, but also on special occasions such as religious holidays, weddings, and funerals. Quranic recitation is especially intense during the month of Ramadan, the time when the Quran was first revealed. It was probably to facilitate the reading of the whole Quran during this month that scribes first inserted marks in the text to make clear the division of the Quran into thirty parts (ajzāʾ). In this way, someone wanting to complete a reading of the Quran in one month can read one part, or juzʾ, each day.

The Quran describes itself as a blessed Book (6:92), and even gatherings with an apparently nonreligious purpose are often opened with Quranic recitation in order to bless the event. Muslims believe that the Quran is the Word of God, and God is always present, saying of the human being in one verse, We are nearer to him than his jugular vein (50:16). Bringing the Quran into a space or occasion is a way to be reminded of that Divine Presence. The Arabic word for a “verse” of the Quran (āyah) literally means “sign” or “portent,” a term often also used in the Quran to refer to phenomena in the world of creation and also within human beings that function as signs pointing to the Creator. This is one of the reasons Islamic ritual spaces, such as mosques, are embellished with Quranic calligraphy along with decorative patterns derived from those found in nature. Both the “beautiful script” (the literal meaning of “calligraphy”) and the beautiful recitation (tajwīd) of the Quran remind those gathered for happy or mournful occasions of God’s Mercy, Beauty, Power, and Presence.

Where to Begin If the Quran Is New to You

Probably the biggest mistake new readers of the Quran make is to try to read it from “beginning to end.” As explained previously, there is no need to read the Quran this way, because in their totality the sūrah s are ordered neither topically nor chronologically. More problematically, those who first encounter the Quran by way of the sūrah s at the beginning (except for al-Fātiḥah) are likely to become quickly overwhelmed by their length and difficult legal and historical content.

It is perhaps a better strategy to first encounter the Quran the same way the Prophet Muhammad’s community received the revelations, that is, with the first sūrah s revealed in Makkah. These sūrah s are short, comprising anywhere from a few to a few dozen verses. By reading (and perhaps listening to) a small selection of these sūrah s, one can become accustomed to the style and rhythm of the language and the overwhelming content of their message. Just as important, these sūrah s focus for the most part on the fundamental, universal, and enduring spiritual message of the Quran: the affirmation that there is only one God, the Creator and Sustainer of the universe, Who holds human beings accountable for their actions.

One might begin, then, by reading the last two sections of the Quran (i.e., parts 29 and 30, beginning with Sūrah 67) and reflecting on the themes and lessons found there. In an age of speed-reading and skimming, in which we are taught to quickly “find the basic point” in a text, it is necessary to consciously slow down when reading the Quran. One needs to take time to reflect upon every word and phrase and also upon one’s own reactions and instincts as one encounters verses that address the deepest existential concerns of humanity.

After spending some time with the early revelations and other passages mentioned above, new readers can move on to other sections of the Quran. As one encounters legal content, references to particular historical individuals or communities, and relationships between various social groups (e.g., men and women, or nomads and the Madinans), it becomes more important to consult the commentaries, scholarly notes, and essays explaining their context and implications.

Aside from having diverse religious orientations or worldviews, readers of the Quran differ in their mental makeup, spiritual and intellectual aptitudes, interests, and passions. The person who is passionate about environmental protection will naturally pay close attention to Quranic verses related to the value of creation, nature as a locus of God’s Wisdom and Mercy, and the rights of animal communities, while the ardent advocate of women’s rights will hone in on verses related to gender relations. Muslims believe that one of the basic features of the Quran is its multiplicity of messages addressing the whole gamut of human conditions and circumstances. There is certainly nothing wrong with using an index or search engine to find verses related to one topic or another. Indeed, in trying to understand the meaning of any particular verse, scholars of the Quran usually first look within the Quran itself to see if there are other verses related to the same topic (referred to as “tafsīr of the Quran by the Quran,” for which see the essay “Quranic Commentaries”). Nevertheless, there are a few precautions to be noted in this regard.

First, we should never reduce the Quran to its articulations about particular issues or aspects of human life. The Quran is more than a sum of its parts. As discussed, the total “linguistic field” created by the Quran is an essential part of its message; an index of topics the Quran addresses misses this point. Just as an anatomy book lists and describes all the individual parts and systems that comprise a human body but tells us nothing about the experience of being human, a list of issues the Quran addresses tells us nothing about what it means for believers to have the living Word of God present in the world.

Second, readers must always keep in mind that the Quran is concerned with all the aspects of human life and humanity’s relationship with the Divine; therefore, it does not separate temporal and eternal concerns. The purpose of the revelation is to show how we should live in the world of created things in a way that ensures an enduring and at the same time positive connection with God in this life and the next. The Quran’s passionate call for justice in human relationships combined with mercy is intimately related to its generous invitation to every person to enjoy eternity in the presence of the Divine.

This message presents a particular challenge for readers of the Quran who deny a Transcendent Reality or a Divine Creator. Certainly some of the ethical pronouncements in the Quran might still have some resonance for these readers. Nonbelievers, however, often see the notion of giving up certain activities, being generous to the needy, or disciplining oneself through worship for the sake of a deeper relationship with God through reductionist eyes as being devoid of spiritual significance. An example of reductionist thinking is when one, upon encountering Quranic verses instructing men and women to restrict their sexual activity to marriage, concludes that religious language is being “used” here as a mechanism of social control. One of the many points this kind of reader misses in this case is how intimacy itself can be enhanced and made even more fulfilling when it has a spiritual dimension. If nonbelievers cannot relate to the transcendental aspect of apparently worldly concerns of the Quran, they might at least be able to analogize other spheres of human experience where individuals exercise discipline and make sacrifices for what they consider a higher good.

Respecting the Quran

It is appropriate, perhaps, to close this introduction to reading the Quran by discussing briefly the respect Muslims accord to the physical text of the Quran, the mushaf, as well as the sound of its recitation, which often moves believers to tears. We should recall that in premodern societies, books of scripture were not as easily available as they are today, and they were not treated like other books. Whether it was the Bible, the Torah, or the Quran, scriptures were approached with awe. The ontological distinctness of scriptures from other books (i.e., the fact that they are a different kind of book in their very being) was signaled by their being placed on high lecterns, lovingly guarded in special locked cabinets, or wrapped in distinctive coverings.

Muslims today continue to demonstrate their respect for the contents of the Quran by treating any written manifestation of it with deference. Symbolic acts of respect, such as handling papers with Quranic verses written upon them with special care and refraining from placing the muṣḥaf on the floor, are widespread. Islamic Law directs Muslims to touch the muṣḥaf only when in a state of ritual purity (56:77–79). This is achieved by performing ablutions before handling the Quran in accordance with Quranic directives and the practice of the Prophet Muhammad. Sufis add that one must be also inwardly pure in order to be able to “touch” the inner meaning of the Sacred Text. Although these rules do not strictly apply to translations of the Quran or to nontextual copies of the muṣḥaf, such as electronic books, a general attitude of respect for any reproduction of the contents of the Quran is recommended and widely practiced throughout the Islamic world.

Today, anyone can own a copy of the Quran, in its original language or in translation. In most respects, this is a positive development, for it allows more widespread knowledge of the Quran and communication about its message among diverse peoples across the world. Indeed, the Quran directs its message mostly to “humanity” and to “believers”—not only to Muslims—so it is fitting that it is accessible to all who wish to hear or read it.

Yet Muslims sometimes have ambivalent feelings about this easy availability of the Quran today. On the one hand, most Muslims want what they consider to be the Word of the living God available to all people. On the other hand, the painful reality is that some hateful people now have a greater ability to deliberately desecrate the Quran to hurt and vilify Muslims. It is to prevent the desecration of the Quran, in fact, that premodern scholars generally advised Muslims not to carry the Quran into hostile territory.

The hard division between “Muslim” and “non-Muslim” lands does not reflect the religious diversity found in most nation-states today (if it ever did), so this medieval legal opinion is now moot. Instead, Muslims usually collaborate with other peoples of faith to cultivate an ethic of mutual respect for religious symbols, artifacts, and sacred texts. Although some nations have laws restricting “hate speech” toward religious communities or grant special protection to religious books and symbols, the need for robust laws protecting freedom of speech in many countries, especially in the West, prevents such restrictions from being widely adopted especially as far as Islam is concerned, and in any case no law is effective without an underlying ethic that is broadly supported. Inculcating values of kindness, mutual respect, and neighborliness in our diverse communities is the best way to prevent religious differences from being used to harm one another, and this begins and ends with respect for the sacred scriptures and religious beliefs and practices of others.
Although the Quran was sent down as “an Arabic recitation,” the vast majority of Muslims do not believe that its language is of this world. Rather, “it is as though the poverty-stricken coagulation which is the language of mortal man were under the formidable pressure of the Heavenly Word broken into a thousand fragments.” The Quran itself alludes to this awesome power: Had We made this Quran descend upon a mountain, thou wouldst have seen it humbled, rent asunder by the fear of God. These are the parables We set forth for mankind, that haply they may reflect (59:21). From this perspective, translating the Quran into any language is a daunting task, for it entails conveying the absolute and infinite by means of the relative and finite.

Reflecting upon the inimitability of the Quran has led many to conclude that the nature of Quranic Arabic is among the greatest miracles of Islam. To those who say it is a human fabrication, the text says, Then bring a surah like it . . . if you are truthful (10:38). Another verse asserts that all of humanity could not produce its like: Surely if mankind and jinn banded together to bring the like of this Quran, they would not bring the like thereof, even if they supported one another (17:88). Those who have endeavored to translate the Quran realize this truth most acutely. As A. J. Arberry states in the introduction to The Koran Interpreted, “The rhetoric and rhythm of the Arabic of the Koran are so characteristic, so powerful, so highly emotive, that any version whatsoever is bound in the nature of things to be but a poor copy of the glittering splendour of the original.” And in his introduction to The Glorious Quran, Muhammad Marmaduke Pickthall states, “The Quran cannot be translated. That is the belief of the traditional Sheykhis and of the present writer.”

Arabic Syntax

At the center of this Quranic inimitability is its continual thematic and linguistic alternation, which many scholars of the Arabic language consider to be among the Quran’s “remarkable and exquisite subtleties.” Through such alternation the Quran comes across as both static and dynamic, retaining the quality of the spoken word and the medium of the written. Such linguistic alternations (iltifāt) can be difficult to translate, since they defy or transcend the norms of human speech. Iltifāt has been recognized as an attribute of eloquence (balāghah) in all forms of Arabic. But it figures far more prominently in the Quran than in poetry or prose. Its most common form is the alternation between persons: from third to first, first to third, third to second, or second to third. An example can be found in 14:13: So their Lord revealed unto them, “We shall surely destroy the wrongdoers.” The shift in the Divine Voice from third-person singular to first-person plural brings the reality of Divine Justice into immediate relief: many people believe they face a distant reckoning from a transcendent Lord, though He is in fact immanently present and His Justice is immediate. In other verses this same technique brings into focus the omnipresence of God’s guiding Mercy. In this way the syntactical structure of many verses is believed to pull even the recalcitrant soul toward God by engendering the awareness that no matter how far a human being may be from God, God is nearer to him than his jugular vein (50:16).

The best-known instance of iltifāt is found in the opening sūrah of the Quran:

In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. Praise be to God, Lord of the worlds, the Compassionate, the Merciful, Master of the Day of Judgment. Thee we worship and from Thee we seek help. Guide us upon the straight path, the path of those whom Thou hast blessed, not of those who incur wrath, nor of those who are astray.

The first four verses (first two sentences) speak of God as a transcendent third person, whereas the next verses bring God into an immediate relationship with human beings. This sudden shift from Divine Transcendence to Divine Immanence is even more dramatic in Arabic. Although something of this and the many other instances of iltifāt can be rendered in translation, even those who have mastered both languages have yet to render them in a manner that fully captures the dramatic effect this sudden shift in the original Arabic can have on readers or listeners.
Grammatical Structure

The iltifāt, or alternation between tenses or persons, can be difficult for those reading a translation, but there are other difficulties as well. Foremost among these are the many grammatical structures in the Quran that are open to multiple interpretations that cannot be rendered in translation. A famous example is 21:107, which is translated by A. J. Arberry as follows: “We have not sent thee, save as a mercy unto all beings.” Muhammad Abdel Haleem renders it: “It was only as a mercy that We sent you [the Prophet] to all people.” In this volume it is translated, And We sent thee not, save as a mercy unto the worlds, but it could also be rendered, “We did not send thee, save out of mercy for the worlds.” These four variations reflect the manner in which the Arabic word rahmah, “mercy,” can be interpreted as modifying either the pronoun “you” or the verb “to send.” Both are valid grammatical readings, but the Arabic of the text allows readers to understand both that the sending of the Prophet was done out of mercy and that he himself is a mercy. Yet the translator must choose to limit the polyvalent Arabic text to a single meaning or render a dual translation that would convey both meanings. In such instances translation not only inhibits the language of the Quran, but also limits the multiple theological implications of the verse.

The polyvalence of Quranic Arabic can also be found in the possible referents for a single pronoun, a problem often discussed in the exegetical tradition. For example, the most common translation of 2:177 is roughly as follows:

> It is not piety to turn your faces to the east and the west. Rather, piety is he who believes in God, the Last Day, the angels, the Book, and the prophets; and who gives wealth, despite loving it, to kinsfolk, orphans, the indigent, the traveler, beggars . . . (emphasis added)

This translation follows the predominant interpretation. The first-person masculine pronoun, which is rendered “it” in the preceding translation can, however, be interpreted as referring to God rather than to wealth. In which case it would be translated:

> It is not piety to turn your faces to the east and the west. Rather, piety is he who believes in God, the Last Day, the angels, the Book, and the prophets; and who gives wealth, out of love for God, to kinsfolk, orphans, the indigent, the traveler, beggars . . . (emphasis added)

The two translations differ in whether one reads the first-person singular pronoun in the Arabic phrase ʿalā ḥubbihi (indicated by italics in each translation) as a reference to wealth or to God. Both readings are viable in the Arabic. In this way the Quranic text opens onto two directions, implying that one must give both despite the love of worldly wealth and out of love for God. Yet the translator into any European language must choose one option or provide a prolix translation that compromises the flow of the original. Not only do most such translations limit readers to a single interpretation; they also veil the manner in which the Quran, through the subtle placement of a single pronoun, alludes to the fact that true piety requires both love of God and overcoming attachment to the things of this world.

Quranic Terms

In addition to the syntactical and grammatical obstacles mentioned above, the translator of the Quran into any European language faces the challenge of finding equivalent words for central Quranic concepts. As the Quran is part of the Abrahamic tradition and presents itself as a continuation of the Torah, the Psalms, and the Gospels, many concepts are similar. But other concepts are very different in nature. For example, both Christianity and Islam stress the importance of repentance. The word that conveys this concept in Arabic is tawbah and the verbal form is tāba/yatūbu, the literal meaning of which is “to turn”; thus when one repents one is said to turn unto God, or tāba ilāʾLlāh. But this phrase also indicates that one has returned from sin to God, or sinfulness to godliness, which relates to the Quranic conception of the human being as inherently good, rather than stained by “original sin.”

The human side of tawbah can still be partially conveyed by the word “repentance.” However, the Quran also refers to God as having tawbah toward human beings, and there is no way to convey this reciprocity with a single word in English. Such reciprocity is evident in many verses, such as 5:39: Whosoever repents (tāba) after his wrongdoing, and makes amends, God will relent (yatūbu) unto him. In fact, the verb tāba/yatūbu refers to God more often than it does to human beings, since from a Quranic perspective it is only when God turns or relents to human beings that they are able to truly turn to Him in sincere repentance. Hence one of the Divine Names is al-Tawwāb, “the Turner” or “the Relenting.” The principality of God’s tawbah is seen in 9:118, a literal translation of which reads, “Then He turned to them, that they would turn to Him. Truly God is the Turner, the Merciful.” One can see that translating God as “the Turner” fails to convey exactly what is meant and robs this central Quranic concept of its subtle majesty. Following the lead of previous translations, the translation in this volume reads: Then He relented unto them, that they might repent. Truly God is Relenting, Merciful. This comes closer to the original meaning, but still sacrifices the reciprocity that grabs readers or listeners in Arabic and provides a visceral awareness of the key Quranic concept that our ability to turn to God in repentance is entirely contingent upon God’s turning to us with mercy and forgiveness.

The inadequacy of English equivalents for Arabic words may be most evident in the word dīn, usually translated “religion.” The etymology of “religion” is very different from that of dīn. The two words thus convey different concepts. The etymology of “religion” has been debated for centuries. Some maintain, as did Cicero, that it comes from relegere, meaning, “to treat carefully.” Others follow the fourth-century Christian apologist Lactantius, who maintains that it derives from religare, “to bind.” As Lactantius writes, “We are tied to God and bound to Him (religati) by the bond of piety, and it is from this, and not, as Cicero holds, from careful consideration (relegendo), that religion has received its name.” Although the interpretation of Lactantius has prevailed in Christian circles, neither derivation is adequate for rendering dīn.

The Arabic root for dīn comes from the verb dāna/yadīnu, which means both “to owe a debt” and “to be obedient” or “to follow.” With regard to the former, dīn indicates that human beings are in debt to God, to whom they owe their entire existence. In relation to the latter, it connotes that human beings should submit to God’s Power. Thus 9:29, wa lā yadīnūna dīn al-ḥaqq, is only partially translated when Pickthall renders it, “and [they] follow not the religion of truth,” since it also implies that they “pay not the true debt.” Likewise, 3:19 loses part of its meaning when translated, “Truly the religion (dīn) with God is Islam.” On one hand, it implies that the debt (dīn) to God is submission (islām). On the other, it implies that obedience (dīn) to God is submission (islām). All three meanings are fully present in the Arabic, but cannot all be rendered in a single English translation. Thus, although the Arabic word dīn and the English word “religion” both connote piety and voluntary submission to the Will of God, they do so in different ways that have affected the overall interpretation of the word within each religious universe.

Conclusion

From an Islamic perspective, the subtleties of Quranic Arabic and its sudden thematic shifts lead to much consternation when read as the composition of mortals. It is thus believed that they can only be fully understood when read as the Discourse of the Eternal—the Divine Word being seen as pure substance and not as mere accident. From one perspective, it is in fact by assuming the appearance of accident that this substance is able to draw the soul out of accident and return it to pure substance. This understanding is best expressed by the philosopher Frithjof Schuon, who writes:

The Quran is, like the world, at the same time one and multiple. The world is a multiplicity which disperses and divides; the Quran is a multiplicity which draws together and leads to Unity. The multiplicity of the holy Book—the diversity of its words, sentences, pictures, and stories—fills the soul and then absorbs it and imperceptibly transposes it into the climate of serenity and immutability by a sort of divine “cunning.” The soul, which is accustomed to the flux of phenomena, yields to this flux without resistance; it lives in phenomena and is by them divided and dispersed—even more than that, it actually becomes what it thinks and does. The revealed Discourse has the virtue that it accepts this tendency while at the same time reversing the movement thanks to the celestial nature of the content and the language, so that the fishes of the soul swim without distrust and with their habitual rhythm into the divine net.13

Such subtle transformations can be found in every dimension of the Quran, from its rapid transition between themes and topics, to the grammatical and syntactical nuances, only a few of which have been mentioned here. They are all woven into a sublime mosaic that, from an Islamic perspective, cannot be fully rendered into a language other than the sacred language of Arabic, chosen by God. As such, Muslims maintain that the Quran will always defy any attempt to be conveyed by that which is relative, for it is meant to transmute the dispersion of fragmented human souls such that the relative comes to be a reflection of the Absolute.

From this perspective, the Quran cannot be translated on the linguistic plane. The only true translation of the Quran possible is of an existential order: only those who have assimilated the revelation or immersed themselves in its teachings so thoroughly that its meanings speak through their thoughts, words, and deeds can be said to represent an effective translation of the Noble Book. For Muslims of all sects and creeds, this is in fact the way of the Prophet Muhammad, for when asked about his character, his wife responded, “The character of God’s Prophet was the Quran.”

14
THE ISLAMIC VIEW OF THE QURAN
Muhammad Mustafa al-Azami

According to the traditional Islamic understanding of the revelation of the Quran, Muhammad was a monotheist (ḥanīf) even before being chosen as a prophet. He believed in the One God of Whom the prophet Abraham had spoken before him and, like his ancestor, Muhammad never worshipped idols. He was also a contemplative who would withdraw from time to time to a cave called al-Ḥīrāʾ on Jabal al-Nūr (“Mountain of Light”), a hill near Makkah, to meditate and be alone with God. On one of these occasions, when Muhammad was forty years old, the Archangel Gabriel (Jabraʾīl or Jibrīl) appeared to him and commanded him to recite (or read), to which Muhammad responded that he could not do so as he was unlettered (ummī). But the Archangel insisted, and the Prophet repeated his response. This exchange continued until Gabriel revealed to him the very first verses of the Quran:

Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created, created man from a blood clot. Recite! Thy Lord is most noble, Who taught by the Pen, taught man that which he knew not. (96:1–5)

These verses mark the first descent (tanzīl) or revelation (waḥy) to the Prophet. During the next twenty-three years, until shortly before his death, the Quran was continuously revealed to him bit by bit, often in response to existent circumstances and conditions. According to one of the most important transmitters of Prophetic traditions, or Ḥadīth, Ibn ʿAbbās ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib (d. 68/687), the entire Quran was made to descend by God in one night to the lowest Heaven and then revealed on earth in stages that He determined.¹

The Revelation
Certain events can be described to, but not fully comprehended by, those who have had no experience of them, such as describing colors to a blind person. Similarly, the advent of revelation and its reception by a prophet are outside the realm of the ordinary experience of human beings. To understand this phenomenon we have to have faith and depend solely on authentic reports from the Prophet and those trustworthy individuals who witnessed him. These include:

Once the Prophet was asked, “O Messenger of God, how does the revelation come to thee?” He replied, “Sometimes it comes like the ringing of a bell, and that is the hardest on me; then it leaves me, and I retain what it said. And sometimes the angel approaches me in human form and speaks to me, and I retain what he said.”

ʿĀʾishah related, “Verily, once before leaving him I saw the Prophet when the revelation descended upon him on a day that was severely cold. And behold, his brow was streaming with sweat.”

Yaʿlā once told ʿUmar of his desire to observe the Prophet while he was receiving revelation (wahy). At the next opportunity ʿUmar called out to him, and he witnessed the Prophet “with his face red, breathing with a snore. Then the Prophet appeared relieved [of that burden].”

Zayd stated, “Ibn Umm Maktūm came to the Prophet while he was dictating to me the verse, Those who stay behind among the believers . . . and those who strive in the way of God with their goods and lives are not equal (4:95). On hearing the verse, Ibn Umm Maktūm said, “O Prophet of God, had I the means I would most certainly have participated in jihād.” He was a blind man, but added, “So God revealed except for the disadvantaged to the Prophet while his thigh was on mine, and it became so heavy that I feared my thigh would break.”

The Prophet never possessed any control over when or where the revelation would take place or what it would say. This is evident from numerous incidents. Once some people slandered his wife ʿĀʾishah, accusing her of adultery. The Prophet received no immediate revelation, and in fact he suffered for a full month before God declared her to be innocent in 24:16.
The Quran mentions in many places that the Prophet will recite (from the root t-l-w) the revelation to the people (2:129, 151; 3:164; 22:30; 29:45), alluding to his role in disseminating the revelation throughout the community. However, recitation is accompanied by teaching, which was part of Abraham’s supplication to God interpreted by Muslims to refer to the coming of the Prophet Muhammad:

Our Lord, raise up in their midst a messenger from among them, who will recite Thy signs to them, and will teach them the Book and Wisdom, and purify them. (2:129)

The Prophet’s duties toward the revelation (waḥy) he received were many. Not only was he the instrument for the reception of the Divine message; he was also to supervise the proper compilation of the revealed verses, provide the necessary explanations, encourage community-wide dissemination of the revelation, and teach his Companions in light of Quranic injunctions. Just like the message itself, the order of the compilation of the verses and the content of each sūrah came from God, not from the Prophet or scribes, and it was his duty to see them faithfully represented. And so after he memorized what was revealed to him, the recitation of the verses to the Companions, the compilation of the verses, the explanation of the meaning of the verses, and the education of the early Muslims became the Prophet’s prime objectives throughout his prophethood, duties he discharged with tremendous resolve, sanctioned, guided, and protected in his efforts by God. As for explanation of the revelation, the literature of the Prophet’s Sunnah (or the Ḥadīth) as a whole constitutes his elucidation of the Quran and his incorporation of its teachings into practical everyday life. The Ḥadīth and Sunnah of the Prophet constitute in fact the first commentary on the Quran.

To continually refresh the Prophet’s memory, the Archangel Gabriel would visit him specifically for that purpose on many occasions every year. To quote some ahādīth and reports of some of the Companions:

The Prophet’s daughter Fāṭimah said, “The Prophet informed me secretly, ‘Gabriel used to recite the Quran to me and I to him once a year, but this year he has recited the entire Quran with me twice. I do not think but that my death is approaching.’”

Ibn ʿAbbās reported that the Prophet would meet with Gabriel every night during the month of Ramadan, till the end of the month, each reciting [the Quran] to the other.

Abū Hurayrah said that the Prophet and Gabriel would recite the Quran to each other once every year, during Ramadan, but that in the year of his death they recited it twice.

TEACHING THE QURAN

There are no indications that the Prophet ever learned to write, and it is generally believed that he remained unlettered throughout his life. He nevertheless maintained the importance of the skill of writing, whose instruction, in one ḥadīth, is described as the duty of a father toward his son. He ordered the literate and the illiterate to cooperate with one another in teaching the Quran and spared no effort in encouraging the community to learn the Word of God. The following reports confirm this fact:

ʿUthmān ibn ʿAffān reports that the Prophet said, “The best among you is the one who learns the Quran and teaches it.”

According to Ibn Masʿūd, the Prophet remarked, “If anyone recites a letter from the Book of God, then he will be credited with a good deed, and a good deed attains a tenfold reward. I do not say that alif lām mīm are one letter, but that alif is a letter, lām is a letter, and mīm is a letter.”

Among the immediate rewards for learning the Quran was the privilege of leading fellow Muslims in prayer as an imam, a crucial function, especially in the early days of Islam.

ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb states that the Prophet said, “With this Book God exalts some people and lowers others.”

ʿAbd Allāh ibn ʿAmr reports these words from the Prophet: “The one who was devoted to the Quran will be told [on the Day of Judgment] to recite and ascend, and to recite with the same care he practiced while he was in this world, for he will reach his abode [in Heaven] with the last verse he recites.”

Most of the Quran was revealed in Makkah, and ʿAlī, Ibn Masʿūd, Khabbāb, and other notables from among the Prophet’s Companions were already engaged in teaching the Quran during this period. After the migration to Madinah, many more joined their ranks as teachers, and some were even dispatched for that purpose outside Madinah, for example, Muʿādh ibn Jabal, who was sent to Yemen, and Abū ʿUbaydah, who was sent to Najrān.

Collection and Recording of the Quran

We have evidence that verses were recorded even during the hardships the Muslims suffered at the hands of the Quraysh. The following famous incident illustrates this point. ʿUmar, prior to his conversion to Islam, drew his sword intending to cause harm at a gathering of the Prophet and about forty followers. One of the Companions tried to dissuade ʿUmar by telling him that his own sister and her husband had followed Muhammad in his new religion. Hearing this news, ʿUmar headed to his brother-in-law’s house, where Khabbāb was reciting the sūrah Ṭā Ḥā from a parchment. When ʿUmar’s sister heard his voice, she hid the parchment between her thighs, but, when discovered, she refused to let ʿUmar so much as touch the parchment until he had cleansed himself. This narration reveals that verses were kept in written form even during this early period. As for ʿUmar, his angry quest that day ended in his embracing Islam.

According to Ibn ʿAbbās, verses revealed in Makkah were recorded in Makkah. During the Madinan period, approximately sixty-five Companions functioned as scribes for the Prophet at one time or another. Upon the descent of revelation, the Prophet would regularly call for one of his scribes to write down the latest revealed verses. Often this was Zayd ibn Thābit, whose proximity to the Prophet’s Mosque granted him this most golden of opportunities. Shiite sources insist that ʿAlī also often carried out this task. There is also evidence of proofreading after dictation; once the verses were recorded, the scribe would read them back to the Prophet to ensure that no scribal errors had crept in. Given the large number of scribes and the Prophet’s custom of having new verses recorded, we can assume that the entire Quran was available in written form during the Prophet’s lifetime, a fact corroborated in numerous traditional sources.

ORDER OF THE VERSES

If an editor were to change someone else’s book, say, by rearranging the words or changing the sequence of the sentences, it would be very easy to shift the entire meaning of the work. We can in fact no longer attribute this new product to the original author, as only the author is entitled to change the material if the rightful claim of authorship is to be preserved. So it is with the Book of God, for He is the sole Author and He alone can arrange the material within His book. We read:

> Surely it is for Us to gather it and to recite it. So when We recite it, follow its recitation. Then surely it is for Us to explain it. (75:17–19)

According to Muslim belief, God Himself sanctioned the Prophet’s arrangement of the verses and their explanation, making them authoritative. Only the Prophet, through Divine Guidance, was qualified to arrange the verses in the order in which they appear in the Quran that we now possess. Whenever revelation occurred, the Prophet asked his scribe to place the new verses in a particular position, and no Muslim from any part of the Islamic world has subsequently claimed the right to organize the Book of God in any other way.

We have a wealth of evidence indicating that the verses in the sūrahs have always existed in the arrangements that are to be found in the manuscripts of the Quran that we have. ʿUthmān ibn Abi’l-ʿĀṣ reports that he was sitting with the Prophet when the latter fixed his gaze upon a definite point and then said that the Archangel Gabriel had expressly asked him to place 16:90 in that particular position within that particular sūrah. A similar narration exists for 2:281, according to many the last verse revealed to the Prophet. But the clearest evidence of all is the history of the recitation of the sūrahs during the five daily prayers. A public recital of verses in unison cannot occur if the sequence of verses is in dispute, and no incident indicating such a problem is known to have taken place.

Although the order of the verses is the same for Sunnis and Shiites and both groups maintain that the order was determined through Divine Guidance and not by later generations, the numbering differs. In the copies of the Quran found in the Sunni world, the basmalah, that is, In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, is not counted as the first verse except for the first surah, al-Fāṭiḥah. It is the verse after the basmalah that is considered the first verse of most of the remaining surahs. In the copies of the Quran commonly found in the Shiite world, the basmalah is counted as the first verse and therefore each following verse is one number higher than that same verse in Sunni copies. (Sūrah 9, al-Tawbah, does not begin with the basmalah, so enumeration of the verses of that surah is the same for both segments of the Islamic community.)

Finally, the few variant readings of certain words are found in both Sunni and Shiite copies of the Quran and cannot be used as factors to distinguish the actual text of the Quran accepted by Sunnis from that accepted by Shiites. Except for the inclusion or exclusion of the basmalah in the enumeration of the verses, there is no difference at all between the text of the Quran accepted as the verbatim revelation of the Word of God by Sunnis and Shiites alike.28

ORDER OF THE SŪRAHS

The unique format of the Quran allows each surah to function as an autonomous unit. There are no chronologies or narratives that span multiple surahs, although there are a few cases, such as Sūrahs 8 and 9, where the ideas expressed continue from one surah to the next. Each surah stands as an independent unit even if the meaning of this or that verse in a particular surah is clarified in another surah with similar verses. This fact is the basis for commenting on the Quran through the text of the Quran, a method used in some well-known commentaries.

Because of their independence, it is possible and permissible to change the order of the surahs for recitation or study. Scholars agree unanimously, however, that it is not necessary to follow the surah order in the Quran in prayer, recitation, teaching, or memorization.29 The Prophet himself once recited Sūrahs 2, 4, and 3 (in that order) in a single rakʿah, or prayer cycle.30 The same is true regarding partial mushaf, or “copies.” It is permissible to copy selected surahs in whatever order one chooses, akin to the traveler who prefers to take along a few photocopied pages rather than hauling a whole guidebook in the suitcase. There are many examples of partial mushaf. In the Salar Jung Museum, in Hyderabad, India, an eleventh/seventeenth-century manuscript has the following order of surahs: 36, 48, 55, 56, 62, 67, 75, 76, 78, 93, 94, 72, 97, and 99–114.
Another from the late thirteenth/nineteenth century has the order 36, 48, 78, 56, 67, 55, and 73.\textsuperscript{31}

Nevertheless, the possibility of studying, reciting, or memorizing the \textit{sūrah}s of the Quran in the order one wishes does not mean that the actual existing order of the 114 \textit{sūrah}s is based on humanly contrived convention or that the written order can be changed. It is universally accepted by traditional Muslim scholars that, just as Gabriel directed the Prophet to place a particular verse or set of verses in a particular \textit{sūrah}, the Archangel also instructed the Prophet in the ordering of the \textit{sūrah}s. Muslims hold that, although the whole of the written Quran was not bound in a single volume during the lifetime of the Prophet, the order followed in the \textit{ʿUṭmānī Mūṣḥaf} and later copies of the Quran is based on the instructions of the Prophet himself. It is he who ordered \textit{al-Fātīḥah} to be placed at the beginning of the Quran, followed by \textit{al-Baqarah}, the longest \textit{sūrah} of the Quran, then \textit{Āl ʿImrān}, and so on.

The ordering of the \textit{sūrah}s is not chronological; that is, it is not based on the date of the descent of a \textit{sūrah}, so that those revealed earlier come before those revealed later. But the order of the \textit{sūrah}s is not accidental or without its own inner logic either. After \textit{al-Fātīḥah}, longer \textit{sūrah}s usually precede shorter ones, although this general quantitative rule is not absolute. In any case the ordering of the \textit{sūrah}s is part of the Divinely ordained structure of the Quran.\textsuperscript{32}

\textbf{Compilation of the Quran}

It can therefore be asserted categorically that, although the Prophet pursued all possible measures to preserve the Quran, he did not have all the \textit{sūrah}s bound into a single master volume during his lifetime; he had, however, given instructions about their order. Zayd ibn Thābit stated, “The Prophet was taken [from this life] and the Quran had not yet been collected into a [bound] book.”\textsuperscript{33}

\section*{Compilation During Abū Bakr’s Era}

Following the Prophet’s death in 11/632, Abū Bakr was chosen by the majority of Companions as the leader of the burgeoning Muslim community. Upon the Prophet’s passing, incidents of separatism flared up here and there. Chief among them was the claim of Musaylimah the Liar, whose stronghold was in the Yamāmah region in central Arabia and whose forces exceeded forty thousand. When the Muslim army marched against them in battle, the Muslims were victorious, but suffered heavy losses. Many Companions were martyred, and yet Musaylimah was only one of eleven leaders who had openly proclaimed some form of opposition. ʿUmar feared that with Yamāmah and all other ongoing theaters of war, the community of the ḥuffāz (those who had memorized the Quran by heart) would soon be wiped out. He therefore counseled the Caliph, Abū Bakr, to take the initiative and begin collecting the text of the Quran.

Once he became of the same mind as ʿUmar, Abū Bakr entrusted this momentous task to Zayd ibn Thābit, to whom he remarked, “You are young and intelligent. You used to record the revelations for the Prophet, and we know of nothing that would discredit you.” And with this pronouncement, Abū Bakr put his seal of approval upon Zayd’s qualifications: he was young (in his early twenties) and therefore full of vitality and energy, literate, and intelligent (i.e., he possessed the necessary competence for the task), and he had prior experience in recording the revelations. In addition, Zayd had been one of the fortunate few to attend the Archangel Gabriel’s recitations of the Quran with the Prophet during the month of Ramadan.

Abū Bakr’s Instructions to Zayd

The Quranic injunction to write down the terms of business transactions and have them witnessed by two people (2:282) became the basis for the method followed by Zayd. Abū Bakr instructed Zayd to sit at the entrance to the mosque in Madinah and to record only those verses of the Quran brought to him that were validated by two witnesses. Very soon the project blossomed into a true community effort. Though the focus was on primary written sources recorded on parchment, animal skin and bones, wooden planks, and such, the writings were not only verified against each other, but also against the memories of those who had learned the verses directly from the Prophet. Zayd applied the same stringent conditions for acceptance whether the source was written or based on human memory, and in either case he always insisted on two witnesses. In any case human memory was only used to reinforce the written word, not to substitute for it. According to the Ḥadīth scholar Ibn Ḥajar (d. 852/1448), Abū Bakr had authorized Zayd to record only what was available in written form. That is why Zayd abstained from including the last two verses of Sūrah 9 until he came upon them in written form even though he and his fellow Companions could recall them perfectly well from memory.

This procedure shows that nothing was taken for granted, not even Zayd’s own recording and memorization of the revealed verses, and that everything required corroboration. Once complete, the compiled Quran, called the Ṣuḥuf, was saved in the “state archives” under the Caliph’s custodianship. On his deathbed Abū Bakr entrusted this text to his successor, ʿUmar, whose reign witnessed the blossoming of schools for the memorization of the Quran in Arabia as well as in the Fertile Crescent area. Toward the end of 23/644 Caliph ʿUmar was fatally stabbed by a slave, but, before passing away, he handed over the Ṣuḥuf to his daughter Ḥafṣah, who was a widow of the Prophet.

Zayd’s Methodology in Compiling the Quran

The typical procedure in collating manuscripts is to compare different copies of the same work. Of course not all copies are equal. In modern times the German orientalist Gotthelf Bergsträsser set out a few important rules for this kind of scholarship:

1. Older copies are usually more reliable than newer ones.

2. Copies that were revised and corrected by the scribe through comparison with the mother manuscript are superior to those that lack this step.

3. If the original is extant, any copy made from it has no significance.

For those who consider modern methods of scholarship sacrosanct, it is of some interest to note that the same benchmarks set by leading fourteenth/twentieth-century orientalists were applied by Zayd fourteen centuries ago in compiling the Quran. The Prophet’s time in Madinah had been one of intense scribal activity, and many Companions possessed verses that were copied from the parchments, wooden planks, and other materials of friends and relatives. Zayd, however, limited himself to those writings that were transcribed under the Prophet’s supervision (rule 3), thereby guaranteeing the greatest possible accuracy. Zayd had memorized the Quran and inscribed much of it while seated before the Prophet; his memory and writings could only be compared with material of the same status, not with second- or thirdhand reports and copies.

COMPILATION DURING ʿUTHMĀN’S ERA

During the reign of ʿUthmān (24–36/644–56), the third Caliph, Muslims were engaged in battles in the expanses of Azerbaijan and Armenia in the north. The fighting forces hailed from various tribes and provinces, each with its own dialect, and the resulting regional differences over the pronunciation of the Quran caused some friction within the ranks. Eyeing these tensions firsthand, Ḥudhayfah ibn al-Yamān warned ʿUthmān, “O Caliph, take this ummah (community) in hand before they differ about their Book like the Christians and Jews.”

In an assembly ʿUthmān sought the people’s advice, and when asked for his own view, his solution was simple and clear: “I see that we should provide the people with a single mushaf, so that there is neither division nor discord.” All those in the assembly applauded his idea.

There are two accounts of the way ʿUthmān proceeded with this task. According to the first version, ʿUthmān made copies based exclusively on the Ṣuḥuf kept in Ḥafṣah’s custody. According to the second version, ʿUthmān authorized a fresh compilation using primary sources and then double-checked it against the Ṣuḥuf. In either case the Ṣuḥuf played the major role in the new compilation, which came to be called the Muḥaf.

Al-Barāʾ reports the first version of the story:

So ʿUthmān sent Ḥafṣah a message stating, “Send us the Ṣuḥuf so that we may make perfect copies and then return the Ṣuḥuf back to you.” Ḥafṣah sent it to ʿUthmān, who ordered Zayd ibn Thābit, ʿAbd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr, Saʿīd ibn al-ʿĀṣ, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn al-Ḥārith ibn Hishām to make duplicate copies. He told the three Qurayshī men, “Should you disagree with Zayd ibn Thābit on any point regarding the Quran, write it in the dialect of the Quraysh, as the Quran was revealed in their tongue.” They did so, and after they had prepared several copies ʿUthmān returned the Ṣuḥuf to Ḥafṣah.

Ibn Ḥajar comments on the Caliph’s choice of the Qurayshī dialect: since all Arabic dialects would be of equal difficulty for non-Arabs who desire to read the Quran, the most favorable choice is the Qurayshī dialect, because that is the dialect in which the revelation (wahy) was revealed.

SANCTIONING OF THE MUḤAF

The definitive copy of the Muḥaf was read to the Companions in ʿUthmān’s
When the final recitation was over, ʿUthmān dispatched certified duplicate copies to be made for distribution throughout the provinces of the Islamic state. People were also encouraged to make duplicate copies of the Mushaf for their own personal use. Yet, after this process was over there remained the unfinished task of taking out of circulation other existing copies. There was now no need for the numerous fragments of the Quran in public circulation, so with unanimous consent all such fragments were burned. According to Muṣʿab ibn Saʿd, the people were rather pleased and no one voiced any objections, a statement seconded by ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, who declared that everything was done “in clear view of us all [i.e., with our consent].”

It is in fact known that ʿAlī himself was often consulted when the definitive Mushaf was being prepared. Shiite sources also assert that ʿAlī himself had a written copy of the Quran, which was also used to compare various passages. To this day there are in several libraries pages of the Quran whose calligraphy is attributed to ʿAlī, who is in fact considered the creator of the Kūfic style of Quranic calligraphy by Islamic master calligraphers.

According to one report, six certified copies of the ʿUthmānī Mushaf were penned, of which five were dispatched to various parts of the Islamic state and one kept by ʿUthmān himself for personal use. With each dispatched copy the Caliph also sent along a qāriʾ (“reciter”). The reciters included Zayd ibn Thābit, sent to Madinah; ʿAbd Allāh ibn al-Ṣāriʿib, to Makkah; al-Mughirah ibn Shihāb, to Syria; ʿĀmir ibn ʿAbd Qays, to Basra; and ʿAbd al-Rahmān al-Sulamī, to Kufa. But why send along a reciter? Sending a scholar with every mushaf emphasized that proper recitation was learned through direct contact with teachers whose transmission channels reached back to the Prophet himself and could not depend simply on the written script and spelling conventions.

Accompanying each certified copy was also ʿUthmān’s decree that all personal fragments of the Quran differing from the Mushaf be burned. Ibn Ḥajar mentions that despite the use of the word “burn” in the decree, it is possible that individuals erased the ink rather than burning the fragment. Radiocarbon dating of a recently discovered mushaf palimpsest (referring to a parchment whose writing has been washed off or erased and then written over, creating two different layers of text), has revealed with 90 percent confidence that the palimpsest can be dated earlier than 34/654, placing it very close to the end of ʿUthmān’s reign. It is possible that this parchment was one of those fragments that was erased (in lieu of burning) and copied over with the text from the official Musḥaf.

The second reason for sending a qāriʿ with each copy was so that no recitation would be made of the text that was counter to the written script of the Musḥaf. ĔUthmān’s script and spelling became the new standard, and from then on all reading and learning of the Quran by Muslims has been always based on the text thus established by ĔUthmān.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ĔUTHMĀNĪ *MUSḤAF

The official copies made under ĔUthmān’s supervision were largely consonantal, frequently dropping vowels, and with no dots. Being devoid of dots, the text could easily be read in many erroneous ways, and some orientalists claim that that is indeed what people did (see “Origin of Multiple Readings,” below). But ĔUthmān’s objective was precisely the opposite: to eliminate all circumstances leading to disputes in recitation. Sending a musḥaf by itself or a reciter at liberty to devise any reading he chose would not have achieved this objective. But by sending both concurrently, ĔUthmān brilliantly achieved the unity he sought to establish within the Islamic community.

It was not long before contemporary scholars began inspecting these official musḥafs. Many traveled to the various locales that had received a copy and began scrutinizing them, letter by letter, to uncover any inconsistencies between the copies. Their conclusion was that the six ĔUthmānic musḥafs were almost perfectly congruent with each other. The minor deviations between them can be summarized as follows: (1) an extra alif in 11 places; (2) an extra wāw in 8 places; (3) an extra character (other than alif or wāw) in 16 places; (4) a character in place of another in 6 places; (5) an extra min in 9:100; and (6) an extra huwa in 57:24. These amount to a mere 43 letters out of the 323,671 letters in the Quran. Moreover, none of the variants cause any changes in the meaning of the verse. Interestingly, however, keeping these “multiple readings” was deliberate. While preparing the official copies, Zayd, finding in each case two readings to be authentic and of equal status, retained them in different mushafs.

Relegating one of them to the margins would have implied inferior status, and placing them side by side would engender confusion, but by placing each variant in a separate copy he gave both readings their just due.

EXTANT MUŞHAFS ASCRIBED TO ʿUThMĀN

According to many scholars, the official copies ʿUthmān dispatched are long lost, but in various parts of the world there are a handful of copies of the Quran that are popularly attributed to him, each bearing the label “Muṣḥaf of ʿUthmān,” though not all scholars agree that they are truly ʿUthmānic. They are preserved at the Topkapi Palace Museum in Istanbul; at the Turkish and Islamic Arts Museum, also in Istanbul; in Tashkent, Uzbekistan; at the al-Mashhad al-Ḥusaynī Mosque in Cairo; and at the Institute of Oriental Studies in St. Petersburg, Russia. Based on the existing description of the ʿUthmānī Muṣḥaf, which none of them fits exactly, the paleographic evidence suggests that these copies of the Quran are from a somewhat later period, possibly the second half of the first century or the first half of the second AH. What is more heartening is that, even though none of them is probably the original of any of ʿUthmān’s six official copies, they all abide by one of the two multiple readings inserted by Zayd ibn Thābit into separate muṣḥafs at each of the forty-three positions mentioned above. The only exception to this fact is the muṣḥaf in Tashkent. In any case there is every reason to believe that these very early manuscripts were copied very scrupulously from the ʿUthmānic muṣḥafs.

Among the so-called muṣḥafs of ʿUthmān, the most celebrated is the one in Tashkent. It is also the one with the richest history and the saddest fate. Initially housed in Damascus, it caught the eye of Tamerlane after he sacked the city, and he had it transported to Samarqand. In 1868 the Russians overran Samarqand and moved the muṣḥaf to the Imperial Public Library in St. Petersburg. As the Bolsheviks advanced near the end of World War I, General Ali Akbar Bashi of the Imperial Army did not trust the young revolutionaries and hurriedly sent it to safety in Tashkent under armed guard. As a result of an 1891 article by a Russian orientalist describing this text, orientalist interest in the mushaf became so pronounced that S. Pissareff opted to publish a full-size facsimile edition. Before doing so, he made the horrendous decision to retrace with fresh ink those folios that had faded over time, in the course of which he introduced many “unintentional” alterations into the text. As the text has been corrupted, it is now both pointless and impossible to use it as a serious resource for textual study.

Origin of Multiple Readings

As mentioned earlier, the ‘Uthmānī mushaf was completely dotless and without marks indicating declensions. The Arabic word for “dots” is nuqat, and it is used for referring to skeletal dots as well as diacritical marks; declension marks are called iʿrāb. The former are dots that are placed over or under letters to differentiate them from others sharing the same skeleton, for example, ُ (v), َ (e), ََ (e), and ِ (e) in the Latin alphabet used in some European languages. Iʿrāb refers to the dots or markings that are used to indicate the sound of short vowels (a, o, i). The position of iʿrāb can also change the meaning of words such as inna ( 답변) and anna (安县).

Could this dotlessness and lack of declension marks cause divergences in the readings of the Quran? The answer in some cases could be yes if one had only the written text. Clearly a word such as □ can be read as hamal, khamal, or jamal depending on where the dot is on the first letter or if there is a dot, though not all these words are recognized Arabic terms. In practice, however, the answer to the question is no, because the correct qirāʾah (“recitation”) originated from the Prophet himself and was known to those who were scholars of the Quran.

It must be noted that in the early Islamic period people were not purchasing mushafs casually from the local bazaar and then learning to read them by themselves at their convenience. Verbal schooling from a certified instructor was required. No official reading originated from a vacuum or from personal choice or guesswork. In the case of more than one authoritative reading for a particular word, the source for the existence of the two readings is itself always traced back to the Prophet. Copies of the Quran were later produced with complete dots, markings, and ʿrāb, so that everyone who knew Arabic could read it correctly.

The spread of Islam over the Arabian Peninsula meant the assimilation of new tribes with new dialects. For some the Qurayshī dialect proved difficult. The Companion Ubayy ibn Ka'b reports:

The Prophet encountered Gabriel on the outskirts of Madinah and told him, “I have been sent to a nation of illiterates; among them are the elder with his walking stick, the aged woman, and the young.” Gabriel replied, “So command them to recite the Quran in seven dialects (ahruf).”

Over twenty Companions have narrated ahādīth stating that the Quran was revealed in seven dialects. Most agreed that the main objective was to assist those who were not used to the Qurayshī dialect in reciting the Quran. Zayd ibn Thābit said, “The qirāʾah is a sunnah that is strictly to be adhered to.” Some dislike the term “variant reading” and prefer “multiple readings,” which is a far more accurate description. The word “variant” arises, by definition, from uncertainty. This is not the case here. As the sole human being chosen by God to receive the Quranic revelation (waḥy), the Prophet Muhammad himself taught specific verses in multiple ways. The doubt factor, which the word “variant” conveys, does not apply here.

But let us for the sake of argument return to the issue of whether dotlessness can cause discrepancy in the reading of the Quran. Many Quranic phrases contextually allow the inclusion of more than one set of dots and diacritical markings. In the vast majority of cases, however, scholars recite them in just one way. When a variation does arise (which is rare), the skeleton of both readings remains faithful to the ʿUthmānī Muḥaf, and each group can justify its reading based on a chain of authority leading all the way back to the Prophet. Had reciters been at liberty to supply their own dots and marks, as claimed by some orientalists, the list of variants would run into the hundreds of thousands, if not millions. Consider, for example, the skeletal □. Possible readings are □ or □, which are all legitimate from the linguistic point of view. Going over the entire Muḥaf, the Quranic scholar Abū Bakr ibn Mujāhid (d. 324/936) counted roughly only one thousand multiple readings. These are due to the varying placement of dots and diacritical markings on the skeletal backbone of the ʿUthmānī Muḥaf. For example, the skeletal □ occurs in 1:3; 3:26; and 113:2, and contextually it could be read in all three verses as either \( mālik \) or \( malik \). However, only in 1:3 is it read both ways (both backed by a valid \( qirāʾah \)), while in the other two it is unanimously read only one way. There are thousands of instances where two forms of a word are equally valid contextually, but only one is collectively used.

THE EXAMPLE OF THE WRITING OF ALIF

In Madinah the Prophet employed many scribes, often from different tribes and localities, who were possibly accustomed to varying dialects and spelling conventions. For example, a letter dictated by the Prophet to Khālid ibn Saʿīd ibn al-ʿĀṣ reveals a few peculiarities. The word \( kāna \) (usually spelled with a \( kāf, alif, \) and \( nūn \)) is written \( kānāʾ \) (with a \( waw \) instead of an \( alif \)), and \( ḥattāʾ \), usually spelled with a \( bāʾ, tāʾ \), and \( alif maqšūrah \) is spelled \( ḥattāʾ \) (with a normal \( alif \) instead of an \( alif maqšūrah \)). There is no shortage of evidence regarding the variance in writing styles during the early days of Islam. This comes as no surprise when we consider, in our time, the spelling differences, for example, between American and British English. Standardized spellings are in fact mostly a modern phenomenon. Variant spellings of individual words were common even in printed books. On the opening page of St. John’s Gospel in the 1526 Tyndale English Bible, we note that “that” is spelled “that” and “thatt” on the same page, “with” is spelled “with” and “wyth,” and “of” is spelled both “of” and “off.”

In Arabic, the letter \( alif (⟩) \) is of particular interest. There are many instances where \( alif \) is pronounced but not written. For example, 2:9 in ʿUthmān’s \( Muḥaf \) is written \( kānāʾ \) while it is actually pronounced \( kānāʾ \). Similarly \( al-samāwāt \) is mostly spelled \( al-samāwāt \), that is, without \( alif \). Most modern printed \( muḥaf \)s adhere faithfully to the ʿUthmānī spelling system and there is a reluctance to deviate from its orthography. Once the famous scholar Imam Mālik (d. 179/795) was solicited for his legal opinion on whether one should copy the \( Muḥaf \) afresh utilizing the latest spelling conventions; he resisted the idea, except perhaps for schoolchildren. Another aspect of irregularity with \( alif \) in the ʿUthmānī \( Muḥaf \) is that it may be written as a dotless \( yāʾ \), for example, \( māwāhum \). With the oral transmission of the Quran, the pronunciation is never left in doubt even with these irregularities.

Even during the lifetime of the Companions a book appeared treating the subject of multiple readings on a small scale. Over time large works came to be written comparing the recitation of famous scholars from different centers and culminating in the work of figures such as Ibn Mujāhid. From the Islamic point of view the codification of the Quran has been the object of continuous and meticulous study. The traditional Islamic position is not that the history of the mushaf is closed to systematic inquiry, but rather that it has always been subject to such study and that the traditional Islamic account of the transmission and recording of the Quran is the one that is best supported by the available evidence. New theories related to the recording and transmission of the text often are no more than reinterpretations of historical evidence already known to the Islamic intellectual tradition for a millennium, and they are usually based on a set of assumptions brought to the textual evidence rather than deduced in some systematic way from it. Although contemporary scholars outside of the Islamic context have offered a range of imaginative interpretations to get to the “real” Quran, those unfamiliar with the Islamic intellectual tradition should remember that every last “variant” or “alternate reading” used as evidence that the classical Islamic account is inaccurate comes out from the Islamic intellectual tradition itself.66
The Quran, which was revealed in Arabic, has had a profound and lasting effect on the theology, language, and culture of the Arab and non-Arab Islamic peoples in their various countries. Theologically, it is the Arabic text, the direct Word of God, that is considered the true Quran, which is read in acts of worship. Translations of the Quran are deemed to be merely renderings of the meanings of the Quran; no translation can be taken to be the direct Word of God in the same way as the Arabic, and thus none has the same status. In many Muslim countries, translations of the Quran are not permitted unless they are accompanied by the Arabic text.

All Muslims, Arab and non-Arab, learn and read the Quran, or parts of it, in Arabic in order to have the satisfaction and blessing of reciting the Holy Speech—the very same words that were uttered from the mouth of the Prophet and recited by his Companions; the same words that the Islamic canonical prayers are required to be spoken in; the same words that have been uttered by successive generations of Muslims in different lands throughout the Islamic era. No translation can claim this status. In fact, it is its connection with the Quran that has kept the Arabic language alive and given it an unrivaled position in the central area of the Islamic world, the Arab Middle Eastern and North African countries. The literary language, common to all Arabs, is used for writing, education, and formal speech.¹

Quranic Arabic as the Language of Divine Speech

Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created (96:1). This command, sent down to Muhammad in AD 610, was the first verse of the Quran to be revealed. The word iqra’ (“Read!” or “Recite!”) is an order addressed to Muhammad, linguistically making the source of the speech outside of him. God is seen here to speak Himself directly to the Prophet. Later on, other commands, including qul (“Say!”), which occurs in the Quran over three hundred times, are addressed to the Prophet. Likewise, he is told, Convey (balligh) that which has been sent down (unzila) unto thee (5:67). Other forms of the verbs nazzala and anzala (“to send down”) occur over three hundred times in the body of the Quran, again stressing the fact that it has been sent down from God and is His direct Word. In addition to addressing the Prophet, God also speaks directly to various other people in the Quran: the believers who have accepted Islam and those who have not, whether disbelievers (al-kāfirūn), the recipients of earlier revelations (ahl al-kitāb), the Children of Israel (Banī Isrāʾīl), or humanity in general (al-nās).

In a further expression of this truth, the Quranic discourse often takes the form of God speaking in the first person, as in 2:152: So remember Me, and I shall remember you. Give thanks unto Me, and disbelieve not in Me. More often, God speaks in the first-person plural of majesty, as in 15:9: Truly it is We who have sent down the Reminder, and surely We are its Preserver. When God speaks of Himself in the third person, it is normally for the purpose of comparing Himself with the presumed gods, or “partners,” ascribed to Him by the polytheists to stress that it is God, not others, Who creates:

> God it is Who created you, then nourished you; then He causes you to die; then He gives you life. Is there anyone among those you ascribe as partners who does aught of that? Glory be to Him and exalted is He above the partners they ascribe. (30:40)

Thus, the first characteristic of the language of the Quran is that it is viewed by Muslims as sacred language. The direct Divine mode of speech gives the Quran unique power and gripping effect. As the Word of God, the Quran has unparalleled status in Arabic and Islam in general and has been crucial in the building of beliefs, laws, morals, and nearly all aspects of Islamic culture. When Muslims hear it, they bear in mind the Divine instruction: And when the Quran is recited, hearken unto it, and listen, that haply you may receive mercy (7:204). In accordance with its preeminent status as Divine Revelation, the Quran must be accurately recited according to the particular rules of tajwīd (proper recitation): even the rules for recitation of classical Arabic poetry, considered an art form in itself, come nowhere near the exacting requirements for reciting the Quran. Similarly, the act of writing the Quran is treated in a very special way. Indeed, the art of Arabic calligraphy was developed especially for writing down the Quran and has continued to be used for this purpose over the centuries. Moreover, a copy of the Arabic Quran or any part of it is to be handled in a unique way: None touch it, save those made pure, a revelation from the Lord of the worlds (56:79–80).

The collected written text of the Quran was the first book in the Arabic language. It was also the starting point around which and for the service of which the various branches of Arabic language studies were initiated and developed. It was in order to ensure correct reading of the Quran, especially when non-Arabs began to accept Islam, that Arabic grammar was first written down and developed. The same is true of Arabic phonetics, whose function is to ensure proper pronunciation and recitation of the Quran. Similarly, the study of Arabic rhetoric (balāghah) developed as Quranic scholars endeavored to identify the secrets behind the surpassing language and inimitability (i’jāz) of the Quran.

Branches of Islamic knowledge such as tafsīr (exegesis of the Quran), theology, Islamic Law, Sufism, and ethics and morals are likewise based on Quranic language, which permeates them. Even in their study of principles of literary criticism Arab critics drew heavily on the text of the Quran. This can be seen, for example, in the celebrated work of the famous critic ʿAlī ibn al-Athīr (d. 636/1239), al-Mathal al-sāʾir fī adab al-kātib waʾl-shāʾir (On the Criticism of Prose and Poetry). As stated by Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505), a writer on many subjects including Quranic studies and linguistics, the Quran is in fact the source for all branches of knowledge in Arabic.

Characteristics of the Conceptual Language of the Quran

As seen above, the foremost characteristic of the language of the Quran is that it is for Muslims a sacred language. There are, however, several other concepts fundamental to the Quranic message that can be seen in its characteristic use of language and mode of expression.

GUIDANCE

The overriding objective of this Divine Speech is guidance (hudā), a word that occurs over three hundred times in the Quran. Thus, in the first sūrah, al-Fātihah, the believers recite, Guide us upon the straight path (1:6), and immediately at the beginning of the second sūrah it is announced that the Quran is guidance: This is the Book in which there is no doubt, a guidance for the reverent (2:2).

CLARIFICATION
To achieve this guidance, the Quran uses clarification (bayān), a word that occurs 266 times in the text. The Quran describes itself on numerous occasions as making (things) clear (mubīn): There has come unto you, from God, a light and a clear Book, whereby God guides whosoever seeks His Contentment unto the ways of peace, and brings them forth from darkness into light (5:15–16). To this end, the Quran addresses the Prophet: We sent down unto thee the Book as a clarification of all things (16:89)—all things, that is, pertaining to religion: beliefs, rituals, laws, ethics, and all the other teachings of Islam. The Prophet is told that the Quran was revealed to him to explain to people what had been sent down to them (16:44) and is instructed: Say, “It is the truth from your Lord! So whosoever will, let him believe, and whosoever will, let him disbelieve” (18:29). Thus, the bayān of the distinction between truth and error is the Quran’s primary objective, and on this basis it declares: There is no coercion in religion. Sound judgment has become clear from error (2:256).

SIGNS AND PROOFS
In making everything that it says intellectually clear, the Quran provides arguments even for the existence of God Himself and His Oneness, for the prophethood of Muhammad, for the Resurrection and Judgment, and for its legal and moral teachings. As part of this process, it provides āyāt (a word that occurs 382 times), meaning “signs” or “proofs”:

And among His signs is that He created mates for you from among yourselves, that you might find rest in them, and He established affection and mercy between you. Truly in that are signs for a people who reflect. And among His signs are the creation of the heavens and the earth and the variation in your tongues and colors. Truly in that are signs for those who know. (30:21–22)
One of the remarkable characteristics of the language of the Quran is that the arguments and signs it uses satisfy the inquiries of those philosophers and intellectuals open to the truth of revelation and at the same time are equally available to ordinary men or women. After all, religion is meant for everybody, and such is the “magical” quality of the language of the Quran and the way it is received by Muslims all over the world.

RATIONAL ARGUMENT

As commentator Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210) explains, at the time of the revelation, in addition to those who believed in the message, the Prophet Muhammad had to deal with all kinds of people: those who did not believe in an omnipotent God who had power and free will, those who believed in more than one god, those who disbelieved in prophethood, those who did not want to accept the Shariah, and those Christians and Jews who had their own beliefs and did not accept the prophethood of Muhammad. In addressing all of these groups, the Quran produces logical arguments, accentuating the intellectual evidence that runs throughout the Quranic discourse. These arguments are often marked by various linguistic devices in the form of formulas such as:

If you are in doubt, . . . then . . . (in kuntum fī rayb fa-inna, 22:5)

Do they say . . . ? Rather, . . . (am yaquluṇa . . . bal, 23:70; 32:3; 52:33)

Bring forward your witnesses (halumma shuhadāʾakum, 6:150)

Bring your proof (ḥātu burhānakum, 2:111; 21:24; 27:64; 28:75)

Have they not contemplated . . . ? (a-wa-lam yanẓurū, 7:185)

Let man consider . . . (fal yanẓur al-insān, 80:24; 86:5)

INSTRUCTION AND PERSUASION

Since the Quranic message came to change people’s beliefs, it was not sufficient just to argue rationally with them. It requests the Prophet to admonish them and speak to them about their souls with penetrating words (qawlan balīghah; 4:63). The Quran seeks to persuade people to follow its teachings, especially when it is likely that they may think the instructions are hard to follow. An obvious example of this tendency toward persuasion can be seen in 2:183–87, which addresses the obligation to fast during Ramadan, demolishing, one by one, every possible obstacle that might arise in people’s minds concerning this matter. Likewise, even when it introduces a legal penalty, a subject that in legal texts is usually presented in sharp, detached language, the Quran couches it in persuasive language that elicits compassion. Thus, after prescribing the penalties for murder (O you who believe! Retribution is prescribed for you), it continues in the same verse:

But for one who receives any pardon from his brother, let it be observed honorably, and let the restitution be made to him with goodness. That is an alleviation from your Lord, and a mercy. Whosoever transgresses after that shall have a painful punishment. (2:178)

EXHORTATION AND REMEMBRANCE OR REMINDING (DHIKR)

One final device of significance that the Quran uses to achieve its objective of guidance is that of reminding (tadhkīr) its audience. God declares in the Quran, We have made the Quran easy to remember; so is there anyone who remembers (muddakir)? (54:17; see also 44:58). The Quran describes itself as dhikr (“remembrance” or “reminding”), and this concept of dhikr in its various forms occurs 255 times in the Quran. People are reminded of God Himself (7:205; 8:2), of God’s Favor (2:231; 8:26), His Power (19:67), His Punishment of earlier nations (14:5; 54:17, 22, 32, 40), and of the Hereafter, a reminder that occurs regularly throughout the Quran.

One feature of dhikr in the Quran is the multiple use of related material, particularly stories of earlier prophets. At a first glance, this may be seen as mere repetition, but different sections of these stories usually form integral parts of the arguments along with other material in the sūrah. In my recently published study “The Quranic Employment of the Story of Noah,” it is shown that the Noah story appears ten times in passages whose length varies from two to thirty-eight lines, and that in each case the material selected is suitable for its context in the sūrah and the historical context of its revelation. This device ensures that when people hear or read in their daily lives any particular sūrah, they will usually find in it the employment of sacred history along with material about God, His Power and Grace, the Hereafter, and so on, so that what they receive in a very powerful way is a full picture of the faith.

The Quran, as seen above, carries the message of Islam, which is not just a spiritual faith, but a religion that guides and governs all aspects of Muslim life. As such, it necessarily includes teachings relating to knowledge of reality (ʿilm), belief (ʿaqīdah), law (Sharīʿah), and ethics and morals (akhlāq). Having said this, the basis upon which everything is built is belief, the ʿaqīdah, and it is for this reason that this aspect of the revelation occupies the greater part of the Quran. As al-Rāzī points out:

Sharīʿah provisions in the Quran occupy less than six hundred verses (out of 6,236). The rest of the Quran is taken up by explaining the Oneness of God (tawḥīd), prophethood, and refuting the claims of pagans and polytheists. As regards the verses that deal with stories, they are intended to show God’s Wisdom and Power.13

Linguistic Characteristics of the Quran

The Quran’s interaction with listeners or readers, one of its most fundamental aspects, is manifested in various ways.

AFFECTIVE SENTENCES

In addition to declarative sentences (jumal khabariyyah), the Quran frequently uses affective sentences (jumal inshāʿiyyah). This serves to involve readers or listeners, a very important consideration in Quranic discourse. It explains the frequent occurrence of imperative, interrogative, and exclamatory forms; of prohibitions, propositions, exhortations, and oaths; and of phrases expressing wishing, hoping, and supplication.

VERBAL SENTENCES

Arabic has two types of sentences: nominal sentences, which start with a noun, as is common in English; and verbal sentences, which start with a verb, laying stress on the action itself. The Quran frequently utilizes the power of the verbal sentence. Within this type of sentence it uses the past tense for historical accounts, in its argumentation, and even when discussing the Afterlife. This is effective, for example, in making momentous events of the Afterlife (mentioned directly or indirectly on almost every page of the Quran) seem as if they are already here, a device crucial for Quranic discourse and techniques of persuasion. This may involve iltifāt (for which, see the section on grammar below).

DIRECT SPEECH AND DIALOGUE

Direct speech, words represented (usually but not always by quotation marks) as spoken directly by someone, and dialogue, direct speech between two or more parties, occur frequently in the Quran. For example, the Quran depicts Moses speaking with God and Pharaoh (26:11–51), God speaking to the angels and Satan (Iblis; e.g., 2:30–33; 38:71–85), and various prophets speaking with their communities (e.g., 11:25–35, 50–58, 61–68). Dialogue is also used in descriptions of the Hereafter: the people in bliss express their joy and gratitude, while those in torment argue and blame one another, and sometimes the people in Paradise speak to those in Hell. Part of the reason this narrative device is used in the Quranic discourse is that direct speech is more lively, dramatic, and easier to understand than third-person, reported speech. It also allows listeners to form their own judgment of characters and events as personalities emerge through the words they utter rather than through an indirect or secondhand report of what they said. The fact that the verb qāla ("he said") occurs in the Quran hundreds of times is some indication of how frequently direct speech and dialogue are used.

EMPHASIS

Because of the Quran’s need to press home its messages to people who doubted or denied them, it frequently employs emphasis, using all the particles available in Arabic, such as inna and la- , and the suffix -anna with the imperfect verb.

GENERALIZATION

The Quran frequently uses generalization, since it maintains that it is for all people. It categorizes people using such plurals as “the believers” (al-muʿminūn), “the reverent” (al-muttaqūn), “the disbelievers” (al-kāfirūn), “the wrongdoers” (al-dhālimūn), and so forth, and employs conditional sentences with grammatical particles such as “whoever” (man), “whatever” (mā), “whichever” (ayy), “wherever” (haythumā), and “whenever” (aynamā) and also the indefinite noun.

CONTRAST

Contrast occurs naturally in a book that declares, in 18:29, Say, “It is the truth from your Lord! So whosoever will, let him believe, and whosoever will, let him disbelieve,” and is a central feature of Quranic style. One of the linguistic habits of the Quran is to contrast two classes of beings or things and their respective destinies. Thus, the Quran contrasts this world and the next (each occurring, normally together, exactly 115 times); believers and disbelievers; Paradise and Hell; angels and satans; life and death; secrecy and openness, and so on, all found to occur the same number of times. Grammatically, contrast is achieved by such linguistic structures as Whosoever . . . and whosoever . . . or As for one who . . . and as for one who . . . (man . . . wa man . . .), as found in 4:123–24 and 92:5–8. Another frequently used device is As for . . . and as for . . . (amma . . . wa-amma . . .), as in, On the Day when faces whiten and faces blacken. As for those whose faces blacken, . . . And as for those whose faces whiten, . . . (3:106–7). Sometimes the contrasted elements follow each other without any conjunction, which shows the contrast even more powerfully, as in 89:25–30: That Day none punishes as He punishes, and none binds as He binds. O thou soul at peace! Return unto thy Lord, content, contenting. Enter among My servants. Enter My Garden.

FREQUENT USE OF ATTRIBUTES

The use of attributes (ṣifāt) is an important means of Quranic persuasion and argument, noticeable from the very opening words of the Quran: Praise be to God, Lord of the worlds, the Compassionate, the Merciful (1:2–3). Because He has such Attributes, He is worthy of praise and worship. The required path is the straight one, the one of those whom Thou hast blessed, not of those who incur wrath, nor of those who are astray (1:6–7). Such qualifications make it worthy of asking God’s Guidance toward the path. Believers are also described using many attributes (see, e.g., 23:1–10; 70:22–29).

In a sentence where a number of adjectives of various kinds occur, the Quran tends to arrange them in order of length with the shortest first. For example, 40:28: A believing man from the House of Pharaoh who was concealing his belief said . . . (Wa qāla rajulun muʾminun min āli Firʿawna yaktumū īmānahu . . .). Here we have a single adjective, believing (muʾminun), coming before a prepositional phrase, from the House of Pharaoh (min āli Firʿawna), and then we have the adjectival clause, who was concealing his belief (yaktumū īmānahu).17 According to Arabic conventions, this particular order serves to balance the sentence and maintain a good, effective rhythm.

Quranic Grammar

As we have seen, one overriding objective of the Quran is to speak with penetrating words. It is clear from the foregoing that the Quran uses Arabic grammar and style together to serve this purpose. In general, grammar may follow the normal rules (a process known as istiṣḥāb al-aṣl). Considerations of style, however, give priority to “departure from the original norm” (al-ʿudūl ʿan al-aṣl) or, as the scholars of balāghah say, “departure from what is normally expected” (al-khurūj ʿalā muqtaḍaʾl-ẓāhir), but only “for considerations required by the situation in certain contexts.”18

GRAMMATICAL SHIFTS FOR RHETORICAL PURPOSES

An obvious area for departure from what is expected is agreement between the pronoun and its referent. This is done first and foremost in what is known as īltifāṭ, grammatical shifts for rhetorical purposes, and is a widespread feature of Quranic style. Traditionally, Arab writers have classified this feature among the “remarkable things and exquisite subtleties we have found in the glorious Quran.”19 Īltifāṭ involves changes to verbal agreement made according to effective patterns and for stylistic reasons. Rhetoricians have referred to īltifāṭ as shajāʿat al-ʿarabiyyah, as it shows, in their opinion, the “daring nature of the Arabic language.” If any daring is to be attached to īltifāṭ, it should, above all be the daring of the language of the Quran, since it employs this feature more extensively and in more variations than does Arabic poetry.20 The hundreds of examples of īltifāṭ in the Quran show clearly that stylistic considerations can overrule grammar, but always for rhetorical purpose and without impairing the sense or causing any ambiguity. Without such rhetorical purpose, departure from the normal rules would be inadmissible (mumtaniʿ) according to the rules of rhetoric, and īltifāṭ can only be used with the proviso that the departure does not cause any confusion or obscurity (labs). Six types of ḥallāfāt have been identified:21

1. Change in person, between first, second, and third person, which is the most common. For example, in Is He Who created the heavens and the earth, and sent down water for you from the sky, through which We make grow beautiful gardens, whose trees it is not for you to make grow [ . . . ]? Is there a god alongside God? (27:60), the shift from third person to the first-person plural of majesty occurs at a crucial point for the listeners (see also 14:4). There is a shift from first to third person in Spend of that which We have provided you before death comes upon one of you and he says, “My Lord, wouldst that Thou grant me reprieve! . . . Yet God will not grant any soul reprieve when its term has come (63:10–11). In this example, the shift makes the final statement independent and absolute; it also indicates the contrast with other gods, who do not have such power.

An example of a shift from third to second person is Praise be to God. . . . Thee we worship and from Thee we seek help (1:2, 5). After establishing that praise is only due to the Creator, Who has such attributes to make Him truly worthy of praise and the only true source of help, worshippers turn to address God for the rest of the sūrah to ask for His Help.

A shift from second to third person can be seen in God has ordained mates for you. . . . He has ordained for you children and grandchildren. . . . Will they then believe in that which is false, and show ingratitude for the blessings of God? (16:72). In this shift God turns to call everyone to witness the ingratitude of the people addressed in this verse.

2. Change in number, between singular, dual, and plural. For example, I swear by the blaming soul. Does man suppose that We shall not gather his bones? Nay! But We are able to fashion even his fingers and toes (75:2–4).

3. Change in addressee. For example, We revealed unto Moses and his brother, “Appoint (you, dual) for thy people houses in Egypt, and make your (plural) houses places of worship and perform the prayer, and give (you, singular) glad tidings unto the believers” (10:87).
4. Change in the tense of the verb. For example, He it is Who created you from dust, then from a drop, then from a blood clot. Then He brings you forth as infants (40:67).

5. Change in case marker. For example, But those among them who are firmly rooted (al-rāsikhūn) in knowledge, and the believers, . . . those who perform (al-muqīmīn) the prayer and give the alms (4:162), where the shift is from the nominative to the accusative, to highlight the importance of performing the prayer in this particular context.

6. Using nouns in place of pronouns. For example, We did not create Heaven and earth and whatsoever is between them in vain; that is the conjecture of those who disbelieve. So woe unto those who disbelieve in the Fire! (38:27). Here the noun is used again, rather than a pronoun, to indicate that it is because they disbelieve that they face the Fire. It also makes the final clause more quotable.

WORD ORDER

In certain cases the word order is fixed in the Arabic sentence, for example, between prepositions and the nouns they govern, and exception, conjunction, and interrogation, all of which must precede the noun. But there are also cases where the order is not fixed, such as the placement of the object in relation to the verb and its subject, and the predicate of the subject of the nominal sentence. In a non–fixed order sentence, the object may be introduced first to serve a stylistic purpose of restriction (ḥāṣr), as in 1:5: Thee we worship (iyyāka naʿbudu). Departure from the original word order in the sentence for a rhetorical purpose is very common in the Quran. Take, for example, 37:86: Is it a perversion, gods apart from (or lower than) God, that you desire (aʾifkan ālihatan dūn Allāh turīdūn)? The rhetorical question shows objection to what the disbelievers do, and the objection is arranged according to the order of strength. The strongest objection is that it is a perversion (aʾifkan); to be doing this with lower gods (ālihatan dūn Allāh) comes second in deserving rejection, and especially as these are below God; and the final objection is to the fact that this is all done of their own volition (turīdūn). An alternative order such as “Do you desire gods apart from God as a perversion?” (aturīdūna ālihatan dūn Allāh ʾifkan) would make the statement and the objection much weaker.
ELLIPSIS
One mechanism to achieve conciseness is omission, or ellipsis (ḥadhf). One aspect of omission, which has been discussed by Abū Muḥammad ʿIzz al-Dīn ibn ʿAbd al-Salām, is that of the mudāf (part of the Ḣidāfa construction). An example of this kind of ellipsis is in 23:102: As for those whose scales are heavy, it is they who shall prosper, an implied possessive noun “with his deeds” that would have appeared after heavy, has been omitted. Sometimes a whole clause is omitted, for example, in 13:31: If there were a Quran whereby the mountains were set in motion, or the earth was cleft, or the dead were made to speak; the implied concluding clause “it would have been this one” is omitted. See also 24:10: Were it not for God’s Bounty upon you, and His Mercy; the concluding clause is not supplied until v. 14.

Memorability
One objective of the language of the Quran and how it is presented is to make it easy to remember. Linguistically this is seen in such features as quotable statements, stories, imagery, balance and contrast, and rhythm and rhyme. Contrast has already been discussed above. The remaining features of Quranic Arabic that contribute to its memorability can be summarized as follows:

PROVERBIAL STATEMENTS
The Quran is well known for its short, proverbial statements (ījāz), as Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh Darāz rightly affirms. The Quran frames its statements in such a way as to make them proverbial and capable of multiple meanings. For example, God provides for whomsoever He will without reckoning (Wa’Llāhu yarzuqu man yashā’u bi-ghayri ḥisāb; 2:212; 3:37; 24:38). In Arabic this can mean, “God provides for whomever He will without counting or being grudging,” or “without calling him to judgment in the Hereafter,” or “without anyone there to criticize or suggest to Him why He should give to this one or that one this much or that,” or “without the recipient expecting to get that much.” Since the context is God’s Power and Generosity, the multiple possible meanings enrich the statement and are all appropriate. This feature makes the Quran quotable for all sorts of situations. If we remember that the Prophet dealt with believers and nonbelievers of his time, that he lived during his mission for twenty-three years, and that he went through various stages from being persecuted to being a head of state, then we can understand why the Quranic text contains quotable statements for a great range of situations. This is one of the ways Muslims encounter the language of the Quran in everyday life.

STORIES AND PARABLES
The Quran makes frequent use of stories and parables. Some of the best known of these are the stories of earlier prophets, such as Noah, Joseph, Moses, and Jesus, scattered throughout the text. Other examples of stories are those of the Companions of the Cave and others in Sūrah 18; Korah (28:76–83); the owners of the garden (68:17–32); the man with two gardens (18:32–43); Solomon and the ant, and Solomon and the queen of Sheba (27:15–44); and the people of Sheba (34:15–21). These are always used to illustrate arguments and ideas.

IMAGERY
The use of symbolic imagery has been recognized as one of the most frequent, marked, and effective literary and rhetorical devices in the Quran. One of the most famous aggregations of images and symbols is to be found in the Light Verse and the verse that follows:

\[
\text{God is the Light of the heavens and the earth. The parable of His Light is as a niche wherein is a lamp. The lamp is in a glass. The glass is as a shining star kindled from a blessed olive tree, neither of the East nor of the West. Its oil would well-nigh shine forth, even if no fire had touched it. Light upon light. . . . [It is] in houses . . . wherein His Name is remembered. (24:35–36)}
\]

Comparison is made between the deeds of good people and those of people who disbelieve, which are

\[
\text{like a mirage upon a desert plain which a thirsty man supposes is water, till when he comes upon it, he does not find it to be anything, but finds God there. He will then pay him his reckoning in full. . . . Or like the darkness of a fathomless sea, covered by waves with waves above them and clouds above them—darknesses, one above the other. When one puts out one’s hand, he can hardly see it. He for} whom God has not appointed any light has no light. (24:39–40)

To give but one more example: That Day We shall roll up the sky like the rolling of scrolls for writings (21:104).

RHYTHM
Rhythm is a very obvious feature of the language of the Quran, not only in the early, short sūrah(s), such as 79, 92, 99, and 100, but even in the longest sūrah, 2. Take 79:1–5, for example: Wa’l-nāziʾāti gharqā, wa’l-nāshiṭāti nashṭā, wa’l-sābihāti sabḥā, fa’l-sābiqāti sabqā, fa’l-mudabbirāti amrā. Try sounding it out. Even if you do not pronounce the Arabic syllables correctly, you will hear an unmistakable rhythm. Tammām Ḥassān (d. 1432/2011) analyzed the stress patterns in the Quran and showed that the distance between each two successive major stresses is equal or nearly so, and this produces a marked rhythm. For instance:

Aw ka-ṣayyibin min al-samāʾī fihi ẓulumātun wa-raʿdun wa-barqun yajʿalūna aṣābiʿahum fī ādhānihim min al-ṣawāʾiqi ḥadharāʾl-mawti waʾLlāhu muḥīṭun biʾl-kāfirīn. (2:19)

RHYME
Rhyme at the end of verses is a consistent stylistic feature in the Quran, which has an aesthetic effect. It also gives finality to the statements and accords with the general feature of classification and generalization, frequently using the plural endings -ūn and -īn. The ending of the verse can be an integral part of it (as in Sūrah 1) or a related comment (4:34–35: InnaʾLlāha kāna ʿāliyyān kabīra. . . InnaʾLlāha kāna ʿalīmān khabīra; Truly God is Exalted, Great. . . Truly God is Knowing, Aware); both form part of the total meaning of the verse and are not just for embellishment. In addition to the rhyme, the frequent occurrence of long vowels and diphthongs, and nasalization add further to the sound effect.

THE ENDURING QURAN
These linguistic and stylistic qualities characteristic of the language of the Quran have been seen as the marks of great eloquence and used in Arabic literature throughout the ages. As noted above, the Quran was the starting point for all the branches of Arabic language scholarship. It was seen as a main source of literary language and style. All books on rhetoric (balāghah) take their examples mainly from the Quran. Oratory in Arabic relies for its effective quotations on the Quran. Quranic quotations occur not only in the works of classical writers, but also in modern ones. Nobel Prize–winner Naguib Mahfouz (d. 1427/2006), who learned the Quran as a child and continued to read it throughout his life, employed Quranic words and phrases verbatim in his early novels, where scores and even hundreds occur, and continued to do so, if more subtly, toward the end of his career.31

The Effects of Quranic Arabic on Other Muslim Languages and Literatures

It was the Quran that took Arabic outside the Arabian Peninsula, making it an international language that displaced local languages in what are now the Arab countries and for several centuries in Muslim Spain. In Persia, Arabic became the dominant written language for several centuries, until Persian was reintroduced as the official language under the Samanids.

In fact, what is called the Persian language today was born from the introduction of Quranic Arabic terms into Middle Persian (prevalent during the Sassanid period up to the seventh century). During the Islamic period after the conquest of Persia by the Arab armies, Persians played a major role in the exposition of Arabic grammar; they also wrote numerous works in nearly every field in Arabic and continued to do so even after Persian became the literary and scholarly language of the eastern regions of the Islamic world. It was mostly these scholars, who were masters of Quranic Arabic, who introduced so many words and expressions from the Quran into Persian. The formal structure of the Quran even influenced Persian prosody. And it was mostly through Persian that Arabic words penetrated into languages of the Indian subcontinent such as Sindhi, Punjabi, Gujarati, Bengali, and Urdu,32 not to speak of Iranian languages such as Kurdish and Pashto.

However, even when Arabic ceased to be the primary language of certain parts of the Muslim world, it remained a major source of vocabulary for many languages such as Berber, Swahili, Hausa, Malay, and Indonesian. “In all Islamic countries the influence of Arabic is pervasive, because of the highly language-specific nature of Islam; since the revealed book was inimitable, it could not be translated.”

In Africa, “the expansion of Islam brought many of the cultures in the northern half of the continent under the Islamic sphere of influence, which resulted in hundreds of loanwords in the domain of religion, culture, and science.”

In Hausa, the Quranic and other Islamic elements show far-reaching effect, and songs of preaching (waʿazī, Arabic waʿẓ) constitute what is probably the biggest category in Hausa poetry.

Likewise, the influence of the Quran on Swahili literature in East Africa has been profound. The Quran in its text “with its sūrahs, formulas, etc., and the influence of Islam as a religion with its values, ethics, stories, and most effectively, poetry, are the areas that bear the most influence.”

The name for the three genres of Swahili literature, the novel (riwāya), drama (tamthilia), and poetry (shairi), are all Arabic. Approximately 50 percent of the vocabulary of Swahili derives etymologically from Arabic.

In the Ottoman Empire, Turkish became the official language of the state, but at the same time Persian and Arabic were maintained as the languages of culture. “Between the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries, the lexical material of Turkish was almost completely taken from Arabic and Persian.” Even after Ataturk’s attempt to purify the Turkish language of Arabic and Persian terms, a large number of loanwords from these languages (or from Arabic through Persian) are still present.

It can be said with certainty that “of all the languages with which Arabic came into contact, Persian is the one that was most influenced in this process.” As for the Indian subcontinent, “the impact of Arabic on Persian and other modern Indian languages strongly correlates with the degree of Islamization which their speakers underwent.” In Bangladesh “there is a strong tendency to replace older Sanskrit words with Arabic/Persian loans, especially in the domain of religion.” In Indonesia, where the vast majority are Muslims, Arabic is regarded as the sacred language of their religion, as it is elsewhere in the Islamic world, and its position as a religious language is unshaken. Most Indonesians and also Malaysians have a rudimentary knowledge of Arabic because of their Quranic training.

In Malay literature, stories such as Hikayat Iskandar Dzulkarnain (from 18:83–98) as well as works of moral guidance and advice show the influence of the Quran and its language. One very obvious example of the influence of religious Arabic is the celebrated poem by Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad ibn Saʿīd al-Būṣīrī (d. 695/1294) in praise of the Prophet known as the Burdah. This has been adopted as part of the literature of nearly all Muslim peoples of Asia and Africa, has been repeatedly performed, and has gained much acclaim. Moreover, Quranic vocabulary is an important part of this celebrated poem.

The Quran in Daily Life and in Islamic Studies

The Quran was, from the beginning, committed to memory by the first Muslims. Throughout Islamic history, many Muslims, both Arabic-speaking and non-Arabic-speaking, men, women, and children, have memorized and continued to memorize the whole Quran or large parts of it. Nowadays there are international Quranic recitation competitions held in Malaysia, Indonesia, and Iran, to name but a few countries, sometimes state-funded. The first sūrah of the Quran, al-Fāṭiḥah, which is an essential part of the ritual canonical prayers, is learned and read in Arabic by Muslims in all parts of the world. This particular sūrah is recited in Arabic by practicing Muslims at least seventeen times a day; moreover, other verses and phrases from the Quran in Arabic are incorporated into the everyday lives of not only Arabic-speaking, but also non-Arabic-speaking Muslims.

In addition to reciting al-Fāṭiḥah in Arabic, Muslims all over the world perform all their daily ritual prayers in Arabic in imitation of the Prophet’s example and in keeping with unbroken tradition. In recent times, Muslims have settled in every continent, including Europe and America. Mosque schools are set up for their children, where the Quran is taught in its original Arabic. It is remarkable that many Muslims from non-Arab areas such as South Asia, Turkey, and Africa insist on having a Friday sermon during the congregational prayers in Arabic from the pulpits of mosques in Europe and America, even if they have additional sermons in the local languages. Despite the growing body of Muslim writing on Islam in European languages, Arabic, the language of the Quran, still occupies a privileged position that cannot be replaced by any other language.

If a group of ten Muslims come together from differing linguistic backgrounds, with no common language, they can all pray together, as it is the same Arabic prayer that they all perform. Any of the men among them is, moreover, eligible to lead the prayer. They will also find that they share in common a large amount of Quranic vocabulary in Arabic. As the Quran and Hadīth are in Arabic and are the fundamental sources of Islamic Law and teachings, the main classical works of the different schools of law, which are followed to this day, were all written originally in Arabic. This means that advanced Quranic and Islamic studies in non-Arab Muslim countries are based on Arabic texts written by the followers of all the various schools, that is, Shāfiʿī in Egypt and Southeast Asia, for instance, Ḥanafī in South Asia and Turkey, Jaʿfarī in Iran and Iraq, Ḥanbalī in Saudi Arabia, and Mālikī in North and West Africa. Thus the Quran has kept Arabic alive in the religious scholarship of non-Arab Muslims.

A great service to the Arabic language and the study of the Quran and the Islamic sciences in general was actually rendered by non-Arab Muslims. The most striking example here is Sībawayh (Sībūyah in Persian; d. ca. 174/790), who was a Persian; his magnum opus, al-Kitāb, has been the first reference point for Arab grammarians throughout the ages. Muslims in the lands of Persia and beyond have rendered great service to Arabic grammar, phonology, tafsīr, and balāghah and have composed works that stand among the best writings in Arabic in Islam. One need only mention such names as al-Zamakhsharī, al-Jurjānī, al-Rāzī, and Ibn Jinnī for Quranic commentary; al-Bukhārī, al-Tirmidhī, and al-Nasāʾī for Ḥadīth literature; Abū Ḥanīfah and al-Jaṣṣāṣ for jurisprudence (fiqh); and the likes of al-Fārābī, Ibn Sīnā, and al-Bīrūnī for other sciences. All these works were written to serve the Quran and Islam.

Even when the people of Persia returned to writing in Persian, the influence of the language of the Quran remained a very prominent feature of their language. It is estimated that even now between 50 and 60 percent of the Persian vocabulary is still derived from Arabic. Arabic affected not only the vocabulary of Persian, which is an Indo-European language, but also the grammar—a phenomenon that is almost an exception to the way contacts between languages work. The Persian science of balāghah was, from the beginning, modeled completely upon Arabic balāghah, which, as seen above, was developed for the study of the language of the Quran. The greatest Persian Sufi poet, Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī (d. 672/1273), studied Arabic and religious sciences before turning to Sufism and even wrote a number of poems in Arabic. The great Persian poet Ḥāfīz of Shīrāz (d. 792/1389), as his name indicates, learned the Arabic Quran by heart and taught exegesis. Persian Sufi poets often employed Quranic themes in their writing. A striking example is ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Jāmī’s (d. 898/1492) treatment of the theme of Yūsuf and Zulaykhā. Even as late as the eleventh/seventeenth century we find such an important author as Mullā Ṣadrā (d. 1050/1640) writing his greatest works on philosophy and Quranic commentary in Arabic. As already mentioned, to a great extent it was thanks to Persian that Arabic words, mostly of Quranic origin, found their way into other languages such as Urdu, Ottoman Turkish, and even Malay.

The Persians and the Turks, among others, continue to make a great contribution to Arabic calligraphy. Verses from the Quran form the main theme of calligraphy and have traditionally adorned mosques and other religious buildings as well as decorative items to hang in homes and offices. They bring the Quranic statements to the attention of Muslims in many situations. For example, on entering a court of justice, Muslims may read in Arabic calligraphy, If you judge between men, to do so with justice (4:58); in the parliament, Their affair being counsel among them (42:38); in a military academy, Prepare for them what you can of strength [of arms] (8:60); on a marriage certificate, Among His signs is that He created mates for you from among yourselves, that you might find rest in them, and He established affection and mercy between you (30:21); on drinking cups, Their Lord shall give them to drink of a drink most pure (76:21); on a freight van in Cairo, the prayer said by Noah when his people boarded the ark, In the Name of God be its coursing and its mooring (11:41); at the Cairo airport, Joseph’s statement to his parents, Enter Egypt in security, if God wills! (12:99); in many mosques, Turn thy face toward the Sacred Mosque (2:144); and in schools, My Lord! Increase me in knowledge! (20:114). Such calligraphic works, written in Arabic and drawn from the Quran, are found in all parts of the Muslim world, which keeps Arabic visible, beautiful, and related to the Divine text of the Quran. It is the Quran that gives the Arabic language this unique position and makes Muslims return to it again and again.

The recent Islamic resurgence has also had an effect on the teaching of Arabic in a number of Muslim countries. In Pakistan, in 1977, under President Zia al-Haqq the study of Arabic was made compulsory in schools; although this has not been strictly maintained by later governments, Islamic studies (Islāmiyyāt) are still compulsory up to the level of the Bachelor of Arts degree in all Pakistani educational institutions, and this naturally involves knowledge of Quranic Arabic. The already compulsory study of Arabic in Iranian schools was given more emphasis following the Islamic Revolution of 1979, and Arabic is also part of the curriculum of madrasahs throughout the Islamic world, both in the Middle East and elsewhere. Beyond this domain, reformers and preachers in the Arab and Muslim world now derive inspiration from the first command, “Read!” or “Recite!” in their campaigns for a new educational revival among Muslims. As mentioned at the beginning of this article, the first word of the Quranic text to be revealed was iqra. This first instruction, to Recite in the Name of thy Lord (96:1), lives on in the consciousness of Muslims and continues to influence their languages and literature. The impact of the Quran on Arabic and other Islamic languages is an enduring reality that continues to influence the life of Muslims on all levels.
The Quranic interpretive tradition, tafsīr, is one of the most voluminous of Islamic literary genres, second only to the legal tradition. All generations of Muslims in nearly every Islamic land have consistently produced Quranic commentaries that reflect their outlook on fundamental issues confronting Muslim societies, making this genre a continuous record of what Muslims of different lands and different ages have thought on various topics. Yet it is also the most unpredictable of genres: unlike other Islamic sciences, which systematized their methodological underpinnings, the Quranic commentary tradition never established unanimous rules for how to interpret the Quran. There was more than one hermeneutical theory in medieval Islam. Indeed, most commentators availed themselves of more than one method in the same work. Competition invariably led to extensive exchange among theological camps and schools. Nonetheless, in the classical period, the tafsīr tradition displayed far more unity than in the modern period. Many modern exegetes have abandoned the dictates and methodologies of the classical tradition, interpreting the Quran according to ideological stances that reduce the subtleties of the revelation to the predilections of human beings in the present world.

Difficulties in Assessing the Literature

Most of the Western scholarly studies available today are devoted to the earliest phase of the Quranic exegetical tradition, the pre-Ṭabarī (Muḥammad ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī, d. 310/923) phase. There are noticeably fewer studies on classical exegesis, or post-Ṭabarī literature.¹ There are several reasons for this state of affairs. Perhaps the first is the sheer volume of the material at hand; many of the classical commentaries—whether published or in manuscript form—run to thousands of pages or folios. This vast literature presents us with methodological problems about how to approach and study it. Indeed, tafsīr studies still lack the basic tools that would allow scholars the possibility of assessing the parameters of the field. We have neither a complete inventory of tafsīr works, nor, apart from a few monograph studies on some famous exegetes, detailed studies of individual authors or works. As a result, we have thus far been unable to develop an accurate outline of the historical development of tafsīr.

The second reason that has so far stood in the way of a systematic approach to the field is that the scholarly investigation of classical tafsīr has been on the whole constrained by what is available in print. The titles that remain confined to manuscript form are so numerous that any notion that what already exists in print is sufficiently representative to enable us to draw a picture of the genre should be forsaken. There are bound to be significant and seminal works of tafsīr that are still untouched, works whose assessment would not only fill gaps in our knowledge of the history of this genre, but are also likely to modify what we think of the cultural significance of tafsīr.

Let me give a stark example of this situation. Recently the Quranic commentary of Abū Maṣūr al-Māturīdī (d. 333/944), the founder of the Māturīdī Sunni school of theology, has been published in ten volumes. Although the work has been discussed before in an article by Manfred Götz and was the subject of a doctoral dissertation by Muhammad Rahman, which was published in English, scholars continue to discuss the history of tafsīr as if this work did not exist. One cursory glance at this work is sufficient to make us realize that, when fully investigated, it will radically change the way we perceive the development of early Quranic commentaries. Al-Māturīdī—“the famous unknown,” as Ulrich Rudolph describes him—was a contemporary of al-Ṭabarī, and they both represent different hermeneutical traditions. He is as significant a witness to the history of early tafsīr as al-Ṭabarī. Thus even the early period, the most studied part of tafsīr history, is, because of modern Western academia’s haphazard method of studying tafsīr, insufficiently investigated, and much of what we have said to characterize it needs reevaluation.

The accounts of the tradition that have been written by modern Muslim scholars of tafsīr, despite all their drawbacks—guided as they are by a prescriptive analysis of the tradition—are currently the most exhaustive that we have. Unfortunately, the long history of this genre, spanning fourteen centuries, means that the Muslim scholarly tradition has gone through many phases of internal reassessment along with what inevitably accompanies such a process: on the one hand, periodic downgrading of the significance of once very influential works and in some cases even the disowning of them and, on the other, the resurrection of marginal works that were never previously considered to be of substance. Thus the Quranic commentary of Ḥāmad ibn Muḥammad al-Thaʿlabī (d. 427/1035), once an influential work, is now deemed worthless among Sunni scholars and unfit for publication; it was published for the first time only recently through the efforts of Shiite scholars. Meanwhile, an author like Ibn Abī Ḥātim al-Rāzī (d. 327/938), a rather minor figure in the history of the field, was resuscitated and given new significance through the efforts of modern Salafī scholars who were influenced by the positive assessment of the merit of his work by Ḥāmad ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728/1328). We cannot therefore rely solely on histories by partisans of the tradition to point us toward whom and what to research.

To give another example of how different elements work to impede the scholarly process of assessing this literature, one can cite the case of superglosses, or what is known in Arabic as ḥawāshī. Like much of the scholastic tradition in Islam, the tafsīr tradition had an active subgenre of supercommentaries that were written primarily on two Quranic commentaries used in the teaching of tafsīr, the al-Kashshāf ʿan ḥaqāʾiq al-tanzīl (The Unveiler of the Truths of Revelation) of Maḥmūd ibn Ṭalib ibn Zāmakhsīrī (d. 538/1144) and the Anwār al-tanzīl (The Lights of Revelation) of ʿAbd Allāh ibn ʿUmar al-Bayḍāwī (d. 685/1286), and to a lesser extent on a third commentary, Tafsīr al-Jalālāyん (Commentary of the Two Jalāl al-Dīns), by Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505) and his teacher, Jalāl al-Dīn al-Maḥallī (d. 864/1459). In the thirteenth/nineteenth and early fourteenth/twentieth centuries, before the Romantic notions of a medieval Islamic decline and decadence penetrated the traditional Muslim establishments, publishing houses in the Islamic world (including Istanbul, the center of Ottoman seminary education) were busy issuing many of the voluminous “medieval” glosses on tafsīr works. They were an essential part of the madrasah curriculum and were considered part and parcel of the exegetical tradition, not medieval corruptions of a once classical tradition. As a matter of fact, al-Kashshāf of al-Zamakhsharī and Anwār al-tanzīl of al-Bayḍāwī were usually printed with their glosses or refutations.

Publishing of new glosses has all but stopped, a regrettable development, but unless we have access to this subgenre of tafsīr, which became the dominant form of writing exegetical works after the seventh century AH, we shall remain severely hampered in our efforts to write any meaningful history of the genre.
If we add to this the fact that almost no scholarly interest has ever been shown in glosses by modern academics, we have a predicament in the field that will be hard to get rid of: the glosses are not being published (out of sight) and scholars are not interested in studying them (out of mind).\(^{12}\)

Yet perhaps the main reason so little attention is given to the classical period of exegesis, in contrast to the early period, is epistemological. Historical scholarship on origins is thought to hold for us the promise of offering the most important explanation of the process of development. A study of the early period of the tradition has the added presumed value that one is studying the creative period of the tradition, in contradistinction to the classical period, which is assumed by modern scholars to be both transparent—the material is not lost, as the early material is—and redundant, because tafsîr in the classical period consists of nothing but recopying and recycling the early material. Unless we abandon epistemological obsessions with origins and Romantic notions of what constitutes originality, the study of classical tafsîr will unfortunately remain marginal. Such biases lead us to neglect some of the most fascinating and original works produced in Islamic civilization, works that were crucial to forming the intellectual outlook of the traditional educated elite.

A corollary of our not taking the post-Ṭabarî period of exegesis seriously is that we have also treated classical tafsîr works first and foremost as sources of information about matters that were not the primary focus of these works. Classical tafsîr works, when consulted by modern scholars, are usually used to shed light on fields of inquiry that are not concerned with hermeneutics. Tafsîr studies must refocus on hermeneutical issues and cease to consider these works as ancillary sources not worthy of attention on their own. Since the primary purpose of these works was exegetical, our primary scholarly preoccupation has been to reflect that reality. Tafsîr studies have not as yet experienced the turn to hermeneutics that Jewish midrash studies have experienced since the 1980s.

An Outline of Tafsîr

The remainder of this essay discusses the methods used by classical commentators, offers a classification of the works produced, and attempts to explore the function and aim of tafsîr. Moreover, it highlights some commentators not usually discussed before, if only to show the richness of this tradition.
Writing at the end of the fourth/tenth century, the Muʿtazilite theologian and judge (qāḍī) Ābd al-Jabbār (d. 415/1025) gave a sketch of the existing methods of Quranic interpretation. He spoke of those who claimed that the Quran should not be interpreted, but merely believed in and recited, those who maintained that it has a meaning, but that it was impossible to establish what that meaning was; and those who insisted that either only the Prophet or only the first three generations of Muslims could interpret the meaning of the Quran. A different camp insisted that the Quran has an inner meaning, a bāṭin, distinct from its surface meaning, but opinions varied about who could know that inner meaning; some said scholars, some thought the Prophet, and some said also the Shiite Imams. Others denied the existence of an inner layer of meaning and believed that only the Imam could know the outer meaning of the Quran.

The list given by Ābd al-Jabbār is instructive not because it is an objective description of the reality in his time, but because it represents the first systematic attempt to distinguish the different hermeneutical methods of early Islam. He sets forth the different methods in order to substantiate his claim that they are incoherent and that the only logical and defensible hermeneutical method to use is the philological one. Ābd al-Jabbār would like us to think that the Muʿtazilites were the only advocates of philology, which was of course not the case.

Broadly speaking, the methods listed by Ābd al-Jabbār reflected the methods adopted by some camps—the radical fringe camps, whether Sunni or Shiite—whose positions were never dominant in the classical, or post-Ṭabarī, period. These radical positions on how to approach the Quran would, however, be retained, but only as part of other methods. They would never be allowed supremacy in the manner that Ābd al-Jabbār described. Nevertheless they remained available options and would every so often erupt on the scene as if from nowhere and attempt to claim the sole authority to interpret the Quran.

Two distinct issues were raised by Ābd al-Jabbār’s list. Can one interpret the Quran, and if so, with what method? Apart from Ābd al-Jabbār’s list, it is evident from the literary activities we have inherited that all Muslim schools believed in the interpretability of the Quran and each established one or more methods to arrive at the meanings of the Word of God. Sooner or later all Muslim schools came to believe that there was a role for the individual exegete in the interpretation of the Quran. The authority to interpret the Quran would never be limited solely to the Prophet, the Imams, or the early generations. What Abd al-Jabbār did not make clear was that he was describing the extreme views among the exegetes and not the mainstream camps, which were never fully hermetic; the fact of the matter is that few if any exegetes adhered to only one of the rigid methods he listed. All major schools shared, to varying degrees, some aspects of the different available methods. What existed was a variety of theories that were shared by most.

What were the methods used in classical Quranic interpretation? At the center of the craft of Quranic commentary stands the philological method. Philology, which was formulated as a science early in Islamic culture, proved to be such a force that sooner or later all major Islamic schools had to answer to its overwhelming dominance as the hermeneutical paradigm. Playing by the rule of philology became a must for any system, if it were to survive and withstand pressure from other competing schools. The Sunnis and soon the Shiites adopted the philological method in their Quranic commentaries, but they were not so naive as to cede to it full control. Indeed, neither were the Mu`tazilites. Although all schools adopted philology into an already existing pattern, each also attempted to curb philology in order to preserve the theological coherence it was trying to present.

The history of Quranic commentary, hence, is the history of the interaction between philology and the other hermeneutical paradigms already in existence. This creative tension stood behind and explains the never-ending cycle of productivity: the tafsīr genre is one of the most complex of Islamic literatures precisely because of the precarious position of each school’s claims in light of the probing eyes of philology. The dominance of philology meant that it presented an internal threat to each school, since each school was left with little choice but to adopt philology as the main method for interpretation; thus tafsīr was an unstable field even inside the confines of each traditional Islamic school. Proponents of each school were cognizant of the danger that philology presented, and they repeatedly attempted, without much success, to rid their systems of the dominance of philology.

The Sunni camp gave to the exegetical material claiming to come from the Prophet, the Companions, and their Followers undisputed authority in the hierarchy of methods. Sunnism thus preserved some aspects of the early position of its proponents—that only Muhammad or his immediate followers could interpret the Quran. The Prophetic exegetical lore was canonized in the Sunni Hadīth collections under chapters specifically assigned to tafsīr. The material from the Companions and their Followers was the backbone of the exegetical Sunni lore and was collected first in individual works and finally summed up in the commentaries of al-Ṭabarī and al-Thaʿlabī.

But this inherited material constituted only one part of the Sunni exegetical outlook. The philological works that had been meanwhile produced on the Quran by grammarians were also incorporated. Thus all the works of pre-Ṭabarī grammarians on the Quran were admitted into his commentary, grammarians like al-Farrāʾ (d. 207/822) and Abū ʿUbaydah (d. 210/825); and all pre-Thaʿlabī grammarians who were not used by al-Ṭabarī, for example, al-Zajjāj (d. 311/923), were incorporated into al-Thaʿlabī’s Quranic commentary. In this sense Sunnism was claiming that there was no contradiction between what its early founders had said about the Quran and what grammarians were stating—even when many of the grammarians were not Sunni scholars. Sunnism was based on the plain reading of the Quran, or so the claim went.

This understanding of how Sunni hermeneutics developed is the one we are familiar with, if only because of its predominance both in the early phase of the tradition and because of the publication of al-Ṭabarī’s work and later of al-Thaʿlabī’s. But it was not the only Sunni approach. The recently published work of al-Māturīdī makes it clear now that a blatantly theological approach was also devised to inoculate Sunnism against its adversaries. Thus in addition to the voice of the founding fathers of Sunnism, al-Māturīdī gave prominence to his own theological interpretation of the Quran. Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210), the leading theological-philosophical commentator on the Quran, thus has a much earlier antecedent in the tradition than we have so far realized. Tafsīr was thus from early on the medium through which Sunnism built its intellectual defenses against its adversaries.

It has become evident that the Sunni hermeneutical outlook was one of integration rather than exclusion. Any threat to the supremacy of the Sunni outlook should, if at all possible, be incorporated into the Sunni fold, and this was best done through Quranic commentary. Thus when Sufi sensibility became too dominant and too widespread an outlook, exoteric Sunnism opted to legitimize this approach to the Quran rather than attempt to resist the Sufi approach. This was done despite the evident contradiction between the Sufi hermeneutics—which spoke of an inner meaning (bāṭin) to the Quran that was not the same as the outer meaning (ẓāhir)—and the fundamental claim of philology that there was no inner meaning for a text beyond its surface structure. Al-Thaʿlabī, who studied with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī (d. 412/1021), the
The author of Ḥaqqāʾiq al-tafsīr (The Realities of Exegesis), the most influential early Sufi Quranic commentary, incorporated much of the Sufi interpretive material into what was a mainstream Sunni work. One generation later, Abuʾl-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (d. 465/1072) was writing Sufi Quranic commentaries as if that is how Sunnis always composed tafsīr. Sunnism rarely bothered to offer a coherent defense of this contradiction in its hermeneutical heritage. It pretended that this is how things were always done!

Each such resolution, however, carries with it the seeds of its destruction; philology could rebel and traditionalism could decide to suffocate, while mysticism in its extreme form could opt for an antinomian disregard for the writ of the law. These were options available to Sunni exegetes, and certain camps at different historical junctures pursued them to many possible ends. Why put up with inherited material if philology proves them wrong and is ultimately capable of discovering the true meaning of any text, even the Divine? This was of course the supposed Muʿtazilite position, but Sunnism was capable of such variations, and it fostered a strong philological exegetical current that attempted to undo the predominance of the inherited traditions. The attraction of this path was that it allowed Sunnism to seem as intellectually solid as any Muʿtazilite system. The major instigator of this rebellion was Abuʾl-Ḥasan al-Wāḥidī (d. 468/1076) in his magnum opus, al-Basīṭ, which is still unedited. It is not that traditional material was fully jettisoned, so much as drowned in a flood of a philological interpretation. Quranic commentaries were reading now like grammar handbooks and not like works of Ḥadīth. The belligerent tone of al-Wāḥidī would eventually be dropped; there was no need to rub it in the faces of fellow traditionalist Sunni exegetes. Those who knew were aware not to rock the boat; yet an accomplished exegete such as Abū Ḥayyān al-Gharnāṭī (d. 745/1344) did not mince his words when pushed to the wall by the advocates of the traditionalist Sunni camp, those who called for the supremacy of the inherited material over and above philology. He would growl at the inanity of fellow Sunni traditionalist exegetes and mock the noble fathers they so admired if need be! But on the whole there was a guarded deference to the early Sunni layer, and homage was always paid to it even by radical grammarians. Other major figures in this current were al-Samīn al-Ḥalabī (d. 756/1355) and Ibn ʿĀdil al-Dimashqī (d. 880/1475), bulwarks of the philological method and the mainstay of intellectual hermeneutics of classical Islam.

The traditionalist camp was meanwhile biding its time. The early full-fledged Quranic commentaries that gave prominence to inherited material over and above philology were presented in a meek voice, as one hermeneutical option among many and not as the only way to compose tafsīr. Ibn Abī Ḥātim al-Rāzī (d. 327/938) was the first, it seems, to write a commentary in which inherited material was the only material to be offered. This was done not to unseat the mainstream method, but simply as a supplementary work. So also, it seems, did Ibn Mardawayh (d. 401/1010), whose work is lost. These works were on the fringe of the Sunni classical tradition, so much so that even the championship of Ibn Taymiyyah and the devotion of al-Suyūṭī could not save these works from being lost.

It was Ibn Taymiyyah who laid the intellectual foundation for this trend. His call, written in a hermeneutical manifesto, to solidify the traditionalist current in tafsīr was first answered by his student Ismāʿīl ibn ʿUmar ibn Kathīr (d. 774/1373) in his Tafsīr ibn Kathīr. Yet even Ibn Kathīr was unable to escape the burden of the established method for writing Quranic commentaries and ended up updating al-Ṭabarī by incorporating Ibn Abī Ḥātim al-Rāzī and a smattering of Prophetic traditions. Ibn Kathīr was, however, never noticed by the mainstream exegetical tradition, at least not until the thirteenth/nineteenth century. It was al-Suyūṭī who wrote the masterpiece of the traditionalist camp titled al-Durr al-manthūr (The Precious Pearl). Having surfaced so late, this traditionalist current never managed to overrun the manner in which tafsīr was done—at least not till the fourteenth/twentieth century. Sunni medieval and early modern hermeneutics remained attached to the solution devised by al-Ṭabarī and al-Thaʿlabī, in which the blending of the different methods available was the norm.

It has been mentioned that tafsīr was remarkably diverse and dynamic in its own methods. For example, if one read all the output in tafsīr up to the time of Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210) and then picked up his Quranic commentary, Mafāṭīḥ al-ghayb (Keys of the Unseen, also known as al-Tafsīr al-kabīr, or The Great Commentary), one would be astounded to realize that nothing in the tafsīr tradition could have prepared one to read this work. Coming to the work from the mainstream tafsīr tradition, or from the fringe for that matter, one would find the work simply unintelligible. Had one read works of philosophers and theologians such as Abū ʿAlī ibn Sīnā (Avicenna, d. 428/1037) and Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (d. 505/1111), however, then the work would be readily comprehensible.
The transformation of the craft of tafsīr into a philosophical-theological enterprise at the hands of Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī is a good example that illustrates the role of tafsīr in the intellectual history of Islam. However, in order to fulfill the function of tafsīr, al-Rāzī was forced to forgo all previous methods of tafsīr and rely on a science never before used for exegeses. Sunnism had already offered many solutions to the philosophical challenge, from fully Islamicizing it to fully rejecting it. Yet apparently nothing received the imprimatur of orthodoxy unless it became part of tafsīr. In this sense tafsīr was making an understanding of the entire world seem to issue from the Quran.

The history of Shiite Quranic commentary mirrors that of the Sunni tradition. The early phase of Shiite tafsīr was as stridently partisan as that of Sunnism. The early Shiite hermeneutical practice was based on two premises, both formulated in contradistinction to the Sunni theory. The first was that the language of the Quran has an inner meaning (bāṭīn) in addition to the literal meaning (ẓāhir). The second premise was that this inner meaning can only be made manifest through the interpretations offered by the Imams (the Divinely guided leaders of the community). The two major figures in early Shiite exegesis are Furāt ibn Furāt al-Kūfī (d. ca. 310/922) and ʿAlī ibn Ibrāhīm al-Qummī (d. 328/939). When read thus, the Quran spoke of the truth of the claims of the Shiites and the supremacy of the role of the Imam along with the Prophet for salvation.

The classical phase of Shiite Quranic commentary, however, adopted the major strategy of Sunni hermeneutics: the supremacy of philology as a supporting tool for the theological claims of the school. Later on, much of the radicalism of the early Shiite exegetes was simply dropped or explained away, most notably the suspicion raised about the integrity of the codex of the Quran. Two great scholars represent this stage: Muḥammad ibn Ḥasan al-Ṭūsī (d. 460/1067) and Abū ʿAlī al-Ṭabrisī (d. 548/1153–54), whose respective works, al-Tībyān fi tafsīr al-Qurʾān (Elucidation Regarding the Exegesis of the Quran) and Majmaʿ al-bayān fi tafsīr al-Qurʾān (Confluence of Elucidation in the Exegesis of the Quran), remain foundational in the Shiite tradition. The early phase of the tradition, however, refused to disappear. Indeed, it witnessed a major comeback in Safavid Iran with the resurgence of a new Shiite dynasty and the flourishing of Shiite scholarship. In fact, the last major tafsīr written in the classical style is that of the Shiite scholar Muḥammad Ḥusayn Ṭabarzī (d. 1401/1981), al-Mīzān fi tafsīr al-Qurʾān (The Balance in the Exegesis of the Quran), which combines elements of al-Ṭūsī, al-Ṭabrisī, and Fakhr al-Dīn al-
This so far has been a sketch of the genre, a bare outline that attempts to give a narrative of its development and evolution. Yet it can purport to be at most a provisional outline. Not even the published corpus of tafsīr has been fully analyzed, let alone the works that are still unpublished. The caveat must be repeated that we are far from any meaningful history of the genre, and our own generalizations are often proven wrong after the slightest investigation.

Another example of the significance of tafsīr for our understanding of Islamic religious history can be given here. One of the most researched fields in Islamic studies is the interaction between Islam and Christianity, on the one hand, and Islam and Judaism, on the other. The vast literature on this topic has never offered us an example of a Muslim using the Bible for religious purposes. The old wisdom was that because of the rise of the doctrine of tahrīf, or alteration, the idea that the Bible has been corrupted, Muslims never used it for guidance or as a source of truth. When medieval Muslims used the Bible, it was either for polemics or apologetics. Yet a medieval exegete, Abu’l-Hasan Ibrāhīm al-Biqāʿī (d. 885/1480), decided to use the Bible as a source to interpret the Quran. He incorporated large sections of the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament into his Quranic commentary in order to elucidate the Quran, despite the objections of some major scholars of his time.\(^\text{21}\) Al-Biqāʿī overturned a ban on the use of the Bible and enshrined it in tafsīr as a holy text for Muslims to read. The reinvestigation of a single Quranic commentary thus overturns all received wisdom as to how Muslims interacted with the Bible.

Types of Quranic Commentaries

The works produced in the tafsīr tradition may be divided into three categories based on their function and degree of comprehension. Such a division avoids the problems associated with attempts made so far to divide works according to methods or content, such as that of Ignaz Goldziher, who divided the commentary tradition into discrete modes such as grammatical, doctrinal, mystical, sectarian, and modern.\(^\text{22}\) The problem with such an approach is that most Quranic commentaries use more than one method and are concerned with more than one issue.

The first category of tafsīr works is what I term encyclopedic commentaries. These were commentaries written at crucial moments in the history of the genre... and were usually the culmination of trends in the field. They acted as repositories of material and were usually very catholic in their outlook, aiming to include as many new views as possible. Encyclopedic commentaries were the locus in which Sunnism and Shiism attempted to answer the challenges posed to the Quran by insisting that the Quran had answered those challenges already. Among the major figures who wrote such works were al-Māturīdī, al-Ṭabarī, al-Tha‘labī, al-Ṭusī, al-Ṭabrisī, Abu’l-Futūh al-Rāzī (d. 525/1131), Ibn ʿAthiyyah (ʿAbd al-Ḥaqq ibn Ghālib ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, d. 541/1147), Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Qurṭubī (d. 671/1272), Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, al-Biqā‘ī, and Abū Ḥayyān al-Gharnārī, some of whom have already been mentioned. They wrote multivolume works that aimed to consolidate the major developments in the tradition. The Islamic tradition knew to give this kind of composition a name: muṭawwalāt al-tafsīr, “the lengthy works.”

The second kind of tafsīr works is what I term madrasah-style commentaries (called by the tradition al-mukhtasarāt, or “summaries”). These usually were based on encyclopedic works or written with a specific method in mind, such as giving only Sufi interpretations to the whole of the Quran. Authors who wrote madrasah-style commentaries include Naṣr ibn Muḥammad al-Samarqandī (d. 373/983), al-Sulamī, al-Wāḥidī, al-Zamakhsharī, and al-Bayḍāwī.

The third type of tafsīr is the glosses (ḥāshiyyah) on the madrasah-style commentaries. The two works that were usually glossed were those of al-Zamakhsharī and al-Bayḍāwī. It is rather unfortunate that not a single study in Western scholarship has ever been devoted to any of these glosses. Major figures of the scholastic tradition, such as Saʿd al-Dīn al-Taftāzānī (d. 792/1390), left us glosses on both of the two commentaries, and these are important sources for the cultural history of classical Islam.

The Function of Tafsīr

Tafsīr has always been at the center of Islamic intellectual history, the prism through which the Quran has been mediated to believers. In the traditional Islamic world, the Quran was and is understood through the language of tafsīr, and much of what Muslims believe the Quran is stating is actually what tafsīr says it is. Thus the significance of tafsīr in the religious history of Islam is paramount. Since tafsīr is both a communal endeavor—it was bound by a tradition—and an individual endeavor—exegetes were at liberty to depart from that particular tradition—it has managed to survive into modern times almost unscathed. Tafsīr as a genre did not need institutions to support it; nor was it beholden to the power or lack thereof of the ‘ulamā’, those religious scholars recognized as having the authority to interpret the Quran and help others understand it. Today there is a new situation in which modern Muslim intellectuals who are not ‘ulamā’, including many Western-trained Muslims, engage in this activity. Tafsīr now is practiced by almost anyone who intends to make a claim about Islam.

Tafsīr still plays a central role in defining the religious outlook of many Muslims. It is one of the most active fields in Islamic religious writing and much of the discussion among contemporary Muslims takes place in tafsīr works. The scholarly study of modern tafsīr unfortunately has all but died out in the West, and we lack any overview of the development of the genre for the last two hundred years. What we sorely need is a study of the political and social factors involved in the composition of Quranic commentaries and the cultural battles that are waged through the writing and publishing of tafsīr works. Most scholars of modern Islam pay little heed to what is being published of classical works and assume that to study modern tafsīr one only needs to study contemporary works. The problem with this attitude is that it disregards classical books of tafsīr as inspiration for modern works and as “ideological” works in their own right. Hence the politics of publishing in the Islamic world is of paramount significance in the study of modern Islamic religious development.

Four major trends can be noted in modern Islamic tafsīr: the modernizing, the Salafī, the classical, and the fundamentalist. The modernizing and the fundamentalist trends share the same hermeneutical outlook; both have escaped the dictates of the tradition and see fit to interpret the Quran according to an ideological stance. One has modernity as its guiding principle, the other a militant outlook. Both also seem to have had only a limited appeal to the general Muslim public. The Salafī trend, which is increasingly the norm in Sunni lands, attempts to leapfrog over a thousand years of Islamic scholarship in order to return to an imagined golden age of the first Islamic centuries. In the field of tafsīr it does this by denigrating many of the most important classical tafsīr works and elevating the medieval traditionalist current in tafsīr as represented by Ibn Kathīr and al-Suyūṭī. Meanwhile, the richness and complexity of classical mainstream tafsīr has been pushed to the side, and the classical trend is kept alive among intellectuals only through the selective publication of medieval classics. Finally, mention should be made of what can be called the modern Sufi pietistic sensibility, which has been gaining more ground recently. A major result of this new trend in Sufism is that Sufi hermeneutics is witnessing a comeback after it suffered in the early fourteenth/twentieth century. Modern Shiite interpretation shows the same trends we see manifested in Sunni developments, although the Shiite tradition has managed to keep the craft mostly in the hands of professional religious scholars.
A paradox of fundamentalism is that it sacrifices what it champions. If it restricts by scripture (as voiced by such slogans as al-ʿawdah ilaʾl-Qurʾān, “Back to the Quran!”), then it does so only by a restriction of scripture. The textual material must be controlled, its vital semantic range lost in enlisting it as a utopian template, namely, for al-nizām al-islāmī, the Islamic “system.” By a suppressed premise equating multivalence with doubt, Muslim fundamentalist exegesis founds univalence on texts such as, This is the Book in which there is no doubt (dhālika al-kitāb lā rayba fihi, 2:2), that is, in which there is no plurality of sense, no mystery beyond the plain text. A corollary is the trend to shun the traditions that reflect multivalence—of which the mystical and sapiential commentaries introduced in this essay are surely most characteristic. These long-running traditions in fact show that, historically, deep faith in the text was seldom grounds to restrict its semantic range. On the contrary, the sense that the Quran was of Divine origin implied that its meanings were fathomless. It was actively experienced as a portal within the finite into a transfinite, Divine dimension. The self-description of the Divine Speech as intrinsically transfinite is clear in verses such as 31:27: If all the trees on earth were pens, and if the sea and seven more added to it [were ink], the Words of God would not be exhausted (mā nafidat kalimāt Allāh). Celebrating the scripture’s boundless meaningfulness typifies Islamic mysticism.

For example, the great Sufi visionary, Quran commentator, and love theorist Rūzbihān al-Baqlī al-Shīrāzī (d. 606/1209) presents the verse just quoted in association with the following statement:

I found that the pre-eternal Word had no limit in the outer and the inner (lā nihāyah lahu fiʾl-zāhir waʾl-bāṭin), and that none of God’s creation had reached its perfection and the ultimate degree of Its meanings—because underlying every one of Its letters is an ocean of secrets and a river of lights \(\text{tabta kull harf min hurufihi bahr min biharr al-asrar wa-nahr min anharr al-anwar}\), which [in turn] is because It is the description of uncreatedness; and just as there is no limit to His Essence, there is no limit to His Attributes.\(^2\)

\(^c\)Abd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī (d. 736/1336), one of the greatest Sufi hermeneuts, expresses the same sense of semantic boundlessness when he speaks of the first onset of his insights (\(\text{futuḥ}\)) into the Quran:

It was as though perpetually, at the time of the evening draught (\(\text{ghabūq}\)) and the morning draught (\(\text{ṣabūḥ}\)), meanings were being unveiled to me beneath every verse, in describing which my tongue would get tired. There is neither power enough to grasp them and number them (\(\text{la‘l-qudrah tafī bi-ḍabṭihā wa-ihārā’ihā}\)), nor the strength to hold back from making them known and disseminating them!\(^3\)

Levels of Meaning

It moreover emerges that a variety of \(\text{ahādīth}\) clearly present the Quran as enshrining a semantic continuum from the most immediate and exterior to higher and higher levels of inner meaning. This ladder is ascended by the hermeneut, for as the Quran states: Thou wilt surely journey from stage to stage (\(\text{latarkabunna ṭabaq ‘an ṭabaq, 84:19}\)). The hermeneutic ascent is ultimately to the Word’s Divine Promulgator Himself, in an unending, because asymptotic, trajectory. Such is implicit in the regular Arabic term for spiritual hermeneutics, \(\text{al-ta’wil}\). The verbal noun of the second form of the triliteral root \(\text{‘w-l}\) (“to derive from,” “to return”), \(\text{ta’wil}\), literally means “causing (something) to return (to its origin)”; hence we have the related word \(\text{al-awwal}\), meaning “the first” or “the first part”—which is not accidentally one of the Most Beautiful Names (\(\text{al-asmā’ al-ḥusnā}\) of God in Islam (\(\text{al-Awwal}\)). \(\text{Al-ta’wil}\) complements the regular Arabic term for revelation, \(\text{al-tanzil}\), literally “causing (something) to descend.” Hermeneutics thus involves taking the Quran back up through the levels through which it descended to its very origin in the Divine.
Possibly the most important ḥadīth indicating that the Quran has intrinsic levels or tiered dimensions of meaning is the following, which is found in various traditional sources in slightly different forms: “No verse of the Quran has been revealed without its having (1) a back (ẓahr) and (2) a belly (baṭn). Every letter (barf) has (3) a bound (ḥadd) and (4) a point of ascent (muṭṭala/maṭla).”¹⁴ Notwithstanding the difficulty of the terminology—whose translation could be argued over—the saying has traditionally been taken to establish the scripture’s multivalence and the gradation of readings as relatively outward, inward, lower, and higher. The four key terms were in fact interpreted in rather specific ways from an early period, for example, by the major early Sufi Sahl al-Tustarī (d. 283/896). Rendering the terms ẓahr (“back”) and baṭn (“belly”) by their clearer cognates ẓāhir (“outward/exoteric”) and bāṭin (“inward/esoteric”), al-Tustarī explains that (1) the outward aspect of a given verse is its oral articulation (al-tilāwah), (2) its inward aspect is the understanding of it (al-fahm), (3) its bound (al-ḥadd, a word with a strong legal resonance) is the ruling in it on what is licit and illicit (al-ḥalāl wa’l-ḥarām), and (4) the point of ascent is the looking down (ishrāf) by the heart upon the verse’s intentionality, as comprehended by God Himself (fiqh min Allāh).⁵

The striking resemblance of these ideas to Christian Scholastic and late medieval Jewish schemes has been noted by a number of researchers, specifically, the similarly fourfold hermeneutical frameworks respectively known as the Quadriga and Pardes. In the case of the Quadriga, for example, it seems straightforward to match the sensus historicus (i.e., the literal, narrative aspect of the Bible) with the level called al-ẓāhir in our Islamic scheme; then to match the sensus allegoricus (i.e., the symbolic or typological understanding of the Old Testament in terms of the New) with the level called al-bāṭin; next to match the sensus tropologicus (i.e., the application of the Biblical text to the sphere of morality) with the moral/legal level called al-ḥadd; and finally to match the sensus anagogicus (i.e., the most arcane and exalted meaning) with the highest level, called al-muṭṭala/maṭla.

Perhaps this last equation is the most thought provoking of the four. Anagoge, a Greek term that, like taʾwil in Arabic, suggests conducting something upward, not only betokened the highest, most radically esoteric of the Bible’s senses, but in particular the full elevation of its meaning into the terms of the realities of the Afterlife. In this light it is extremely interesting to note that, alongside its role in hermeneutics, the Arabic term muṭṭala is also used in Islam for a definitive episode of the Resurrection. It is a literal “high point” in the course of the Resurrection at which the soul undergoing judgment is elevated to witness the unfolding events from a transcendental perspective. This is the sense of muṭṭala, for instance, implicit in the saying of the “righteous Caliph” ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (d. 22/644): “Even if everything in the world belonged to me, I would ransom myself with it from the terror of the muṭṭala”⁶ So it turns out that this key hermeneutical term involves a combination of ideas not so far from anagoge: ultimate scriptural mysteries and the perspective of the eschaton (the end times).

Those Firmly Rooted in Knowledge

The report quoted from ʿUmar conveys a further noteworthy element: the sense that reaching the muṭṭala is an awesome affair. This awe applies as much to the hermeneutical muṭṭala as to the eschatological one to which ʿUmar prima facie refers, and this is reflected in mystical commentaries.⁷ Although the existence of unsearchable depths of meaning in the revelation was not questioned in the environment of early Islam, inquiring into them was a fearful matter. The arcanal dimension was sacrosanct and treated with dread—an attitude enjoined by the Quran itself. At issue here is primarily the momentous 3:7:

He (God) it is Who has sent down the Book upon thee (i.e., the Prophet); therein are signs determined; they are the Mother of the Book, and others symbolic. As for those whose hearts are given to swerving, they follow that of it which is symbolic, seeking temptation and seeking its interpretation (taʾwīl). And none know its interpretation save God and those firmly rooted in knowledge. They say, “We believe in it; all is from our Lord.” And none remember, save those who possess intellect.

In this verse, one of the most vital in the Quran relating to its own hermeneutic, the very pursuit of taʾwīl by human individuals is seemingly condemned outright. The understanding of the higher significance of the revelations lies with God, not humanity. Yet if the Quran here sets up the idea that its interior is an inviolable dimension, it does not quite close the door to it, albeit for an elite. This possibility depends on the details of the verse’s punctuation. The shift from the original scriptio defectiva (Semitic script without voweling and other markings) to the scriptio plena (script with such markings) took time, and indeed the former still leaves its trace in the distinctive orthography of the Quran. Voweling and pointing are recorded as being formalized on the initiative of the unlikely figure al-Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī (d. 95/714), the notorious Umayyad authoritarian and military leader, during his governorship of Iraq between 694 and 714. The introduction of the various signs of pause may have taken yet longer.

At any rate it is momentous that some authorities have always disregarded the obligatory pause (al-waqf al-lāzim), marked by a small superscript mīm (m) in most copies of the Quran and represented by the period in the following rendering: And none know its interpretation save God. And those firmly rooted in knowledge say, “We believe in it . . .” Suspending the waqf lāzim actually places this enigmatic elite, those firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūna fi’l-ʿilm), together with God as comprehending the hermeneutic of the revelation, for the sentence now reads: And none know its interpretation save God and those firmly rooted in knowledge. They say, “We believe in it . . .” On this reading, though the Quran surely disqualifies the group whose hearts are given to swerving for hermeneutics, it affirms that an elite is qualified.

Careful scrutiny of commentary traditions suggests that this reading was acceptable in the earliest period. For example, Mujāhid ibn Jabr al-Makhzūmī (d. ca. 104/722), one of the earliest authorities in exegesis, according to some reports did not observe any pause in the syntax between God and those firmly rooted in knowledge: “Those who are firmly rooted in knowledge know its interpretation, and they [also] say, ‘We believe in it’” (wa’l-rāsikhūna fi’l-ʿilm yaʿlamūna ta’wīlahu wa-yaqūlūna āmannā bihi). Mujāhid’s great teacher was Ibn ʿAbbās ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib (d. 68/687), considered second only to ʿAlī as the preeminent exegete among the Companions of the Prophet. He famously asserted, “I am among those who know [the scripture’s] hermeneutic” (anā mimmā yaʿlamu taʾwīlahu), and fully implicit in this claim is that he too observed no necessary break at this point in the verse’s syntax. Moreover, what are we to make of the venerable traditions in which the Prophet himself prays over Ibn ʿAbbās for God to teach him the knowledge of the Quran’s hermeneutic? All such traditions suggest that the now standard, stricter punctuation of the codex here was primarily precautionary in motive.
At any rate, though the mainstream observed this more circumspect punctuation (which prevails in the Ḥafṣ and Warsh transmissions of the text, including all modern printed editions), nevertheless three major historical trends within Islam have maintained its suspension in the case of an elite as they have separately defined it. The trends in question are the Shiites, the Sufis, and the falāsifah (i.e., those representing the Graeco-Arabic, or properly speaking Islamic, philosophical tradition). In a Shiite context the firmly rooted in knowledge are of course the Imams, the lineal descendants of the Prophet via his daughter Fāṭimah through her marriage to ʿAlī. Scriptural hermeneutics is the preserve and primary function of the imamate, and in consequence it is normal in Shiite references to disregard the waqf lāzim here in 3:7. Thus Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq (d. 148/765), common to both the Twelver and Ismāʿīlī lines of Imams, is reported to have commented on this verse with the statement: “We [the Imams] are those who are firm-rooted in knowledge; so we understand [the Quran’s] hermeneutic.”

Next, in a Sufi context the firmly rooted in knowledge are identified with the saints or spiritual adepts—whether or not they are lineal descendants of the Prophet. For instance, the aforementioned Rūzbihān al-Baqā’ī al-Shīrāzī says:

> The commonality recite the verse, [They] would say, “Our Lord! We believe” (23:109). In the same way they have no share in the symbolism of Ḥadīth except [simple] faith. But the saints are referred to by the verse, And none know its interpretation save God and those firmly rooted in knowledge (3:7). For others there is faith, but for them there is gnosis in the problems of symbolism.

Rūzbihān al-Baqā’ī’s disregard for the waqf lāzim is quite clear in this reference.

Finally, a noteworthy defense of philosophy by Abu’l-Walīd Muhammad ibn Rushd (d. 595/1198), one of the greatest Aristotelian thinkers in both Islam and medieval Europe (through Latin translations), contains a similarly telling reference to the verse. In his Decisive Treatise (Faṣl al-maqāl) he argues for the legitimacy, indeed the obligation, of philosophy in Islam, equating the philosophers with the firmly rooted in knowledge. Here he here states explicitly his preferred punctuation of 3:7:

> We prefer to place the pause after the words of God the Exalted and those firmly rooted in knowledge, because if the learned did not understand hermeneutics, there would be no superiority in their assent, which results for them in a faith in it which is not found among the unlearned. God has described them as those who believe in it, and this can only be taken to refer to the [special] faith which is based on [philosophical] demonstration (al-burhān).\textsuperscript{14}

In this instance, Ibn Rushd, who was a great jurist as well as a major Aristotelian philosopher and commentator, is ingeniously using the dynamics of the verse itself to justify his interpretation of the punctuation. The verse states that the firmly rooted in knowledge say of the Quran, We believe in it; all is from our Lord. But our philosopher points out that any pious Muslim would say as much. Therefore, there must be some extra factor that explains why God honors them as being firmly rooted in knowledge. This factor is only provided by linking the previous words to them; that is, it lies in their possessing the Quran’s hermeneutic—for Ibn Rushd, a rational, demonstrative hermeneutic. And of course, this dictates disregarding the waqf lāzim.

But, to repeat, all such currents are marked by a strong distinction between the spiritual/intellectual elite and common believers. All these hermeneutic trends accepted the premise that it was right to shield the Quran from idle interpretation. For the unqualified the waqf lāzim of 3:7 was considered wholly apt. Qualification was moreover based on two criteria: they had to be not only members of the relevant hermeneutic elite, but also grounded in the scriptural sciences (‘ulām al-Qur’ān). Initiation is a paradigm for many forms of knowledge in Islam, not least knowledge of the Word. The scriptural sciences were thus not only a scholarly propaedeutic, but also an initiation for would-be hermeneuts—an intellectual catharsis that tested and refined their inner receptivity to the Word.

\textit{Approaches of Mystical Commentaries}

Echoing Biblical traditions of Sophianism, the Quran was sometimes tellingly personified in Sufism as a feminine entity, to be wooed, indeed, to be engaged with on her terms or not at all. For example, in his famous collection of discourses, \textit{Fīhi mā fīhi (In It Is What Is in It)}, the great Sufi mystic and Persian poet Jalāl al-Dīn al-Rūmī (d. 672/1273) describes the scripture as follows:
The Quran is as a bride (ʿarūs) who does not disclose her face to you, for all that you draw aside the veil. That you should examine it, and yet not attain happiness and unveiling (kashf) is due to the fact that the act of drawing aside the veil has itself repulsed and tricked you, so that the bride has shown herself to you as ugly, as if to say, “I am not that beauty.” The Quran is able to show itself in whatever form it pleases. But if you do not draw aside the veil and seek only its good pleasure, watering its sown field and attending on it from afar, toiling upon that which pleases it best, it will show its face to you without your drawing aside the veil.

The passage plays with the concept of kashf, a Persian/Arabic term that acquires the technical sense of mystical insight, but that literally means “unveiling,” as when a Muslim woman uncovers her face and head. We have here a basic reflex of Sufi epistemology: the perception that insight is received spontaneously through catharsis and humility, not self-aggrandizement.

A practical impact of this is that hermeneutic insight into the Quran assumes the traditional disciplines of conventional exegesis. In a surprising number of cases these disciplines are explicitly included in the structure of mystical commentaries. The mystical interpreter here synopsizes, combining discussions of the literal sense and the spiritual sense. Examples, to a greater or lesser extent, of this approach are the commentaries of Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad al-Thaʿlabī (d. 427/1035), Abuʾl-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (d. 465/1072), Abū Ḥafṣ ʿUmar al-Suhrawardī (d. 632/1234), Rashīd al-Dīn al-Maybudī (d. 520/1126), Najm al-Dīn Kubrā (d. 618/1221), Niẓām al-Dīn Ḥasan al-Nīsābūrī (d. 728/1328), and later Niʿmat Allāh ibn Maḥmūd al-Nakhjavānī (d. 920/1514), Maḥmūd ibn Faḍl Allāh al-Hudāyī (d. 1038/1628), Aḥmad ibn ʿAjibah (d. 1224/1809), Qāḍī Thanāʾ Allāh al-Pānīpatī (d. 1225/1810), Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ālūsī (d. 1270/1854), Sulṭān ʿAlī Shāh al-Gunābādī (d. 1327/1909), and al-ʿĀnī “Mullā Ḥuwaysh” (d. 1384/1964).

However, in contrast to this approach, is an enduring class of mystical commentary that is nonsynoptic, omitting all exoteric matter. The main original exemplar of this group of commentaries, heavily drawn on by later authors, is that of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī (d. 412/1021). Although significantly later than the aforementioned al-Tustarī, whose commentary is extant and has been studied in some depth, al-Sulamī nevertheless records a precious body of early mystical exegesis of the Quran in his Ḩaqāʾiq al-tafsīr (Truths of Commentary) and Ziyādāt Ḩaqāʾiq al-tafsīr (Addenda to Truths of Commentary), and some of this material purports to be even earlier than al-Tustarī’s. Above all, al-Sulamī’s text preserves an apparent Sunni recension of the mystical exegesis of the Imam Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq.19 Attention has admittedly been drawn to problems with the transmission stemma for this text.20 Yet if the Jaʿfarite material in the Ḩaqāʾiq is even partially authentic, it momentously demonstrates that the mystical stream of Islam has a fountainhead in the esoteric teachings of the Prophet’s Household (ahl al-bayt). Though the commentary has elements that seem too Sunni for it to be genuine, these may be no more than evidence of an attempt to normalize the material for a Sunni Sufi audience.21 Such elements are anyway surprisingly few. They are balanced by features fully expected in a Shiite context.22

Issues of authenticity aside, al-Sulamī’s Jaʿfarite material constitutes a matchless example of mystical or “allusive” Quran commentary (al-tafsīr biʾl-ishārah) from early Islam, worthy of intensive study. Epitomic doctrines of the classical Sufi tradition are exhibited with great concision and power, and many later hermeneutical themes of Islamic mysticism appear here in their earliest form. The commentary begins and ends, for example, with a highly esoteric form of Sufi interpretation in which the interpreter acronymizes. Such acronymic letter mysticism is normal in the case of the mysterious “separated letters” (al-muqattatāʾāt) at the beginning of various sūrah(s) of the Quran, but the Jaʿfarite material opens with such an analysis of the consecratory formula itself, In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful (biʾsmiʾLlāh al-Raḥmān al-Raḥīm). In the first unit of this formula, biʾsma, the entirety of reality is said to be alluded to in hierarchy. For the bāʾ stands for God’s timeless mode of being (baqāʾ Allāh), the sīn stands for God’s Name/Attributes (asmāʾ Allāh),23 and the mīm stands for the whole dominion of God (al-mulk).24 In this way, in some sense comprised within biʾsma is God qua God, God’s interface with the world, and finally the world itself. Perhaps more mysteriously, the commentary proposes here that God actively bestows His Mercy (al-raḥmah) through the yāʾ and the mīm of the word al-Raḥīm. It may be that the Arabic word for “sea,” yamm, is implicit in this comment. More likely however, it combines—highly intuitively—a sense of the actual auditory impact of the sound īm, with its tender, elongated quality, and the belief that the Quran, as Logos, is in some sense instrumental in the Divine creative activity itself.

There is an unspoken but palpable link between this kind of letter mysticism, so often employed in Sufi interpretation, and the premises of al-sīmīyāʾ, a theurgic science associated with certain dimensions of Sufism. Central to this science is the so-called science of letters (ʿilm al-ḥurūf), which analyzes Arabic (also Persian) letters through intuitions of their intrinsic potencies (ʿilm al-khawāṣṣ). This insight into the letters from which words and names are made is then put to use in onomantic divination (as per the principle Nomen omen est, “The name is a sign”), or, more controversially, for actively affecting external reality in its course of unfolding (al-taṣarruf). A basic assumption here is that in the case of a sacred language such as Arabic, words and their referents are intimately connected and even that they are mysteriously identical—“The name is the named” (al-ism huwa al-musammā), as Islamic scholastic theology (ʿilm al-kalām) usually formulated this principle. Therefore, to penetrate the structure of words through resolving them into their component letters and the letters’ properties is a general form of gnoseological empowerment.

Let us move on to other themes of Sufi hermeneutics typified by al-Sulamī’s Ḥafarite material. The commentary recurrently analyzes the Quranic text in terms of the primary Sufi concept of a series of stations (maqām, pl. maqāmāt), which are traversed on the mystical path (al-ṭarīqah). One such comment is on 7:160, where we find the famous Biblical story (Exodus 17) of the waters that erupted from a rock at the touch of Moses’ staff in the wilderness at Horeb. The Quran includes here the Mishnaic detail that there were twelve springs that gushed forth, one for each of the Israelite tribes. This is the occasion in the commentary for a concise but incredibly evocative presentation of the maqāmāt. Each spring at Horeb is a station in the ascent in the realization of God, in which the highest station is represented by the very highest spring, “intimacy” (al-uns) with the Divine. The mystic ascends through fountains of (1) professing Divine Unity, (2) joy in servanthood, (3) faithfulness, (4) sincerity, (5) humility, (6) contentment in God, (7) peace and dignity, (8) generosity and confidence, (9) certainty, (10) intellect, (11) love, and finally (12) intimacy and solitude with God. The comment states: “Whoever drinks from any one of these springs discovers its sweetness and hopefully strives for the spring that is higher up than it (arfaʿ minhā)—from spring to spring until he reaches the origin. When he reaches the origin, he realizes God (taḥaqqaqa biʾl-Ḥaqq).”

From the interplay of the scriptural imagery of springs and the mystical doctrine of a ladder of stations, we are thus given an idea of great spiritual potency: the mystical path not as the traversal of a set of static placements or milestones on a route, but something more mysterious, an ascent through a stairway of sources of “living water,” conducted down from ever higher, more transcendental, planes. The mystical adept aims to climb to the ultimate fountainhead in the Unseen, the real source from which perpetually emerge all of the waters flowing on each level below. It is impossible to read this text without thinking of the actual hydraulic technology to be found in Muslim agriculture, the ancient systems of channels (qanāh, pl. aqniyah) that distribute water to fields and homes, sometimes from remote sources at much higher elevations. More particularly, Persian and Mughal garden design harbors a seemingly exact historical concretization of the comment’s imagery. The beautiful Mughal terraced gardens, for example, to be found in the hills above Dal Lake in Kashmir, embody precisely this concept of a descending set of pools and channels, through which the water cascades (Persian, chādurān) down from ever higher levels, till we reach the source pool, where the water originally bubbles out of the mountainside.

Another example of a noumenal concept of Sufi thought used to understand the Revealed Text is the key doctrine of the mystic’s successive passing away from contingent existence and then subsistence in and through God (al-fanāʾ wa’l-baqāʾ). This teaching is typically disclosed in the commentary by a verse that is prima facie about creation and resurrection, reconfigured here in terms of the individual mystic’s internal experience. So it is that 85:13, It is He Who originates (yubdiʿu) and brings back (yuʿīdu), is commented on as follows: “He Who originates: that is, He causes [you] to pass away from everything other than Him (fa-yufnī ʿammā siwāhu); then He brings back: that is, He causes [you] to subsist through His Subsistence (fa-yubqī bi-ibqāʾihi).” Another comment with this theme is on 8:17 (ostensibly about victory against the odds at the Battle of Badr): that He might try the believers with a beautiful trial: “That He might cause them to pass away from their own souls (an yufnīhim ʿan nufūsīhim), and when He has caused them to pass away from their own souls, He Himself becomes the substitute (ʿiwaḍ) for them in place of their souls.” The transfer of the verse’s meaning from a Divine ordeal of a military kind to one pertaining to spiritual realization is unexpected but potent.

Transformative Inner Experiences Understanding the Quranic text in terms of the transformative inner experiences undergone on the mystical journey is a feature of all Sufi commentary. This “experiential concretion” of the revelation marks many of al-Sulami’s Ja’farite sayings. The verses are richly interpreted in terms of active spiritual experience, albeit at an order at the outer limit of the expressible. For example, 27:88, And thou seest the mountains that thou dost suppose are solid pass away like clouds, is explained in terms of the absolute quiescence of the mystic’s soul on the occasion of the ecstatic projection of the mystic’s spirit into the sphere of the Divine: “You see the soul motionless when the spirit goes forth, the spirit penetrating deep into Paradise, betaking itself to its place beneath the Throne [of God].” In a similar vein, there are intermittent references to the photic phenomena of mystical experience (referred to, for instance, as the “effects of the lights of realization,” āthār anwār al-taḥqīq) and to the spiritual heart as an active point of contact with transcendental realities.

In this comment, an image of striking power—that of the mystic’s heart as a vast sky—gains in force exponentially through its conversion from tropal to literal status. What at first seems metaphorical becomes factual through the detail that God Himself is the object of the heart’s knowledge. Since God is boundless, the heart is indeed discovered to be an interior unbounded heaven, given that it is the locus for the dawn of His Gnosis. Following through the implications of this idea, the commentary next coordinates the twelve zodiacal mansions of the macrocosmic sky with their microcosmic analogues, twelve “cardiac mansions” (burūj al-qalb), consisting of yet another list of maqāmāt, the last of which is said to be “amorous passion” or “rapture” (al-walah). We discover that, whereas the welfare (al-ṣalāḥ) of the transient sphere (al-dār al-fāniyyah) and of ordinary human beings is transmitted through the zodiac, the welfare of the spiritual heart (and its elite folk) instead flows into it through the said cardiac mansions. Coordinating the universal macrocosm and human microcosm is a typical trait of Sufi exegesis.

The intensely experiential flavor of such comments is, however, combined with a deanthropomorphid trend. Though God is presented as an actual datum of mystical experience, the theology of Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq’s sayings is radically transcendental. For example, the gloss on 57:3, He is the First (al-Awwal), and the Last (al-Ākhir), and the Outward (al-ẓāhir), and the Inward (al-Bāṭin), states with cryptic succinctness that God is apparent in the sense that “the He is is clear to us” (bāna lanā al-kān), and God is hidden in the sense that “the true nature of the He is is concealed from us” (waʾhtajaba ʿannā kunhu al-kān). This is evidently an early and highly expressive way of putting the vital point presently made in Avicennan metaphysics: that the quoddity (al-anniyyah) of the Necessary Being, that is, the fact that It exists, is certain, but Its quiddity (al-māhiyyah), that is, Its intrinsic identity, is unknowable, because It is wholly transcendent. In line with this stance, the Jaʿfarite sayings sublate scriptural imagery, especially pertaining to God, and construe it “philosophically” and allegorically. The concretion is thus counterpoised with abstraction—producing a spiritually overwhelming tension in readers.

Divine Symbolism

Al-Sulamī’s Jaʿfarite material heralds much Sufi commentary in this allegorism—a term used here in view of the method’s clear comparison with the sensus allegoricus in the Quadriga of the Christian Scholastics. Allegory reads the sacred text as symbolic, but more than this, as systematically so—not simply a set of discrete, uncoordinated symbols. To uninitiates what is in question is not strictly allegory, but allegoresis, that is, “the interpretation of already existing texts according to extrinsic philosophical or dogmatic criteria.” However, to Sufis, such readings need not imply subjecting the Word to extrinsic, random criteria, but rather involve deciphering the symbols of a true Divine allegory, that is, a Divinely intended system of symbols, by clues transmitted either in the Revealed Text itself, in tradition, in lexicography, or through private inspiration (al-kashf). Doubtless, the allegory will have great strata of possible meaning. The interpretations are unenclosed. But the Quran is self-defined as in its entirety a book of indicative symbols (“signs,” āyāt) and states explicitly that God figurates (daraba al-amthāl) in His Self-Expression. In line with this premise, the angelic legions (junūd) at Badr mentioned in 9:40, for example, are interpreted in the Jaʿfarite material to mean the virtues on the mystical path, such as certainty (al-yaqīn), trust in God, and wholesale dependence on Him (al-thiqah wa’l-tawakkul). The broad thrust of this interpretation is certainly supported by the Prophet’s own designation of spirituality as a kind of warfare, indeed, “the greater holy war” (al-jihād al-akbar).

In this kind of hermeneutic many—in principle all—Quranic verses become symbolic. To use terms from rhetorical theory, the revelations are viewed as metaphors that use either a natural, historical, or perhaps apocalyptical vehicle, but have a strictly spiritual tenor. Historical and other contextual concerns are muted, and the revelations become immediately and deeply connected to the mystic’s interior life—a manner of interacting with the text that has been called eisegesis instead of exegesis. The traditional Arabic term for this kind of hermeneutics is al-taḥbīq, “application” or “adaptation.” All verses, even legal ones, are freely treated in this manner in Sufi commentary. For example, 4:29 gives the following statute: O you who believe! Consume not each other’s wealth (amwāl) falsely, but trade by mutual consent, and slay not yourselves. Truly God is Merciful unto you. In a typical example of this Sufi approach, Rūzbihān al-Baqlī interprets the ban on homicide here, Slay not yourselves (lā taqtulū anfusakum), to mean that the higher, spiritual “self” should not be deprived of life through indulgence of the demands of the sensual ego, known as “the soul that commands to evil” (al-nafs al-ammārah bi’l-sū’). As he puts it:

Slay not yourselves that derive from spiritual and suprasensible realms (anfusakum al-rūḥāniyyat al-malakūtiyyah), by following the desires of [your] satanic commanding selves (bi-mutāba‘ah hawa’l-nufūs al-ammarat al-shayṭāniyyah). Indeed, the self that derives from the spiritual realm becomes distressed, and dies (tamūtu) when in proximity to the commanding self, when the commanding self, by means of its desires, gains ascendancy over the self that derives from the spiritual realm and darkens it with the clouds of disobedience.

One of the most highly reputed Sufi commentaries, attributed to the Andalusian “Supreme Master” (al-shaykh al-akbar) Ibn ʿArabī (d. 638/1240), but in fact by the member of his school ʿAbd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī, has many such cases of al-taḥbīq. For example, the entire story of Joseph as narrated in Sūrah 12 (and familiar from the Bible, Genesis 37–50) is analyzed by al-
Kāshānī as an allegory of the soul, in which Joseph himself is a metaphor (mathal) for the heart, extremely beautiful in its spiritual preparedness (al-qalb al-mustaʿidd alladhī huwa fī ghāyat al-ḥusn) and regarded lovingly by his father, Jacob, who symbolizes the intellect (al-maḥbūb al-marmūq ilā abīhi Yaʿqūb al-ʿaql).

Joseph’s eleven brothers, for their part, represent the inner and outer sense faculties, and their hostility toward Joseph expresses the senses’ tendency to draw the heart away from the intellect. The analysis is elaborately systematic, so that, for example, Jacob’s wife Rachel—as mother of the beloved sons Joseph and Benjamin—stands for the soul’s “upbraiding” aspect or the moral conscience (al-nafs al-lawwāmah), while Jacob’s wife Leah stands for the lower soul, which commands to evil (al-nafs al-ammārah bi'l-sū').

Al-Kāshānī similarly explores that key episode for mysticism throughout the Semitic monotheisms, Moses and the Burning Bush, as referred to, among others, in 20:9–16 (cf. Exodus 3:1–12). Each tiny detail is again treated according to the premise that the narrative is, in some sense, an extended metaphor in absentia—that is, one with a wholly inexplicit tenor. The location of the miracle, the mysterious holy valley of Ṭuwā (al-wādi'l-muqaddas Ṭuwā), is identified as a signifier of the spiritual world (ʿālam al-rūḥ). The Divine Commandment to Moses to shed his sandals in the environs of the Burning Bush represents the catharsis (al-tajarrud) necessary for contact with the Holy Spirit (al-ittiṣāl bi'l-rūḥ al-qudus). In particular, shedding two sandals signifies a double catharsis, that of the soul (nafsuka) and that of the body (badanuka), and thus of the two worlds related to them (al-kawnayn), the psychic and the corporeal. In 20:17–18 Moses is asked by God what is in his right hand and replies that it is the staff he leans on and uses to gather fodder for his flocks. Moses is taken here as a symbol for the intellect and the staff as one for the soul. Its being useful lies in the soul’s instrumentality in acquiring perfection and, ultimately, assimilating the Divine Attributes themselves. Moses’ statement I... beat down leaves of fodder with it (ahushshu biḥā ʿalā ghanamī) is taken to mean, “I pore over (lit., I rap on) the pages (or leaves) of beneficial sciences” (akhbiṭu awrāq al-ʿulūm al-nāfiʿah). When he is then bidden in 20:19 to cast down his staff, this represents freeing the soul from constraint by the intellect (khallihā ʿan ḍabṭ al-ʿaql). The Quran next speaks of the staff as miraculously transformed into a serpent, moving swiftly (ḥayyah tasʿā), signifying the animation of Moses’ soul, now unfettered by reason, by Divine Wrath (al-
In its writhing, the very power of the Lord (al-qahr al-rabbānī) is epiphanized through it.

Although not the sole approach found in Sufi commentaries like al-Kāshānī’s, such symbolism is a basic trait of them. Crucially, it also marks the stance on the Quran found in Islamic philosophy and features, for instance, in the Epistles of the Brethren of Purity (Rasā’il Ikhwān al-Ṣafā’), Ibn Sīnā’s Directives and Remarks (al-Ishārāt wa’l-tanbīḥāt), and numerous other such texts. But motives may be differentiated. Where philosophical allegorism is abstractive and is part of a “rhetoric of harmonization,” aiming to conceptualize scripture in terms of Islamic Peripatetic and Neoplatonic philosophy, the impulse of Sufi allegorism—despite appearances—is perhaps the very opposite. It is, in other words, concretive and reflects a concern with the actual realization (al-tahqīq) of the Quran or with a translation of it into tridimensional experience, which is typical of Sufism. This realizing attitude toward the Revealed Text cuts both ways—the relationship is chiastic. Entextualization of the soul goes with internalization of the Quran: the internal life becomes purely textual and the text becomes purely internal. In other words, if the soul is to be read in terms of the Quran, then the Quran is to be read in terms of the soul—and this last would seem to be the real significance of the Sufi version of this symbolic method. Rendering one’s identity Quranic is a primary objective in Sufism and stands firmly on the Prophet’s precedent, since a well-attested ḥadīth states that when his widow ʿĀʾishah was asked after his death what he had been like, she made the simple but profound observation, “His nature was the Quran (kāna khuluquhu al-Qurʾān).”

Probably the most radical case of a Sufi hermeneutic that reads the Quran in these internalized terms was developed in the Kubrawī tradition, initiated by Najm al-Dīn al-Khīwaqī (d. 618/1221), known as Najm al-Dīn Kubrā in view of his ironic nickname al-Tāmmat al-Kubrā (“the Greatest Calamity”). The Kubrawī tradition gives formal voice to a deep undercurrent of Sufi thought tending to give primacy to consciousness. In the final instance, in this perspective everything is within; external reality is included in internal consciousness. This is captured in a counterintuitive formulation of the great Kubrawī master and Quran commentator ʿAlāʾ al-Dawlah al-Simmānī (d. 736/1336). Al-Simmānī takes over the Sufi commonplace that coordinates the greater universe with the human being, as declared in the dictum, “The world is a great human being (macrocosm), while the human being is a little world (microcosm; al-kawn insān kabīr wa’l-insān kawn ṣaghīr).” However, in al-Simmānī’s formulation the expected proportion is reversed, the macrocosm and microcosm inverted. For him, the true microcosm is the world and the true macrocosm is the human being; that is, metaphysically, in contrast with materially, human consciousness contains the world, not vice versa. Moreover, this reversal of the relation of the outward and the inward continues, so that from the spiritual point of view the more external element within the human person is actually contained by the more internal. The doctrine is supported by, among others, the much-cited ḥadith qudsi: “My earth and My Heaven contain Me not, but the heart of My believing slave does contain Me.”

From this perspective, the whole of reality, from top to bottom, is within, such that the rites of worship with their prescribed orientation in external space (i.e., al-qiblah)—to take one example—are in the final analysis concerned with cultivating the proper orientation between one lower aspect of our “internal space” and another, higher one. The path that leads from creation to Godhead is wholly located inside the mystic. In Kubrawī theory this concept becomes elaborated into a complex hierarchy of seven subtle centers (laṭīf, sing. laṭīfah), which are ascended in the path of realization. There is an obvious parallel between this mystical system and Laya Yoga in the Indic world, with its similarly sevenfold system of subtle centers (cakras/padmas), which are penetrated in succession by the kundalinī, defined as the “power of consciousness” (cit-sakti). Where God realization is taken in the Yogic theory as the final ascent of consciousness to a purely transcendent center (the supreme point, or mahā-bindu) beyond the seven and above the head, in this Sufi theory realization also occurs in the mysterious “center of Selfhood” (al-laṭīfah al-anāʾīyyah), again beyond the seven subtle centers and above the head. Just as Yogic theory identifies each cakra by inwardly perceived lights or “photisms” of different colors and by a succession of divine epiphanies (devas), in the Kubrawī theory each laṭīfah has its distinctly colored photism and its presiding Quranic prophet.

It is in this very last aspect that the radical implications of the theory for Quranic hermeneutics emerges. From Adam at the basal center, through Noah at the abdominal center, through Abraham, Moses, and David at centers from right to left in the chest region, to Jesus Christ at the center of the frontal cortex, and finally to the Prophet Muhammad atop the cranium—in principle all references to these prophets within Quranic narratives may be deciphered in terms of the relevant laṭāʾif. Such, at least, is al-Simnānī’s daring hermeneutical agenda as he presents it in the introduction to his Tafsīr najm al-Qurʾān (The Commentary Star of the Quran). 50 Indeed, given a hadīth stating that the Quran has seven interior levels of meaning, it is theoretically possible for al-Simnānī to interpret every verse of the scripture in relation to each of the seven laṭāʾif. 51

A primary genre of Sufi literature is the spiritual manual, in which the path in all its details, etiquettes, and terminology is mapped out for aspirants. A series of such manuals were produced between the third/ninth and the fifth/eleventh centuries, seminal works such as al-Makkī’s Qūt al-qulūb (The Nourishment of Hearts), al-Kalābādhī’s Kitāb al-taʿarruf (The Doctrine of the Sufis), and al-Hujwīrī’s Kashf al-majāb (Unveiling of the Veiled). There is a clear sense in which, through this Kubrawī system of interpretation, the Quran itself—if properly deciphered—is fully instated as the ultimate “manual” for mystical adepts in their spiritual quest.

The Sapiential Tradition

The perils of generalization notwithstanding, such a practical concept of the Quran may be contrasted with that emerging from the non-Sufi currents covered by the term “sapiential,” that is, rooted in wisdom, or “sapience” (al-ḥikmah, a Quranic term extended to philosophy as pursued in the Islamic tradition). Islamicized Aristotelian and Neoplatonic traditions of philosophy within the Persianate world are sometimes referred to as “ḥikmat philosophy.” Distinctions become complex post-seventh/thirteenth century due to the suffusion of Sufism in the wake of Ibn ʿArabī by terms and concepts from philosophy, especially the philosophy of the “Chief Shaykh” (al-shaykh al-raʾīs) Abū ʿAlī ibn Sīnā (d. 428/1037). The convergent trend bears ultimate fruit in a hermeneutic in which the approaches of Sufism and ḥikmat philosophy merge—as is the case with The Keys of the Unseen (Mafātīḥ al-ghayb), by Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī (Mullā Ṣadrā, d. 1050/1640). But this work is rather late and unusually synthetic. Piety generally demanded that systematic works of scriptural commentary were unharnessed from philosophy, even when composed by philosophers. An example of this is the voluminous Triumph of the All-Bountiful in the Exegesis of the Quran (Fatḥ al-mannān fī tafsīr al-Qurʾān) by the noted Illuminationist philosopher Qūḥ al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī (d. 710/1311), which seemingly steers quite clear of philosophical principles.

However, in one particular Islamic community there was already, significantly earlier, a thoroughgoing scriptural hermeneutic that can be viewed as fully sapiential—a system of higher interpretation (al-taʾwil) understood to be grounded in a form of ḥikmah. A clue lies in an unexpected quarter. The historian and scholarly biographer Ẓahīr al-Dīn al-Bayhaqī (d. 565/1169) says of his contemporary and acquaintance Muḥammad ibn ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Shahrastānī (d. 548/1153): “[Al-Shahrastānī] was composing a Quran commentary, interpreting the verses according to the canons of both the law (al-sharīʿah) and wisdom (al-ḥikmah), and other things too. So I said to him, ‘This is to give up what is right! The Quran is not to be commented on except by the reports of the pious ancestors (al-salaf), consisting of the Companions and the Followers. Wisdom is something quite separate from the exegesis of the Quran.’” A precious unicum manuscript of this commentary, The Keys of the Arcana (Mafāṭīḥ al-asrār), exists in Tehran and is gradually being brought out in an Iranian edition. Though it is sadly truncated—ending before Sūrah 3—it has an extensive introduction in which al-Shahrastānī presents his hermeneutical system in satisfying detail. There is a body of scholarly opinion now that the basis of this framework lies in Ismāʿīlism, and that the commentary is strong evidence for the claim by some of al-Shahrastānī’s contemporaries that this apparent paragon of the Shāfiʿī-Ashʿarī Sunni hierarchy was in reality secretly aligned with this form of esoteric Shiism—then widely feared in the form of the new Nizārī movement.

Be that as it may, the hermeneutical system in question is very profound and also is to be distinguished from that of Sufism. Al-Shahrastānī presents a great lattice of complementary concepts underlying the Quran, and with these interpretive keys he claims to penetrate the arcane dimension of the scripture, scrupulously applying them to every verse in succession. The complementarities include creation (al-khalq) and the Command (al-amr), hierarchy (al-tarattub) and contrariety (al-taḍādd), the inchoative (al-mustaʾnaf) and the accomplished (al-mafrūgh), generality (al-ʿumūm) and specificity (al-khuṣūs), the abrogating (al-nāsikh) and the abrogated (al-mansūkh), the clear (al-muḥkam) and the ambiguous (al-mutashābih), and exegesis (al-tafsīr) and hermeneutics (al-taʾwil). Although some of these pairs are of course familiar from the wider commentary tradition, al-Shahrastānī’s use and elaboration of them is strikingly ingenious. For example, he distinguishes at least four grades of generality operating within Quranic concepts.

A detailed discussion of his system is beyond the scope of this essay, but it unveils a breathtaking degree of intelligibility within the text—a kind of semantic logic of the revelation. But crucial to understanding the significance of al-Shahrastānī’s overall project is the primary distinction between creation and the Command. The two are clearly distinguished in 7:54, Do not creation and Command belong to Him?, and for our thinker these constitute the prime orders of reality distinctly dependent on God. The Command has a certain paramountcy insofar as it is ultimately reducible to the Divine creative fiat Be! (kun), through which the data of creation enter existence in the first place—comparable with the Logos of John 1:3, through which “all things came into being” and without which “not one thing came into being.” Creation is thus premised on the Command. Now, for this hermeneut, the Quran in its entirety is mysteriously identical with the latter reality. We might say that for al-Shahrastānī, reality is being channeled through the Quran. It follows that the authentic hermeneutic of the Quran, deriving (he claims) from the teaching of the Household of the Prophet (ahl al-bayt) and made up of the mentioned complementarities, ipso facto amounts to a penetration of the veil of created existence and an ascent to the transcendental roots of manifestation, which are known as the Command. What results is a strikingly “positivistic” form of ta’wil distinct from mystical allegorism. Attention is paid to every minute detail of the scripture in view of its ongoing cosmic function. In this example of sapiential commentary—whose quality makes its recent reclamation from the brink of oblivion all the more poignant—the Quran amounts to the active presence of the Transcendent in our midst, which if properly grasped in its interior, raises us beyond our existential confinement by space and time.
The Quran invites its readers to reflect on various aspects of the three manifest realms from which it draws most of its arguments: the cosmos (āfāq), the human self (nafs), and history (āthār). This Quranic invitation is directed toward instilling an unshakable certitude about its message in the hearts and minds of its readers. The first and foremost message of the Quran is tawḥīd, the uncompromising Oneness of God—the Originator (al-Mubdiʾ) of everything, the absolute Sovereign, Who has set signs (āyāt) throughout His creation, so that Truth (al-ḥaqq) can be distinguished from falsehood (al-bāṭil): We shall show them Our signs upon the horizons and within themselves till it becomes clear to them that it is the truth. Does it not suffice that thy Lord is Witness over all things? (41:53).

All that exists, the Quran tells us, exists because of God, because unto God belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth (e.g., 2:107; 3:189; 9:116). This ontological dependence on the Creator ennobles existing things; they become signs (āyāt) of a transcendent Real (al-Ḥaqq), Who, nevertheless, remains beyond them. Thus the “sign verses” of the Quran have an irresistible urgency,1 drawing our attention to what lies beyond the phenomena they mention. Viewed from the Quranic perspective in this way, the rhythmic alternation of the day and the night (2:164) and the regularities in the movement of the sun and the moon traversing their courses by the decree of the Mighty, the Knowing (36:38–39) are not merely cosmic processes; rather, these are signs pointing toward the existence of the Compassionate (al-Raḥmān) and the Merciful (al-Raḥīm), Who made neither the night nor the day perpetual, for if God should make night come over you unceasingly until the Day of Resurrection, the Quran asks rhetorically, what god other than God would bring you light? (28:71). Likewise,

If God should make day come over you unceasingly until the Day of Resurrection, what god other than God would bring you night, that you might rest therein? Will you not, then, see? Out of His Mercy He made for you night and day, that you may rest therein, and that you may seek of His Bounty, and that haply you may give thanks. (28:72–73)²

The Quran presents the entire cosmic order as proof for its message. Observable processes of the manifest cosmos—such as the movement of stars and planets—are not orderly merely because they observe certain laws of nature, but rather because the One Who created them has set a specific course for them. In fact, the concept of “laws of nature” independent of a Lawgiver is essentially a secular concept, because it makes “nature” a giver of law or at least imbues nature with some inherent order independent of the Creator. The Quran asserts, however, that authority to make laws rests with God alone—the Sovereign and Ruler of the Cosmos:

The sun runs to a dwelling place of its own. That is the decree of the Mighty, the Knowing. And for the moon, We have decreed mansions, till it returns like an old palm stalk. It befits not the sun to overtake the moon, nor the night to outstrip the day. Each glides in an orbit. (36:38–40)

Thus placed within the broader thematic structure of the Quran, these references to nature have traditionally been understood as integrally linked to its overall message. These signs were considered worthy of deep reflection, and it was understood also that one cannot fathom the mysteries of these signs without understanding their scientific content in the traditional sense. The sign verses, therefore, remained a central focus of scientific activity in Islam, and generations of scientists and commentators of the Quran wrote on their significance.

“The principles of these sciences which we have enumerated as well as those which we have not are not outside the Quran,” writes Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (d. 505/1111) in his Jawāhir al-Qurʾān (Jewels of the Quran), “for all of these sciences are derived from one of the seas of the knowledge of God—may He be exalted—that is, the sea of His actions.” He continues:
We have already mentioned that [the Quran] is like an ocean without a shore, and indeed, If the sea were ink for the Words of my Lord, the sea would be exhausted before the Words of my Lord were exhausted (18:109). Among the actions of God—may He be exalted—which are like a sea of actions, are recovery and disease, as He—the most High—mentioned in the story of Abraham, upon whom be peace: the Lord of the worlds, . . . Who, when I am ill, heals me (26:77, 80). This action can only be understood by the one who knows the science of medicine completely. For this science means nothing but the knowledge of all aspects of diseases, their symptoms, and the knowledge of their cure and its means.

And among the actions of the Most High and Exalted are the determination of the course of the sun and the moon and their stages according to a fixed reckoning, as God—the Most High—has said: The sun and the moon are upon a reckoning (55:5). And He said: He it is Who made . . . the moon a light, and determined for it stations, that you might know the number of years and the reckoning [of time] (10:5). And He said: And the moon is eclipsed, and the sun and the moon are brought together (75:8–9). And He said: He makes the night pass into the day and makes the day pass into the night (35:13). And He said: The sun runs to a dwelling place of its own. That is the decree of the Mighty, the Knowing (36:38). The real meaning of the movement of the sun and the moon according to a fixed reckoning and their eclipse, of the merging of the night into the day and the manner of the wrapping of the one onto the other can only be known to him who has the knowledge of the composition of the heavens and the earth, and this in itself is a science.

Likewise, the complete meaning of His saying—may He be Exalted—O mankind! What has deluded you with regard to your noble Lord, Who created you, then fashioned you, then proportioned you, assembling you in whatever form He willed? (82:6–8)—cannot be known to any except the one who has mastered the science of anatomy of man’s apparent and hidden parts along with their numbers, kind, uses, and the underlying wisdom [of their creation]. And He has pointed to these in many verses of the Quran and [the knowledge] of these belongs to the sciences of the ancients and of later generations.
Likewise, Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūtī (d. 911/1505) established a specific classification (nawʾ) in his celebrated work al-Itqān fī ʿulūm al-Qurʾān (The Most Excellent in the Sciences of the Quran) for discussing the concept that principles of all branches of knowledge are present in the Quran. Commenting on 6:38 (We have neglected nothing in the Book) and 16:89 (And We sent down unto thee the Book as a clarification of all things, and as a guidance and a mercy and glad tidings for those who submit [unto God]), al-Suyūtī relates a saying of Ibn Masʿūd, one of the most eminent scholars of the Quran among the Companions of the Prophet: “Whoever wishes to acquire knowledge should take to the Quran, for it contains knowledge of everything.”

This traditional understanding of the sign verses of the Quran was to go through a major transmutation with the rise of scientism in the Muslim world in modern times. Initially emerging in Europe, scientism cultivated the belief that the assumptions and methods of research of the modern physical and biological sciences are equally appropriate and essential for all other disciplines, including philosophy, theology, the humanities, and the social sciences. This doctrine spread to the Muslim world at a time when most of the traditional lands of Islam were under colonial rule, and this situation had a deep impact on the traditional understanding of the sign verses of the Quran. Its thirteenth/nineteenth-century Muslim advocates included reformers who thought that the “backwardness” of Muslims was a consequence of the lack of science and technology, which, according to their view, had enabled Europe to attain material power and economic strength. In order to convince Muslims that the acquisition of modern science was beneficial, these reformers attempted a reinterpretation of the “scientific verses” of the Quran.

These attempts had two distinct goals. The first was to provide a certain degree of legitimacy to the enterprise of modern science in the Muslim world. Toward this end, the advocates of this project pointed out that the Quran contains some 750 such “scientific verses” and maintained that it was, therefore, the religious duty of Muslims to acquire modern science. The second goal was to prove that the Quran is a Divine Book on the basis of the fact that it contains particular facts or theories recently discovered by modern science, facts and theories that could not have been known to the Prophet.

The need to legitimize the reformers’ call for the acquisition of modern science dwindled over the course of the fourteenth/twentieth century, but the second goal of the reformists’ approach to the Quran bloomed and eventually gave rise to a fully differentiated branch of Quranic commentary (tafsīr), the scientific tafsīr (tafsīr ʿilmī). The stock material on which this literature is based has, however, been exhausted and new additions to the existing literature are often mere repetitions or elaborations, as we shall see later in this essay.

The Rise of Scientific Exegesis of the Quran

Two almost simultaneous attempts at a scientific tafsīr of the Quran were in progress near the end of the thirteenth/nineteenth century. The first, by the Indian reformer Sayyid Aḥmad Khān (d. 1315/1898), was begun in 1296/1879 and left unfinished at his death; the second, by Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Iskandarānī (d. ca. 1306/1889), an Egyptian physician, was published as Kashf al-asrār ʿan al-nūrāniyyat al-qurʾāniyyah fi-mā yataʾallaqu biʿl-ajrām al-samāwiyyah waʿl-ardīyyah waʿl-ḥayawānāt waʿl-nabāt waʿl-jawāhir al-maʿdaniyyah.

Khān was restricted in his knowledge of Western science and hence could not identify specific discoveries and inventions in his tafsīr. He was, instead, more concerned with motivating Muslims to acquire modern science. Al-Iskandarānī, however, had more knowledge of modern science and therefore could be more thorough in identifying specific modern inventions and discoveries, claiming they were already present in the Quran. In 1300/1883, al-Iskandarānī made a second attempt to demonstrate the presence of scientific discoveries related to vegetation, minerals, and animals in the Quran in his Tibyān al-asrār al-rabbāniyyah fiʿl-nabāt waʿl-maʿādin waʿl-khawāṣṣ al-ḥayawāniyyah (The Clarification of Divine Secrets in Vegetation and Minerals and in the Characteristics of Animals).

Shortly after these early efforts, the field opened up, and many new books appeared. These include the works of ʿAbd Allāh Bāshā Fīkrī (d. 1307/1889), Sayyid ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Kawkabī (d. 1320/1922), and Muḥammad Tawfīq Ẓidqī (d. 1338/1920), all of whom wrote either exegeses or shorter works on the Quran in which scientific explanations of the verses were offered instead of or in addition to the traditional exegesis. By the end of the thirteenth/nineteenth century, scientific exegesis had established itself as an independent discipline, though it still lacked the general acceptance granted other kinds of exegesis such as juristic and linguistic exegeses (tafsīr fiqhī and tafsīr lughawī).
This blossoming forced writers of surveys on Quranic exegesis to include this new genre in their accounts. Thus Muḥammad Ḥusayn al-Dhahābī (d. 1377/1977), whose seminal work al-Tafsīr wa’l-mufassirūn (Exegesis and Exegetes) is one of the most important fourteenth/twentieth-century surveys of the field, devotes a full chapter to al-tafsīr al-ʿilmī (scientific exegesis). Likewise, J. M. S. Baljon (d. 1422/2001), ʿIffat Muḥammad al-Sharqāwī, and J. J. G. Jansen have all included this genre in their surveys.

During the course of the fourteenth/twentieth century, several new scientific tafāsīr appeared, but none has been as thorough as the twenty-six-volume al-Jawāhīr fī tafsīr al-Qur’ān al-karīm (Pearls of Tafsīr of the Noble Quran) by Taṇṭāwī al-Jawhārī (d. 1359/1940). This work was illustrated with drawings, photographs, and tables. In his preface to the work the author states that he prayed for God to enable him to interpret the Quran in a way that includes all the sciences attained by human beings, so that Muslims could understand the cosmic sciences. Al-Jawhārī attempted to show that sūrah of the Quran complement discoveries of modern science.

Another writer who has influenced considerably the growth of scientific interpretations of the Quran, especially in Turkish, is Badīʿ al-Zamān Saʿīd al-Nūrsī (d. 1380/1960), the founder of the Nurcu movement in Turkey. Nūrsī’s various works, now collected as Risāle-i nūr (The Radiant Book), were clandestinely circulated during his years of exile, but are now freely available in several languages. Nūrsī wrote in very expressive language pulsating with energy. He had considerable knowledge of modern science, which he used to show consonance between the Quran and modern science, primarily in what is called classical physics. He makes attempts to establish normative beliefs of Islam on the basis of the certainties of modern physical sciences and reads the cosmic verses of the Quran in light of modern science.

For Nūrsī, 36:41–42, And We created for them the like (of the full-laden ark) upon which they ride, points to the railway, and 24:35, the “Light Verse,” “alludes to electricity as well as to numerous other lights and mysteries.” Further, 34:12, And unto Solomon [We made obedient] the wind, whose morning course was a month and whose evening course was a month, suggests that the road is open for man to cover such a distance in the air. . . . In which case, O man! since the road is open to you, reach this level! And in meaning Almighty God is saying through the tongue of this verse: “O man! I mounted one of my servants on the air because he gave up the desires of his soul. If you too give up laziness, which comes from the soul, and benefit thoroughly from certain of My laws in the cosmos, you too may mount it.” . . . The verse specified points far ahead of today’s aeroplanes.\(^{17}\)

Likewise, the miracle of the prophet Moses’ staff (2:60) predicts the development of modern drilling techniques to dig out such indispensable substances of modern industry as oil, mineral water, and natural gas. The mention of iron made . . . supple for David (34:10) becomes a reference to the future significance of iron and steel for modern industry.\(^{18}\)

As the genre “matured,” these initial attempts were refined in order to avoid discovering direct correspondence between the vocabulary of the Quran and that of science. These reformulations have disguised scientism to such an extent that in some cases it has become impossible for undiscerning readers to pinpoint it. This disguised form of scientism has pervaded the works of many modern Muslim rationalists, who have submitted to the authority of modern science without examining its premises. A direct consequence of this scientism has been the denial of miracles through allegorical and scientific interpretations of verses that apparently point to a higher order of laws and existents that cannot be scrutinized through the methods of modern science. \textit{The Message of the Qur’an} by Muhammad Asad (d. 1412/1992) exemplifies such a thoroughgoing scientism.\(^{19}\)

This type of scientific \textit{tafsīr} is on occasion integrated into general \textit{tafsīr}, as is the case with Farīd Wajdī’\textsc{’}s (d. 1419/1998) \textit{Ṣafwat al-‘irfān} (\textit{The Best Part of Cognition}), a Quranic commentary with an elaborate introduction that is now commonly known as \textit{al-Muṣḥaf al-mufassar} (\textit{The Quran Interpreted}).\(^{20}\) This commentary, printed in the margin of the text of the Quran, is divided into two parts. The first part, \textit{Tafsīr al-alfāz} (“Explanation of Expressions”), explains difficult and rare words; the second, \textit{Tafsīr al-ma‘ānī} (“Explanation of Meanings”), “translates” the text of the Quran into contemporary Arabic with “scientific” remarks spread throughout the translation. In his remarks Wajdī inserts scientific explanations, often with exclamations placed in parentheses: “You read in this verse an unambiguous prediction of things invented in the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries,” or “Modern science confirms this literally.”\(^{21}\)
Another noteworthy development in the genre of scientific tafsīr is the attempt to link its methodology, concepts, terms, and techniques to the classical tafsīr literature. For instance, the concept of iʿjāz, which classically referred to the inimitability of the Quran, has been expanded by some writers of scientific tafsīr to include scientific iʿjāz. The concept of iʿjāz originated on the basis of the Quranic challenge to the unbelievers to produce a sūrah like its own (11:13). This theme is often present in many classical exegeses of the Quran, where scholars define iʿjāz in precise terms and explore its various dimensions such as its linguistics and grammatical inimitability. By including so-called scientific iʿjāz in this category, the writers of scientific tafsīr made an attempt to graft their work onto the existing coherent body of classical tafsīr. What they mean by “scientific iʿjāz” is, however, quite different from and foreign to the original concept.

In addition to the attempts to link scientific discoveries directly to the verses of the Quran, the impact of scientism has produced interpretations of the Quran molded to conform to specific scientific theories (which are frequently modified) and worldviews that have already been accepted as unquestionable. An important example of this kind of scientism is the attitude of some commentators toward the theory of evolution. Such commentators seek to establish a theistic version of the theory of evolution by interpreting metaphorically those verses of the Quran that are in direct opposition to the theory of evolution. They consider Adam a representative of humanity rather than a specific individual. The impact of the theory of evolution can also be traced in the works of Muḥammad ʿAbduh (d. 1323/1905) and those who were influenced by his thought, including Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā (d. 1354/1935), Muḥammad Iqḥāṣ (d. 1357/1938), Muḥammad Ḥamīdullāh (d. 1423/2002), and Sayyid Sulaymān Nadwī (d. 1373/1953).

Another related development in scientific interpretations of the Quran is the appearance of a large amount of secondary literature, including books, articles, television productions, and audiovisual and Web-based material. The dramatic increase in this literature during the last three decades of the fourteenth/twentieth century can be attributed to various social, political, and economic factors. It was a time during which a sudden increase in oil revenues gave economic leverage to certain Muslim states, which then established institutions to promote scientific interpretations of the Quran. These institutions organized numerous international conferences and seminars in which speakers linked verses of the Quran to specific data and theories of modern science to prove that (1) the Quran is truly a Book of God revealed to the Prophet of Islam because such specific scientific information was unknown during his lifetime, and (2) the Quran already contains all scientific knowledge, and it is for science and scientists to discover this knowledge.

This secondary literature is enormously popular in the Muslim world, and this popularity has, in turn, contributed to its exponential growth. It ranges from The Bible, the Qur’an and Science, by the French doctor who embraced Islam, Maurice Bucaille, (d. 1418/1998; it was first published in 1976 and since then translated into every major language in the Muslim world), and is in hundreds of websites that attempt to prove the authenticity of the Quran on the basis of modern science.31

In addition to the oil boom of the 1970s, the rise, popularity, and mass distribution of this literature owes its existence and propagation to a number of other political, social, psychological, and technological factors, such as the reach of the Internet and other mass communication technologies. During the last quarter of the fourteenth/twentieth century a number of state-sponsored institutions, such as the Pakistan Hijrah Council and the Commission for Scientific Miracles of the Quran and Sunnah (Hay’at al-i’jāz al-‘ilmī fi’l-Qur’ān wa’l-Sunnah), established at Makkah under the aegis of the World Muslim League (Rābiṭat al-‘alam al-islāmī), organized international conferences and research programs to promote the idea of the scientific miracles of the Quran. These international conferences typically invited scientists—especially non-Muslim scientists—to relate their scientific research to specific verses of the Quran or to the traditions of the Prophet of Islam.32 Videotaped proceedings of such conferences were then distributed throughout the world.33 This undertaking further propagated the trend of writing scientific interpretations of the Quran.

Content, Methodology, and General Approach of Scientific Tafāsīr

The stock content of scientific tafāsīr consists of those verses of the Quran in which certain biological, geological, meteorological, or cosmic processes are mentioned. Since many such processes are the subject matter of science, modernist writers of such tafāsīr and secondary literature have used the theories and data of modern science to explain such verses. In so doing they often identify Quranic vocabulary with that of modern science. For instance, an often cited verse purportedly supporting the big bang theory is 21:30 (Have those who disbelieve not considered that the heavens and the earth were sewn together and We rent them asunder?), in which the words ratq (“sewn together”) and fatq (“rent asunder”) are interpreted to mean that the earth and the skies were fused together as a dense, hot mass, which God split apart à la the big bang model of creation proposed by Martin Ryle and Allan R. Sandage. This prefiguration of the big bang theory in the Quran is then taken as proof of its Divine Origin.

Another popular example is that of embryonic development, for which 23:12–14 are usually cited as proof of the presence of recently discovered scientific data in the Quran:

> And indeed We created man from a draught of clay. Then We made him a drop in a secure dwelling place. Then of the drop We created a blood clot, then of the blood clot We created a lump of flesh, then of the lump of flesh We created bones and We clothed the bones with flesh; then We brought him into being as another creation. Blessed is God, the best of creators!

The analogy between these verses and the scientific understanding of embryonic development was first demonstrated by Canadian embryologist Keith Moore, who was invited to several conferences organized by the Commission on Scientific Signs of the Qur’an and Sunnah, and later published by the commission in a special edition of his book The Developing Human.[^34] This edition contained “Islamic Additions” and a new preface by Moore in which he states:

> I was astonished by the accuracy of the statements that were recorded in the seventh century AD, before the science of embryology was established. Although I was aware of the glorious history of Muslim scientists in the fourth/tenth century and of some of their contributions to medicine, I knew nothing about the religious facts and beliefs contained in the Quran and Sunnah. It is important for Islamic and other students to understand the meaning of these Quranic statements about human development, based on current scientific knowledge.
Illustrated with drawings and photographs, the “Islamic edition” of Moore’s book identifies certain key words of these verses (sulālah, nuṣfah, ἀlaaqah, and mudghah) with stages of embryonic development and then asks: “How could Muhammad have possibly known all this 1400 years ago, when scientists have only recently discovered this using advanced equipment and powerful microscopes which did not exist at that time?”

A remarkably similar methodology appears in all the numerous scientific interpretations of the Quran, as if they have come from the same mold; they usually differ from one another only in details. All of them focus on those verses of the Noble Quran that describe natural processes or the constituent elements of the cosmos, such as the sky, planets, stars, earth, sun, moon, mountains, oceans, and clouds. All of them use only the most current scientific data and theories and avoid any reference to obsolete scientific theories, without realizing that what is current today will soon become obsolete tomorrow. Sometimes these works do acknowledge the fact that our scientific understanding of the physical cosmos is always changing; yet they continue to proffer scientific data as proof of the Divine Origin of the Quran. These interpretations lack context—that is, they isolate the verses being interpreted from their immediate context as well as from the overall Quranic perspective on the cosmos.

Scientific Exegesis Revisited

Even prior to the rise of modern science and its impact on the Muslim world there were some scholars who did not approve of any overt reading of science in the Quran. Abū ʾIṣḥāq al-Shāṭibī (d. 790/1388), for instance, argued that the Quran was not sent down as a compendium of medicine, astronomy, geometry, chemistry, or necromancy, but as a book of guidance for leading humanity out of darkness and into light. Agreeing with al-Shāṭibī, al-Dhahabī adds that 6:38, We have neglected nothing in the Book (mā farraʾnā fiʾl-kitāb min shay’), should not be interpreted to mean that the Quran contains details of all types of knowledge, but only that it contains the general principles (uṣūl ʿāmmah) of all those matters that human beings must know in order to reach physical and spiritual perfection. Furthermore, al-Dhahabī adds, the word al-kitāb in this verse could refer to the Preserved Tablet (al-lawḥ al-maḥfūz; 85:22). This critique was meant to keep readers’ focus on the main purpose of the Quranic revelation—the guidance of humanity—an issue that never arose before, because until the rise of modern scientism no one dissociated the sign verses of the Quran from its overall worldview.

The attempts to read modern science in the Quran are, however, quite different from what was indicated by traditional scholars such as al-Ghazzālī. These new works decontextualize verses of the Quran; they take a changing human science as the criteria for “proving” that the Quran is in fact the Word of God; and they attempt to show compatibility between the Quran and modern science, although the latter is built upon philosophical premises about the cosmos in which the existence of a Creator is irrelevant. Various attempts to show that certain verses of the Quran prefigure theories of modern science are flawed, because there is no essential correspondence between the terminology and Weltanschauung of modern science and that of the Quran.

It is problematic to claim, as do many proponents of the scientific tafsīr, that ratq and fatq in 21:30 point to a big bang of the sorts claimed by modern science, because these words simply do not mean the “dense, fused matter” that “exploded” in the big bang model of modern scientific cosmology. In the context of the verse, it is quite clear that these two words have many meanings, including the closing up of the skies and the earth, so no rain falls and no vegetation grows from the ground, and the sudden opening of the skies so that, through God’s Mercy, torrential rains cause the earth—dead until now—to be revived, yielding its treasures, allowing vegetation to grow. These are presented as evidence for the Oneness of God (tawḥīd) and Resurrection (maʿād), as Amīn Āḥsan Iṣlāḥī (d. 1418/1997) has pointed out in his tafsīr.41

Likewise, all other verses of the Quran that are the stock material of modern attempts at scientific exegesis can be shown to indicate something far different from what these commentators wish to read into them. In general, it can be said that attempts at finding modern science in the Quran or proving the veracity of the Quran by way of modern science are fundamentally flawed, because they suffer from a conceptual confusion produced by various forms of scientism. They dissociate and decontextualize the Quranic vocabulary and concepts in order to graft modern scientific theories onto the Book.

Conclusion

As already mentioned, the sign verses of the Quran direct our attention to three realms of existence, the cosmos (āfāq), the human self (nafs), and history (āthār), in order to establish an unshakable belief in the Quranic message. Various elements of the first realm, the cosmos, are described in the Quran in their dual role as discernible physical entities regulated through Divine laws (often misnamed laws of nature) and as signs or symbols (āyāt) pointing beyond themselves. These signs are presented as material for reflection for those who have hearts to reflect:

> Indeed, in the creation of the heavens and the earth; and the variation of the night and the day; and the ships that run upon the sea with what benefits mankind; and the water God sends down from the sky whereby He revives the earth after its death, scattering all manner of beast therein; and the shifting of the winds; and the clouds subdued between the sky and the earth are surely signs for a people who understand. (2:164)

The sign verses are points of departure for people who reflect on them. The very act of bringing into existence the heavens and the earth and all that is contained within them is a proof of the infinite Power and Might of the Creator, His inimitable Skill (ṣanʿah) and infinite Wisdom (ḥikmah). The remarkable harmony of the innumerable elements and forces present in the cosmos could not have come into existence, had there been more than one Creator; in that case there would be more than one operative volition, resulting in the destruction of order and eventually the entire cosmos.

Without mentioning directly here the Most Beautiful Divine Names (al-asmāʾ al-ḥusnā)—such as al-Bāriʾ (“the Maker”) and al-Mubdiʾ (“the Originator”), which evoke the infinite and absolute creativity of God—the verse just mentioned refers to the coming into existence of the heavens and the earth as proof of God’s Oneness and His absolute Sovereignty. The bounteous generosity of the elements of the cosmos (waters bring life to earth, the winds bring rain) point to His inexhaustible Wisdom and Mercy. Furthermore, the cosmos and its elements testify that there is, indeed, a purpose in the creation, for such a vast, complex, and interconnected cosmos cannot be pointless. Likewise, the succession of night and day, their regularity, contrast in color, function, and effects on humanity and other things and beings existing in the cosmos are proofs for the harmonious functioning of various elements of the cosmos, despite their opposite natures. The movement of winds (taṣrīf al-riyāḥ) sometimes brings rain-laden clouds; at other times the winds scatter clouds, so that they do not bring rain to the barren earth; for some, winds bring Divine Mercy, while for others they are means of His Retribution.

Unlike the worldview created by modern science, the Quranic view of the elements of nature does not make them only subservient to humanity; rather, they remain in the service of their Lord, Who created them and set them to tasks for His Purpose. They benefit humanity, and their existence and functioning can be studied by human beings through an understanding of the laws prescribed by the Creator for their existence, but the cosmos remains ultimately beyond human control.

In addition to their physical descriptions and functions, the Quran contains numerous other levels of meaning in relation to the elements of the cosmos. Water pouring down from the sky is a physical process; it helps to bring forth vegetation, but its ability to do so depends on the receptivity of the earth; some regions of the earth are more receptive to it than others and benefit from rain, while others remain un receptive and do not bear fruit. The guidance of the Quran is like rain. Some benefit from it; others pay no heed to it. Winds are physical; they drive clouds and bring rain. But there are also winds of Divine Mercy blowing in the hearts of those who believe and remain steadfast in their beliefs and servitude to their Creator. Their functions vary, and thus they carry not only life-nurturing rains, but also, as mentioned in the Quranic story of Joseph (Sūrah 12), the fragrance from the tunic of a long-lost son, which serves as a secondary cause for the restoration of a father’s eyesight (10:94).

The elements of the cosmos are both proofs and witnesses for the Hereafter (al-ākhirah), which is infinitely better than this world. This testimony (shahādah) of the elements and of the entire cosmos to the Hereafter is present in various forms in the Quran, ranging from oaths to arguments drawn from the properties of the elements. In fact, the very act of creation testifies to the coming of a moment when God will fold back His creation to complete the cycle. Taken as a whole, this entire cosmic scheme of the Quran establishes an inalienable link between the manifest cosmos and its Creator. Furthermore, built into this Quranic description of the cosmos is a teleology that anchors the physical cosmos in a metaphysical realm, thereby establishing an incontrovertible nexus between God and the cosmos, on the one hand, and whatever exists in the cosmos and its raison d’être, on the other. This anchoring of the physical cosmos and all that exists in it in a realm beyond the physical is utterly lost in modern science, where the physical cosmos and its contents stand independently by themselves, utterly disconnected from anything higher than their own existence. Attempts to interpret the Quran scientifically, therefore, suffer from the inherent disparity between the Quranic and modern scientific views of the cosmos.
The Quran descended (nazala) or was revealed over a period spanning almost twenty-three years, divided by the migration (hijrah) of the Prophet—peace and blessings be upon him—into two fundamental eras: the almost thirteen years of the Prophet’s residence in Makkah and the ten years of his residence in Madinah before the end of his earthly life. Among the most important topics covered by the traditional disciplines devoted to the study of the Quran (‘ulūm al-Qur‘ān) is the determination of which revelations belong to the Makkan period and which to the Madinan with regard to the number of verses revealed, the themes covered, the different commandments, and their various possible meanings (dalālāt). The Makkan and Madinan parts of the Quran are distinguished from one another based on the principal objectives (maqāṣid) of each period as established by the scholars of Quranic exegesis (‘ulamāʾ al-tafsīr). The primary objectives of the Quran during the Makkan period were to establish the fundamentals (uṣūl) of the faith, argue for the truth of Divine Oneness (tawhīd) while deepening knowledge of it, refute the errors of polytheism (shirk) and idolatry (wathaniyyah), and elucidate the connections between the central tenets of the faith and the fundamentals of morality. The principal objective during the Madinan period was to promulgate laws for the creation of an Islamic society and therefore the ordering of life in a wide range of areas covering family life, social interactions, and business transactions.

The verses of the Makkan period are therefore distinguished by extensive references to the Resurrection and the Judgment, Paradise and Hellfire and stories of the early communities of faith and their acceptance or rejection of revelation—those truths most necessary to bring about a change in the hearts and minds of people given to false beliefs, misconceptions about reality, and unworthy habits and customs. The Madinan parts of the Quran are distinguished by the promulgation of laws for personal affairs, society, and the state, including rules of marriage, child nursing (raḍāʾah), family maintenance (nafaqah), inheritance (mīrāth), usury (riban), commercial transactions (buyūʿ), retribution (qiṣāṣ), and struggle in society and in the path of God (jihād)—all of the different laws that came to be a matter of concern for Muslims as soon as they were constituted as a community, with a state of their own, social institutions, an army, and a leader.

Accordingly, Makkan groups of verses almost always begin with an address to humanity at large, such as O mankind or O Children of Adam, while Madinan sections usually open with an address to the community of the faithful, that is, Muslims in particular, almost always beginning with the phrase O you who believe. Similarly, verses of the Makkan period are characteristically short and redolent with endless shades of warning (tarhīb) against wrong action and incitement (targhīb) to right action; they abound in symbolic stories that convey moral and spiritual lessons and offer admonitions. By contrast, most of the verses of the Madinan period are relatively long, comprising accounts of fundamental changes in society and elaborations of rules pertaining to these changes. The majority of scholars also point out that all sūrahs mentioning hypocrites (munāfiqūn) are Madinan, whereas all sūrahs containing the retort kallā (“Nay!”) are Makkan. Additional distinguishing characteristics exist, but need not be mentioned here.

For the purposes of the present inquiry, the most important point to draw from this distinction is that it is in verses from the Madinan period that are found the roots of Islamic laws in their vast number and variety. Therefore, it is through special attention to verses of the Madinan period that the pivotal connection between Islamic Law and the Quran—that is, the fact that it issues directly from the revealed Book—will be most clearly seen.

The Quran carries within it many references indicating its status as a lawgiving book: it gives commands (awāmir) and prohibitions (nawāhin); it states what is licit (ḥalāl) and illicit (ḥarām); it contains formal obligations (takālīf) as well as doctrines and ethical directives. In this respect the Quran is more like the Torah of Moses than the Gospel of Jesus—may peace be upon them both. We read in Sūrah 7, al-Aʿrāf (“The Heights”):

Those who follow the Messenger, the unlettered Prophet, whom they find inscribed in the Torah and the Gospel that is with them, who enjoins upon them what is right, and forbids them what is wrong, and makes good things lawful for them, and forbids them bad things, and relieves them of their burden and the shackles that were upon them. Thus those who believe in him, honor him, help him, and follow the light that has been sent down with him; it is they who shall prosper. (v. 157)

In Sūrah 42, al-Shūrā (“Counsel”) it is said:

He has prescribed for you as religion that which He enjoined upon Noah, and that which We revealed unto thee (Muhammad), and that which We enjoined upon Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, that you uphold religion and not become divided therein. Grievous for the idolaters is that to which thou callest them. God chooses for Himself whomsoever He will and guides unto Himself whosoever turns in repentance. (v. 13)

In Sūrah 45, al-Jāthiyah (“Upon Their Knees”) we read:

Then We placed thee (Muhammad) upon a clear path from the Command, so follow it, and follow not the caprices of those who know not. (v. 18)

And, finally, in Sūrah 2, al-Baqarah (“The Cow”) it is written:

And whosoever transgresses against the limits set by God, those are the wrongdoers. . . . These are the limits set by God, which He makes clear to a people who know. (vv. 229–30)

The Quran thus contains explicit statements that it is the sacred source and primary authority for Muslim legislation in personal, social, economic, and political matters—and no change of time or place can affect this primacy. Nowhere does the Quran indicate—whether directly or indirectly—that its laws are of limited duration, that they belong to a particular period, age, or society, that Muslims may thereafter deem themselves no longer bound by its precepts, or that they may choose to organize their lives or societies by resorting to other than the revealed Book or the Prophetic authority in founding their common laws and establishing their familial, social, economic, and constitutional orders.

Quranic laws are accordingly distinguished by permanence; yet they are flexible and have the potential to accommodate future developments. Indeed, Muslims consider the capacity of Quranic laws to yield perennially appropriate rulings and applications one of the features of the Divine inimitability or miracle (iʿjāz) of the Noble Book. Other such features include eloquence (faṣāḥah), rhetorical power (balāghah), and the telling of unseen events, past, present, and future. Concerning this understanding of its supernatural nature, Muslims have remained unanimous for fourteen centuries. And, indeed, history has proven that Islamic civilization has prospered and flourished under the shining rays of the Quran, reaching, by virtue of its Divine Guidance, summits of excellence and unity, enduring over the long stretch of fourteen centuries, and procuring happiness and contentment for a vast sector of humanity by offering truth, goodness, and beauty—hardly the products offered by the civilizations of today.

Against this view maintained by Muslim scholars and a large sector of the community of believers over the ages, some people today object to the necessity of linking legislation to the Quran as the primary source of law and the insistence that it should remain the authoritative reference for the Islamic social order, arguing that it makes no sense to honor the authority of a text revealed some fourteen centuries ago in today’s world, which has little or no similarity to or continuity with the one that gave birth to it. This perception has led such people to resort to modern readings of the text that are totally unconnected to the traditional Quranic disciplines (ʿulūm al-Qurʾān), which developed around the Quran and became, over a long period, an integral corpus establishing the logical and linguistic criteria that alone guarantee the Quran’s accurate interpretation. The results of such ungrounded forays into the demanding territory of Quranic exegesis are readings foreign to both the form and content of the Quran and, in many cases, reach conclusions directly opposed to its true objectives (maqāṣid). The root of the problem here is a conflict between the nature of modern readings that believe in neither the sacredness nor the inimitability of the Quranic text and those who see the Quran as a Divine Text transcending time and place and not merely a work of human authorship. We shall thus try to refer as much as possible, in the context of the present inquiry, to some of the fallacies into which this or that modern reading has fallen. Some are either entirely Western or simply misguided from the start insofar as they do not see the Quran as a Sacred Text, but as a literary one upon which all the crises and deviations of the modern Western mind may be projected.
Principles of Islamic Law

EASE OF OBLIGATIONS (ʿADAM AL-HARAJ)

The first point to note concerning the laws promulgated in the Quran is that they do not burden believers with more than they can bear; nothing excessive is imposed. The Quran indicates the lightness and ease of its laws for the faithful in many verses, for example: God desires ease for you, and He does not desire hardship for you (2:185); God tasks no soul beyond its capacity (2:286); God desires to lighten [your burden] for you, for man was created weak (4:28); God desires not to place a burden upon you (5:6); and There is no fault against the blind, nor fault against the lame, nor fault against the sick (24:61). The Prophet—peace and blessings be upon him—confirmed this principle when he said, “I have been sent with the true and tolerant religion of primordial unity (al-ḥanīfah al-samḥā),”⁴ which he would put into practice whenever he was presented with a choice between two things by always choosing the least burdensome obligation.

The universal rules of Islamic Law upon which are based all obligations of the religion, whether in matters of ritual (ʿibādāt) or pertaining to human transactions and social relations (muʿāmalāt), were developed in conformity with this principle of not imposing a heavy burden. Among these rules we find such legal maxims as: “Too much hardship calls for ease” (al-mashaqqah tajlibuʾl-taysīr); “Necessity makes the unlawful lawful” (al-ḍarūrat tubīhuʾl-maḥzūrāt); and “When a matter becomes too narrow, it calls for broadening” (idhā ḍāqaʾl-amr ittasaʾa). As an example of this principle jurists cite the rules for the canonical prayer, which Muslims must normally begin in an upright posture—an easy enough requirement; but they are permitted to perform it sitting or even lying down whenever sick, exhausted, or otherwise unable to maintain the upright position. The same qualification applies to the obligation to fast, which people are allowed to forgo in situations of great hardship, during travel, illness, pregnancy, or when nursing a baby.⁵ Carrion meat (al-mayyitah), normally forbidden, also becomes permitted when there is no other alternative. Similarly, the rite of ablution with water (wuḍūʾ) ordained in the Quran may be replaced by the easier rite of dry ablution (tayammum) in cases of illness, danger, or the unavailability of water.

Thus, whenever there may be a legitimate reason, Islamic Law either releases believers completely from the obligation to perform a certain act of worship, lightens it for them, exchanges it for a less taxing act of worship, combines two acts of worship, changes the form or order of some acts of worship, or allows the use of a forbidden thing in situations of dire necessity. Indeed, the rule even touches upon one of the major principles of Islam, the duty to “enjoin right and forbid wrong” (al-amr bi’l-maʿrūf wa’l-nahy ʿan al-munkar), a pivotal principle of the Quran confirmed by many verses. The principle of noncomplication permits a Muslim to remain silent before an evil, if a greater evil or a greater tribulation could result from speaking out. The jurists derived such rulings by means of rational inference from the practices of the Prophet during his thirteen years in Makkah prior to migrating to Madinah, during which time he witnessed many objectionable events, yet remained patient and silent because he could do nothing to change them. It is narrated that the Ḥanbalite jurist Aḥmad ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728/1328), while in the company of some scholars, came across a group of Tartars who were drinking wine. One of the scholars wanted to object to their practice, but Ibn Taymiyyah forbade him, saying: “Wine was forbidden because it distracted from the remembrance of God and prayer, and these men are distracted from killing souls, enslaving offspring, and seizing money and property. So, let them be.”

FEWNESS OF OBLIGATIONS (QILLAT AL-TAKĀLĪF)

The second principle upon which Islamic Law is founded is fewness of obligations. Among the obligations imposed by the Quran, verses that issue rulings governing human or social relationships (muʿāmalāt) are by far fewer in number than those that prescribe ritual acts or ethical behavior. They are also fewer in number than verses that call for learning from the examples of earlier religious communities, warning against their ways or showing the perils that result, and they are likewise fewer than the verses exhorting to reward (targhīb) or warning against punishment (tarhīb) and similar topics. Even though jurists are not unanimous about the exact number of verses that pertain to formal obligations, because they differ with regard to their specific number or meaning, they are nonetheless unanimous about the small number of these verses as such, which accords with the Quranic precept forbidding excessive questioning about rules in order to prevent the proliferation of restrictions and obligations. Thus: O you who believe! Ask not about things that, if they were disclosed to you, would trouble you (5:101). And the Prophet used to forbid his followers to ask too many questions, saying: “The gravest wrong committed by a Muslim against other Muslims is to ask about something that is permissible, causing it to become impermissible because of his question.”

He did not encourage inquiry into matters about which the Quran is silent, leaving them to the golden Islamic rule declaring, “The norm in all things is permissibility (al-aṣl fiʿl-ashyāʾ al-ibāḥah).” Prohibition is only an exception (tāriʿ) and, as such, always stands in need of proof; if no proof is found, no prohibition is possible.

In other words, there are matters about which the Quran remains silent, and this silence on the part of the Lawgiver is deliberate; it is meant to offer people more leverage, more room for maneuver and choice. They are left to the jurists’ exercise of independent judgment (ijtihād), conducted in accordance with their changing perception of the welfare of society, relative to time and place. This is precisely what the following ḥadīth refers to: “God has enjoined certain obligatory duties: do not neglect them. He has imposed certain limits: do not transgress them. He has remained silent about certain matters, out of mercy to you, not out of forgetfulness: do not seek after them.” This ḥadīth is quite positive about the existence of a vast area of cases and issues in peoples’ lives about which the Sharīʿah offers no specific rulings. These belong to the sphere of Divine Pardon (al-ʿafw), described in another ḥadīth in which the Prophet said, “Whatever God has called licit in His Book is indeed licit; whatever He deemed illicit is indeed illicit; whatever He remained silent about is pardoned, for God does not forget a thing.”

FLEXIBILITY OF TEXTS

Despite their limited number, the Quranic texts dealing specifically with legislative matters are marked by broadness, flexibility, and variety of forms and are general or specific depending on the nature of the circumstances and obligations. In the verses that deal with legislative matters having little room for the exercise of independent reasoning, such as the spheres of ritual acts and of rules concerning the family, or what is now called personal law—that is, in matters not particularly affected by the logic of social customs and circumstances—the Quran is quite specific. Acts of worship such as prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and pilgrimage are obligations whose meanings, mysteries, and wisdom alongside the reasons for their taking one form rather than another are beyond the power of the human mind to know or determine. Such obligations are what the Sharīʿah calls “matters of worship” (al-umūr al-taʿabbudiyyah), that is, matters that the Lawgiver—God Himself—commands people to perform, matters they are incapable of determining on their own initiative. To take the canonical prayer (ṣalāh) as an example, prayer occurs in more than seventy places in the Quran and given, among others, are its correct performance, the necessary conditions for making it acceptable (such as ablution, wuḍūʾ, and facing the Kaʿbah, qiblah), the particular times it must be performed, and the general bodily position that must accompany it, although the details of the form of the ṣalāh are based on Prophetic example.

Then there are the rules for acts pertaining to “human transactions” (muʿāmalāt) and “matters of public welfare” (maṣāliḥ), which are generally unaffected by either the passage of time or a change of environment; they are causally determined (aḥkām muʿallalah), their meanings and objectives intelligible, and the verses revealed about them are accordingly fewer and less specific in nature. In these spheres the Quran offers mostly general principles, leaving vast room for the use of analogy, inference, and other forms of reasoning. With the exception of a few rulings concerning inheritance (mawārith) and the punishment of certain crimes, “specific rules are generally lacking,” in the formulation of the Quran itself.¹²

With regard to situations subject to change, the Quran offers a general framework of universal principles, ethical and humane in essence, to regulate and govern the particulars of changing conditions.¹³ Among other places, this may be seen in the rules concerning the contract of sale. Though this is the contract with the most rules in civil law, only four are mentioned in the Quran:
the rule that makes trade lawful: God has permitted buying and selling and forbidden usury (2:275); the stipulation that transactions between seller and buyer be governed by mutual consent: O you who believe! Consume not each other’s wealth falsely, but trade by mutual consent (4:29); the instruction that they be declared and witnessed: And take witnesses when you buy and sell between yourselves (2:282); and the prohibition against buying and selling after the call to prayer is made on Friday: O you who believe! When you are called to the congregational prayer, hasten to the remembrance of God and leave off trade. That is better for you, if you but knew (62:9).

Similarly, with regard to constitutional law, the Quran limits itself to specifying the principles of consultation (shūrā), justice (ʾadl), and equality (musāwāh); and with regard to criminal law, the Quran stipulates only five punishments, for the crimes of murder, theft, adultery and fornication, corruption upon earth (ḥadd al-ḥarābah), and calumny against women of virtue. The same may likewise be said of most other aspects of legislation relating to daily life or affected by changing circumstances in the general conditions of society, the foremost among these being matters pertaining to human transactions, punishments, crimes, and economic affairs.\textsuperscript{14}

In all of these changing matters, the philosophy of Quranic Law is to determine the general principle or universal rule, so that people will be able to integrate the diverse conditions of life with the guidance of Heaven. This purpose of Quranic legal texts, to combine the sphere of permanence with the sphere of change, is the main reason for Quranic Law’s continuing vitality, survival, and ability to keep pace with various developments; it has allowed Quranic Law to guide Muslims for more than thirteen centuries prior to European colonial powers’ replacement of it with laws imported from the West. It is, indeed, to this very flexibility that the credit for the preservation of Islamic civilization must be given, and this Law continues even today to possess and provide the power to resist the disintegrative elements of modern conditions.

GRADUALISM OF LEGISLATION

Many of the verses of the Quran pertaining to legislation were revealed gradually and intermittently. This is particularly true of the verses that legislate against the deep-rooted customs of the pre-Islamic Arabs. As the most effective way to bring about lasting social change, gradualism was the chosen method for drawing people away from slavish adherence to idolatrous customs to the freedom and dignity of sufficiency in God. It is almost certain that if the Quran had confronted the Arabs of the time of revelation with strict commands and prohibitions without offering them sufficient time to abandon their entrenched ways by degrees, many of them would have abandoned its teachings.

We thus find the gradual announcement of the prohibition against intoxicating substances rather than the issuance of a single law, because the habit of drinking was a deeply ingrained custom among Arabs at the time. First the Quran undertook to show that intoxicants possess both benefits and evils; then it prohibited the performance of prayer while in a state of intoxication; and finally it prohibited intoxicants altogether, along with gambling (2:219, 4:43, 5:59), once people were prepared to accept this final ruling. Similarly, the Quran’s prohibition of fornication and usury came gradually, as did its calling upon Muslims to remain patient vis-à-vis the aggressive acts of their enemies; only at a later stage were they commanded to defend themselves by fighting back.

This was likewise the case with the command to perform prayers and the qiblah, the direction of prayer. At the beginning prayers consisted of only two cycles performed by day and two cycles by night, but were increased when people were ready and able to do more, as decreed by the Wisdom of God. Muslims originally prayed in the direction of Jerusalem, until a special revelation descended commanding them to face the direction of the Sacred Sanctuary in Makkah. Quranic laws were, therefore, not arbitrarily imposed all at once, but were revealed gradually, which allowed the Arabs to reform within themselves deeply rooted patterns of behavior that may otherwise have been ineradicable.

Implicitness of Rulings in the Text of the Quran

Determining the rulings implicit in the text is one of the subtlest of all inquiries that deal with legislation in the Quran, since it is related to knowing the sense and meaning of the relevant verses and how one may extract rulings from them. This task is made more intricate by the fact that the Quranic text is revealed in Arabic, a language with unique linguistic, poetic, and metaphysical qualities requiring of its readers special linguistic and intellectual qualifications in order to access its treasures of knowledge and wisdom.

For Muslims, the Quran is unique among all texts, ancient and modern, in possessing three distinctive qualities:

1. It is an intact and direct sacred text. According to the Islamic faith, it is the record of the very Speech of God—may He be exalted—not the speech of some mortal, including Muhammad, who had no role in its wording, composition, or stylistic construction. This sacrality confers upon the Quran a degree of sublimity and transcendence that makes it unyielding, unless one comes to it with the necessary intellectual and psychological qualifications.

2. Its verses are supremely fertile and rich in meaning. They transcend the boundaries of time and space, acting as a witness and a corrective for whatever situations or contingencies human beings may face. According to Muslim belief, they store in their simple yet profound sentences an infinitude of Divine Knowledge, including ethical and legal directives potentially applicable to all times and places.
3. The authenticity of its verses is extraordinarily well documented, established permanently and indubitably. The Quran is perhaps the only Divinely revealed text that possesses an unbroken line of transmission to its earthly source. Its verses were conveyed by a mouthpiece of Heaven, written down in his presence, memorized, and recorded in manuscripts exactly as dictated by the Prophet, verse by verse and letter by letter. These words, moreover, never disappeared after the death of their transmitter; nor were they ever attributed to anyone other than him (as their communicator), by way of either inspiration or revelation.

Anyone who reads or contemplates this Sacred Text without seeing it in light of these three distinctive qualities can go no farther than the merely literal meaning, for the Text reveals or withholding its more profound meanings relative to the degree of one’s knowledge of the philosophy of its language, its learned disciplines, its literary heritage, and of one’s spiritual inspiration to understand its secrets. Muslim scholars are unanimous in maintaining that the Quranic Text is “unequivocally evident” (qāṭiʿ al-thubūt) as an authentic text; the proof of this unequivocality is precisely its broad and uninterrupted transmission (tawātur). Through it alone can we believe in such things as the events of the past that constitute sacred history, the historicity of great personages, the great religions, and the great messengers as well as eschatological events to come.

However, this “unequivocality” (qāṭiʿ) of the Text not shared by the concepts and the meanings implicit within it. Among Quranic texts, there are those that are unequivocal, bearing no shade of meaning except what can be learned from the Text itself, as in the case of the verses indicating the obligation to pray (ṣalāh), give alms (zakāh), or determine the different allotments of the inheritors of a legacy. The same applies to the verses declaring the illicitness of such things as adultery and fornication, murder, and the dispossession of others’ lawful rights. However, there are other verses in which the evidence for the Shariʿah ruling given by the Text is only probable (muḥtamal); in such cases, the implication of the verse is called “equivocal” (dalālah ẓanniyyah). The difference between an unequivocal implication and an equivocal one is that the first does not require any extra human effort to understand it, there can be no difference of opinion regarding it, nor is it amenable to modification or development, whereas the second permits different opinions as long as each is based on a process of reflection consistent with the principles of jurisprudence that usually comes under the rubric of “intellectual effort” (ijtihād) in this particular science.\textsuperscript{15}

Scholars of the principles of jurisprudence (\textit{al-uṣūliyyūn}) have summarized this duality between the unequivocality of the Quranic text in itself and the equivocality of the meanings, judgments, or rulings derived from it in the maxim: “The Quran is of unequivocal immutability and equivocal meanings” (\textit{qaṭī al-thubūt ẓann al-dalālah}). By this they mean that absolute certainty with regard to the Noble Quran is posited only with regard to the words and letters of the Sacred Text, but the rulings that may be understood from it can be of either an unequivocal nature, having no possible meaning but one, or an equivocal nature, bearing more than one meaning; all of this is ultimately governed by the nature of the words and grammatical constructions of the Arabic language.\textsuperscript{16}

In this context, one must bear in mind that the unequivocal texts are few in number, mostly concerning the sphere of dogma and ritual, whereas most of the equivocal texts concern the sphere of social relations (\textit{muʿāmalāt}). This fact shows that the claims of certain Western orientalists who accuse Islamic Law of rigidity and stagnation are untrue—the \textit{Sharīʿah} is replete with open-ended texts, and its overall philosophy relies on principles such as desisting from judgment (\textit{ʿafw}) and maintaining silence (\textit{sukūt}) about innumerable things, so as to give ample room for human thought and responsibility. Moreover, a deeply rooted principle of the \textit{Sharīʿah} posits continuous revivification (\textit{tajdīd}): “God causes to rise in this community, at the beginning of every century, someone who will revive for it its religion”;\textsuperscript{17} and rational inference (\textit{al-istinbāṭ al-ʿaqlī}) is one of the sources of legislation and the formation of legal judgment. Such a legal system can never become fixed in a single understanding or a potentially unchanging school of legal thought (\textit{madhhab}); nor can its relevance, applicability, or products be limited to a specific time or place.

\textit{Rules for Inferring Legal Judgments}

Scholars of the principles of jurisprudence study the implications of the Quran for legal judgments on two unequal levels: the purely linguistic level, dealing with the relation of words to their implied meanings, and the level of legal judgments derivable from the Quranic Text.

\textbf{LINGUISTICS OF THE QURANIC TEXT}

All texts are relevant to the inquiry into the relation between words and meanings, whatever their provenance within the Arabic literary heritage—poetic, historical, literary, scientific, and so on—might be. This study is purely linguistic, based on general principles that are thereafter applied to the “Quranic composition,” so as to enable one to learn the meaning implied by the texts. This level of inquiry is a necessary prologue to the inference of legal judgments from the Quran, for, even if it is Divine Speech, the Quran is manifest to the human mind in the form of language, that is, through words, meanings, and specific usages. The understanding of the implications of the Quranic composition for legal judgments depends first on understanding the universal rules concerning Arabic words and their meanings. On this level, one has to study several disciplines including logic, linguistics, and Sacred Law, which differ in the perspectives they adopt on the relation of words to their possible meanings.

Scholars of the principles of jurisprudence delineate four perspectives from which to approach the connection of words to their possible meanings:

1. The linguistic perspective of words, determining whether the word denotes one meaning or more, and, if it denotes more than one meaning, whether all of these meanings unite in a single general meaning or diverge in numerous ones.

2. The perspective of the usage of words, to determine the specific denotation and find out whether it is literal or metaphorical, whether the word is transposed from its original denotation or bears another connotation, and related issues.

3. The perspective of the “strength” of the word in denoting the meaning and the degree of clarity, categorized as apparent (ẓāhir), hidden (khafī), problematic (mushkil), general (mujmal), obscure (mutashābih), and so forth.

4. The qualitative perspective in the denotation of a text, that is, whether the phrasing yields the meaning directly, allusively, or definitively.19

LEGAL JUDGMENTS DERIVABLE FROM THE QURANIC TEXT

In the terminology of the scholars of the principles of jurisprudence, legal judgments are of two kinds:
1. Judgments involving an obligation (ḥukm taklīfī), in which the Divine Address concerns the acts of the obligated person, by declaring an act to be obligatory (wājib), prohibited (ḥarām), or permitted (mubāḥ).

2. Positive judgments (ḥukm waḍ‘ī), in which the object of Divine Address is to posit one thing as either a cause, condition, or hindrance for another, such as kinship (qarābah) as a cause for inheritance (4:11), the sighting of the new moon of Ramadan as a cause for the obligation to fast (2:185), ability (istiṣā‘ah) as a condition for the obligation to make the pilgrimage to Makkah (3:97), ablution (wuḍū’) as a condition for the performance of prayer (5:6), and so on. One may also mention murder as a hindrance keeping a murderer from inheriting from the victim because of the authentic ḥadīth: “A murderer does not inherit from [his victim].”

Thus the difference between a ruling involving an obligation (ḥukm taklīfī) and a positive judgment (ḥukm waḍ‘ī) is that the first involves an obligation one must either fulfill or fail to fulfill—or it involves a choice between acting and refraining from action—whereas the second involves no obligation, but is a legal declaration connecting two acts by means of a relationship that could be either causal, conditional, or of reciprocal hindrance concerning the obligated person’s acts in one way or another. However, both rules belong to the Sacred Law (Sharī‘ah); or, they could be specifications of the different kinds of Sharī‘ah rulings, which the scholars of the principles of jurisprudence define by the maxim: “God’s Address that concerns the actions of the obligated person involves a definite requirement (iqtidā’), a choice (takhyīr), or a positive law (waḍ‘).”

Types of Rulings About Obligations

Rulings containing obligations have the sense of a definitive requirement to act or desist or the sense of a choice. In both cases the requirement can be either binding or not binding. On this basis rulings containing obligations tend to take various forms.
The obligatory (al-wājib) is what the Lawgiver commands as absolutely binding, such as the rites ordained for Islam, for example, prayer, fasting, pilgrimage, and the recitation of the Quran, as well as the essential virtues and the rules of morality. The performance of such obligations is rewarded, and their omission is punished by God.

RECOMMENDED RULINGS
The recommended (al-mandūb) is what is prescribed, but not compulsory; whoever omits it may not be censured. An example is committing a debt to writing, for even though there is a specific command to write down a debt (2:282), it comes with an indication that no obligation is attached to it, since God says in the next verse: And if one of you trusts the other, let him who is trusted deliver his trust (according to the pact between them; 2:283). This means that a debtor may trust the recipient of the debt, the gist of the meaning being that writing down the debt is not required.

Scholars of the principles of jurisprudence divide recommended acts into three categories:

1. Acts that the Prophet practiced without fail, such as praying two cycles of prayer before the dawn prayer. These are called regular practices, or “wonts” (sunan, sing. sunnah), because it was the Prophet himself who established their practice. The ruling concerning such acts is that whoever practices them shall be rewarded, while those who omit them are not punished, even if they may be blamed or rebuked for neglect or for disregarding the wont of the Prophet.

2. Supererogatory acts (nawāfil) that the Prophet performed, but not regularly. Whoever performs such acts is rewarded, but to neglect them occasions neither blame nor censure.

3. Acts that the Prophet performed as matter of custom or convention, by virtue of his being, as an individual, a member of a particular society with its own customs and conventions. The Prophet never commanded anyone to perform such acts as part of obedience to the Sacred Law. Scholars give as examples of such recommended acts dress, wearing white clothes, the conventions of food, drink, sleep, manner of sitting, growing a beard, shortening the mustache, and so on.
The majority of the scholars of the principles of jurisprudence are in agreement that the terms “recommended” (mandūb), “preferred” (mustahabb), “voluntary” (taṣawwur), “Prophetic wont” (sunnah), and “supererogatory” (nafl) are essentially synonymous and revolve around the notion that a requirement is nonobligatory or nonbinding. The majority of scholars therefore consider recommended acts not legally required to begin with, so even if individuals begin performing them, they are still under no obligation to continue to do so without fail.

PROHIBITED RULINGS

A prohibited act (al-barām) is one that the Lawgiver has imperatively required must not be committed. There are, on the one hand, terms of prohibition that may only be understood as such if there is no indication (dalīl) negating the meaning of prohibition, and there are, on the other, terms concerning which the requirement to desist is categorical. Quran and Sunnah indications providing for rulings involving prohibition are many. Consider, for example, the following: He has forbidden you only carrion, blood, the flesh of swine, and what has been offered to other than God. But whosoever is compelled by necessity—neither coveting nor transgressing—no sin shall be upon him (2:173); Hunted game being unlawful when you are in pilgrim sanctity (5:1); Forbidden unto you [as wives] are your mothers, your daughters, your sisters (4:23); Slay not your children for fear of poverty (17:31); O you who believe! Wine, and gambling, and idols, and divining arrows are but a means of defilement of Satan’s doing. So avoid it, that haply you may prosper (5:90); and, “Whatever belongs to a Muslim is not lawful to take, unless his soul is glad to give it away.” Obligated persons who fail to desist from a prohibited act shall incur punishment in the Afterlife, and those who deny a prohibition that the Sharī‘ah establishes by means of an unequivocal indication become thereby apostate, as they will then be giving the lie to the Quran or to the Prophet.

ABHORRED RULINGS

Abhorred (al-makrūh) acts are those that the Lawgiver has prohibited in an ambiguous manner; they should not be done; yet there is no explicit command making noncommission obligatory. Scholars say that these are any acts the omission of which is better than their commission. Abhorred acts are usually related to the kinds of behavior that are below the level of virtue and dignity that Muslims should strive to embody.

PERMITTED RULINGS
The permitted (al-mubāḥ) act is the kind that may be equally committed or omitted; the Sharīʿah’s legal discourse about it is that it is one of choice, not of obligation, such as the saying of God: This day, all good things are made lawful unto you. The food of those who have been given the Book is lawful unto you, and your food is lawful unto them (5:5); or, There is no fault against the blind, nor fault against the lame, nor fault against the sick (24:61). Permission does not require a textual indication of obligation or prohibition.23

Philosophy of Commands and Prohibitions in Islamic Law

Inquiry into the rulings that involve Sharīʿahite obligations stands in need of another inquiry into the nature of commands and prohibitions as such. These two inquiries are as closely linked as terms are to their meanings or sentences to their import. If commands and prohibitions both express imperative requirements, it is logical that jurists should inquire into their nature. The vast treasury of accumulated juristic principles is replete with rich and subtle inquiries in this field, which are beyond the scope of this essay. We shall content ourselves here with reference to only the most important inquiries representative of the general direction of the juristic schools in the majority of cases.

The first matter to which attention is given in this study is the actual linguistic formulation obligations take in the Quran in order to be considered as constituting definite legal obligations. From extensive investigations into the command statements of the Quran, scholars of the principles of jurisprudence conclude that commands are communicated by more than one linguistic form. Foremost among these are imperative verbs, such as God’s saying: Complete the ḥaṭṭāj and ‘umrah for God (2:196); Let him among you who is present, fast during that [month]. And whosoever is ill or on a journey, it is a number of other days (2:185); and Give the women their bridewealth as a free gift (4:4). Or an imperative may come in other linguistic forms; it will suffice here to mention predicative clauses that are not standard predicates, but go beyond predication to indicate a definite requirement, such as: And let mothers nurse their children two full years, for such as desire to complete the suckling (2:233). The verb nurse, even if it is in the present tense grammatically, is meant to indicate a predicative clause, yet the context shifts it from indicating a predication into indicating a command, as much as would the imperative verb itself. Quranic discourse in such sentences is therefore not meant to “predicate” about mothers who are nursing their infants, but to “obligate” categorically that mothers must suckle their infants, for a certain period—and other legal rulings become incumbent as a consequence of this, such as the prohibition of marriage between suckle-siblings. The same principle holds for God’s saying: Divorced women shall wait by themselves for three courses (2:228). The verb is indicative, not imperative, but what is intended is not to describe an event that will happen in the future (divorced women waiting for a time before they can remarry), but to command that the waiting period (ʿiddah) for all divorced women be for a duration of three months.

Another matter concerning scholars of the principles of jurisprudence on the subject of commands is the inquiry into what a command indicates and whether a given formula signifies a command or requirement to act whenever it appears in the Quran or the Sunnah. The meaning of a command statement is not limited to indicating obligation, but can also indicate other meanings far removed from this, even in cases where the scholars of the principles of jurisprudence affirm that the first meaning to occur to the mind is one of obligation. By means of inquiries and rational inference (istiqrāʿ) into the command statements of the Quran and the Sunnah, it has been well proven that they may indicate recommendation (nadab) as much as obligation (wujūb). They may even convey permission (ibābah): But when you have left pilgrim sanctity, then hunt for game (if you will; 5:2); or the teaching of etiquette, such as the saying of the Prophet to a young boy: “Pronounce the Name of God, eat with your right hand, and eat from the portion that is closest to you.”

Command may also communicate the sense of human beings’ indebtedness to God: O mankind! Eat of what is lawful and good on the earth (2:168); it may have the sense of a threat: Do what you will; truly He sees whatsoever you do (41:40); or it may reflect the sense of the inimitability of the Word of God: Then bring a surah like it (2:23); and other meanings are possible as well.

Scholars of the principles of jurisprudence have enumerated some twenty-five different senses indicated by command statements apart from the sense of obligation. They thus concluded from the earliest period in the development of the discipline that the command statements in both the Quran and the Sunnah are not all categorical and inevitable requirements belonging to the category of command in the strict sense. This understanding was responsible for the differences among the scholars regarding the nature of the command statements that may indicate legal rulings. Do they indicate obligation in the first place and, as such, may not be taken in any other sense unless additional textual evidence (shawāhid) exists indicating otherwise? Or may they indicate a recommendation in the first place that may later be disregarded due to other supportive evidence (qarāʾin) in favor of obligation? A majority of scholars in fact espoused the first school of thought (madhhab), but a sizable number also followed the second.

In any case, what matters in this connection is to clarify that the philosophy of restriction (taqyīd) as it is used to determine the concept, phrasing, and meaning of “command” helps to narrow greatly the sphere of “obligations” in the practical and social life of Muslims, for it grants them the freedom to move in a much larger sphere of possibilities and permissible actions. This outlook in fact reveals the internal harmony between the Quran and the cosmos, showing them to be two faces of the same reality: the Quran is an audible cosmos (kawn masmūʿ) to be heard, and the cosmos is a visible Quran (Qurʾān marʿī) to be contemplated. The two complement and correspond to each other. This outlook also demonstrates that an excessive number of prescriptions and obligations actually detracts from the principle of intellectual contemplation, which the Quran advocates for the discovery of truth and the knowledge of beings as they truly are. This knowledge is the Divine Wisdom (ḥikmah) that is mentioned in the Quran and praised along with those who possess it in passages such as: He grants wisdom to whomsoever He will. And whosoever is granted wisdom has been granted much good (2:269).

In the Quran, many verses teach that God does not impose upon human beings a burden of commands greater than what they can fulfill, greater than what their souls, time, and abilities can accommodate. He does not burden them with anything too heavy to bear or something that they could not help but discontinue or abandon after a while. The Prophetic wisdom emphasizes that few works constantly observed are by far better than many works eventually abandoned. Indeed, there is an explicit prohibition against excessive zeal in religious works and pedantic focus on external observances as such. The Prophet invoked perdition upon such extreme pedants (al-mutanaṭṭiʿūn), saying: “Perdition shall befall extreme pedants,” and repeating the phrase three times.²⁶

It is reported that once when one of his Companions complained about the prayer leader’s inordinately prolonging the prayer session, the Prophet said: “O Muḥādh, do not drive people into a state of tribulation (fitnah), for in the congregation praying behind you there are the old, the weak, ones with pressing errands, and the travelers.” The Prophet himself used to shorten his prayer whenever he heard a child crying, saying: “Oftentimes I enter into prayer intending to prolong it, but when I hear a child crying, I relinquish my intention, knowing how his mother must be distressed for his crying.” The ease of the prescriptions in Islam is such that performing the bare minimum of obligatory ones is sufficient to achieve happiness in this world and the next. Concerning whoever keeps the fundamental obligatory prescriptions alone, without adding or omitting anything, the Prophet says, “He shall attain to salvation, if he is sincere.” Needless to say, the philosophy of commands in Islamic Law, as presented here, is in total contradiction to the attempts at “schematization” (tanmīṭ) propagated by some strident groups in the public arena today who besiege the lives of Muslims and represent a perversion of the proper understanding of Islam and an adulteration of its laws and rulings.

Most of what was said about commands, their formulations, and significance may also be said of prohibitions. The majority of the scholars of the principles of jurisprudence are of the opinion that the least interdiction should indicate prohibition on the basis of such Quranic passages as: Whatsoever the Messenger gives you, take it; and whatsoever he forbids to you, forgo (59:7). Yet others hold the view that mere interdiction does not imply prohibition, but only abhorrence or scrupulousness, which may correspond to prohibition, but may not indicate it unless an additional piece of evidence (ḍamīmah) indicates that intention. According to a third view, an interdiction remains “deferred” (mawqūf), without indicating either prohibition or abhorrence.

On the grounds of this pluralistic interpretation of the concept of prohibition, jurists state that an interdiction may occur in the sense of prohibition, such as in: And approach not adultery (17:32); And slay not the soul that God has made inviolable, save by right (17:33); And approach not the orphan’s property, save in the most virtuous manner, till he reaches maturity (17:34); and Walk not exultantly upon the earth; surely thou shalt not penetrate the earth, nor reach the mountains in height (17:37). Or it may occur in the sense of abhorrence: And seek not the bad, spending of it though you would not take it except shutting your eyes to it (2:267). It may also occur in the sense of guidance (irshād): O you who believe! Ask not about things that, if they were disclosed to you, would trouble you (5:101); or of indicating the fruits of action: Do not suppose that God is heedless of the deeds of the wrongdoers (14:42). The hallmark of the study of interdiction is to lessen the number of prohibitions in Islam, because the formulas of the Sharī‘ah, despite their small number, do not spontaneously indicate prohibition. To return to the general rule of legislation: permission (ibāḥah) is the original state of things, and no prohibition may be pronounced without explicit evidence. Prohibited matters in Islam are therefore necessarily restricted to a small number of things.

This is the position supported by the text of the Quran. For instance, we find verses limiting the number of prohibited foods to just three categories: Say, “I do not find in that which is revealed unto me anything forbidden to one who would eat thereof, save carrion or blood poured forth, or the flesh of swine—for that is surely defilement—or a sinful offering made to other than God. But whosoever is compelled by necessity, without willfully disobeying or transgressing, truly thy Lord is Forgiving, Merciful (6:145). This text explicitly confirms that in Islam prohibited foods are limited to just three types and that this prohibition itself is lifted in cases of necessity and extreme need—that is, that even the prohibited can become permitted—and not to avail oneself of such permissions in cases of necessity, but choose instead self-destruction, is to sin. Similarly, the Prophetic traditions (aḥādīth) indicate that grave sins (kabāʾir) are limited to only seven in number: “Avoid the seven mortal sins (mubīqāt) . . .”, and that the absolute requirements for salvation may be summarized in just a few conditions: “There is no servant who performs the five canonical prayers, who fasts the month of Ramadan, who gives alms when they are due, who avoids the seven mortal sins, but who shall have the gates of Paradise open to him and it shall be said unto him: enter therein in peace.”

Just as a misunderstanding of the philosophy of “commands” in Islamic Law forms a pernicious ground for the bickering of extremist groups, whose portrayal of it is both deceitful and fraudulent, so an ignorance of the philosophy of “prohibitions” in Islam has played a grievous role for some in transforming Islam into a catalogue of interdictions and prohibitions, banning for people what God has permitted. Had the advocates of such maimed views availed themselves of the speculative legacy bequeathed by the scholars of the principles of jurisprudence on the topics of commands and prohibitions, they would have realized how alien in form and substance is the Islam such people preach to the Quran, the Sunnah, and the overwhelming consensus of Muslims.

The Quran and the Other Sources of Islamic Law

In both Sunni and Shiite schools, the Quran occupies the most prominent position among the sources of law in Islam. The juristic tradition dealing with the principles of law describes it as the first source of law, because it is the Word of God and also because of its unequivocally evident nature.\textsuperscript{32} Since the Quran includes numerous and varied rulings, one might imagine the Divine Book to be a self-sufficient source of legislation. However, in most cases the Quran tends to provide general rather than specific rules. In many instances, it limits itself to “allusion to the general objectives of legislation and its universal principles, not offering extensive detail in rules except in a few instances.”\textsuperscript{33} Moreover, despite its simplicity and clarity, a grasp of the objectives and ends of the Quran requires meditation and insight as well as training in Arabic stylistics and the subtle ways of indicating meaning in that language. It must also be borne in mind that the Quran itself makes a distinction between unequivocal (\textit{muḥkam}) and equivocal (\textit{mutashābih}) verses, saying that the interpretation of the latter can only be carried out by the exceptionally erudite among the learned: \textit{And none know its interpretation save God and those firmly rooted in knowledge} (3:7).

There therefore had to be another source to function as an explanatory, illustrative, interpretive, and exegetical complement to the Divine Discourse, particularly insofar as human actions and conduct are concerned. If the explicated and interpreted text is purely Divine, it makes sense that the explanatory and interpreting text should be worthy of it, that is, of equally Divine Provenance; this is what is guaranteed by the \textit{Sunnah}, which, again according to both Sunni and Shiite schools, constitutes a second source of legislation after the Noble Quran. \textit{Sunnah} ("wont") designates the sayings and actions of the Messenger of God, whereas \textit{Hadīth} ("tradition") specifically designates his sayings.\textsuperscript{34}

Understanding the Quran needs the \textit{Sunnah} to provide clarifications and specific illustrations of the former’s general declarations. As an example of this principle, consider the canonical prayer. The command making it obligatory comes as a general declaration in the Quran, but if we restrict ourselves to knowledge of the prayer derived from the Quran alone, we would be unable to know the details of its substance, forms, times, the number of its cycles (\textit{rakaʻāt}), and so on. All of these matters can be known only from the \textit{Sunnah}. The same holds true for many other obligations, such as almsgiving (\textit{zakāh}), fasting (\textit{ṣawm}), and pilgrimage (\textit{ḥajj}). Indeed, there are certain commands and prohibitions in the Quran that can be neither understood nor acted upon in the absence of the \textit{Sunnah}.

The jurist and authority on the principles of the Law Ibn ḥazm al-ẓāhirī (d. 456/1064) summarized this point by asking:

In which Quran shall I find that the noon prayer is four cycles or that the sunset prayer is three cycles; the clarification of what counts as true fasting; the clarification of the manner of giving alms from gold, silver, sheep, camels, or cattle; . . . the categories of prohibited marriages, of prohibited child nursing (al-radāʾ al-muḥarram), and which foods are prohibited; the rulings regarding punishments; in what way a divorce becomes final; rulings concerning valid business transactions and the clarification of the ways of usury? Indeed, there are passages concerning these matters in the Quran, but if they were left to us without the commentaries from the Sunnah, we would never know how to apply them. Thus one has to refer these matters back to the traditions of the Prophet.35

The Quran itself mentions in many places the importance of the Sunnah and its necessity for elaborating the meaning of the Quran: Whatsoever the Messenger gives you, take it; and whatsoever he forbids to you, forgo (59:7); We have sent down the Reminder unto thee that thou mightest clarify for mankind that which has been sent down unto them, that haply they may reflect (16:44); He it is Who sent among the unlettered a Messenger from among themselves, reciting unto them His signs, purifying them, and teaching them the Book and Wisdom, though before they were in manifest error (62:2). And the Prophet himself emphasizes this truth when he says:

I was given the Quran and with it its similitude; soon a day will come when a man of full stomach reclining on his couch shall say: “Go to the Quran; whatever you find permitted therein, consider it as permitted, whatever you find prohibited therein, then prohibit it”; yet that which the Messenger of God has prohibited is equal to that which God has prohibited; indeed, the meat of the domestic ass as meat is prohibited unto you; and so is the meat of every wild beast with molars.36

rulings in it, explaining and clarifying texts of general meaning in specific terms, clarifying problematic texts that bear more than one meaning, or giving a particular emphasis for a ruling that occurs only generally. All of these aspects serve to demonstrate the necessity of the Sunnah for reaching a proper understanding of the rulings of the Sacred Law. The Sunnah is indeed as binding as the Quran and is thus second only to it as a source of legislation. Although Sunni and Shiite scholars alike unanimously maintain that the Quran and the Sunnah are the two fundamental sources of legislation, there is no agreement with regard to the remaining sources, though these are most commonly recognized as including analogy (qiyās), consensus (ijmāʿ), juristic preference (istiḥsān), benefits in the public interest (maṣāliḥ mursalah), and injunctions presuming continuity with a status quo ante (istisbāb).37

Conclusion

In summary, Islamic Law is rooted directly in the Quran as its foundational source, and the definitive authoritativeness of the Quranic text for Islamic Law is permanently binding and effective for all times and places. The Law established in the Quran and elaborated by the Islamic legal tradition therefore possesses an inherent immutability and timeless quality, but it is nonetheless simultaneously characterized by a unique flexibility, an ability to take into account and adapt to diverse contingencies or changing conditions. As a sacred text of the highest order with a long and profound interpretive tradition, it can only be properly understood by reading it as the revealed Word of God and making use of the invaluable tools, methods, and insights bequeathed by the tradition.

Islamic Law is founded on four fundamental principles: a lack of constriction or difficulty in its implications for believers; a relatively small number of formal obligations, all restrictions being in fact exceptions to the rule, as “the norm in all things is permissibility”; a multiplicity and variety of form on the part of Quranic legal passages according to the nature of the matter at hand; and a wise and effective gradualism in the implementation of its laws. In the words of Muslim scholars, the Quran is of “unequivocal immutability” and “equivocal meanings,” meaning that its literal text is indubitably authentic and permanently established, possessing an unbroken line of transmission, whereas the meanings comprised by the text are bountifully multiple, and rational inference, the suspension of judgment, and recourse to regular, Divinely guided “revivifications” of the meanings of the Sacred Book are key elements in Islamic legal philosophy.

Islamic Law possesses a rich tradition of systematic studies on the ways in which legal judgments are contained in the Quranic text and may be derived from it as well as studies on the nature, meanings, and formulations of commands and prohibitions as such. On the basis of such studies, all actions subject to legislation are seen to fall into one of five categories—obligatory, recommended, permitted, abhorred, or prohibited. Given the general and often polyvalent nature of Quranic legal passages, Islamic Law requires a second source to explain, clarify, and embody the rulings found in principal form in the Divine Text. On the testament of the Quran itself as well as the Ḥadīth, and as agreed upon fully by all schools of Islamic Law, this is providentially and superlatively provided by the Sunnah, or wont, of the Prophet Muhammad.

Translated by Maryam Ishaq al-Khalifa Sharief
As the objective crystallization of Divine Revelation for all Muslims and as Islamic sacred scripture, the Noble Quran has naturally exercised great influence upon Islamic theology (kalām) and philosophy. It is true that in Islam the intellect (ʿaql) plays a central role as the means of acquiring knowledge, but Muslim theologians and philosophers, like all Muslims, look upon the Quran as a most important reality and rely on it in their debates with contending schools of thought. In theological and philosophical disputation, therefore, full attention is paid to Quranic teachings.

In the context of Islam the Quran is the Revelation that has made access to the content of God’s message possible, but for theologians and sometimes philosophers the Quran has been also significant from another perspective. As the crystallization of the Word of God, it is directly connected to discussions about Divine Attributes. Furthermore, the Quran is recognized as the greatest miracle associated with the Prophet of Islam. These truths alone provide the foundation for the historical theological discussions about whether the Quran is uncreated or created and debates about the miracles of the Quran (iʿjāz al-Qurʾān).

The Quran as the Word of God

From the beginning of Islamic theology, kalām, and parallel with constraining discussions about the eternity of Divine Qualities, the problem of the eternity versus the created nature of the Quran came to be debated by a group considered the founders of kalām. In the Quran are verses that mention its prior existence in the Preserved Tablet (al-lawḥ al-mahfūẓ; 85:22), as the Mother of the Book (ʿumm al-kitāb; 43:4), and as a Book that was concealed (maknūn; 56:77–78).
Still, there is uncertainty about how and whether the discussion of the eternity of the Quran took place in the first Islamic century or later. The most important indication is a story about Ibn ʿAbbās, a Companion of the Prophet who died in 68/687, in which there is a kind of reference to the uncreated nature of the Quran.¹

During the first decades of the second Islamic century, some began to place emphasis on the createdness of the Quran during the process of the first formulation of kalām by such figures as Jaʿd ibn Dirham (d. 126/743–44) and Jahm ibn Ṣafwān (d. 129/746–47). Yet one cannot point to anyone who defended the eternity of the Quran at the end of the first and the first half of the second century amid the debate about its createdness. In any case there are indications that the views of the createdness of the Quran, on the one hand, and its eternity, on the other, did not only take shape during this period, but also prepared the way for intermediate positions. A saying transmitted from Imam Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq (d. 148/765) points to an intermediate position holding that the Quran is created (muhdath) and at the same time uncreated.² This view relies on the description of the Quran as muhdath and seeks to show that it is at the same time eternal, for it does not consider every being that is muhdath to also be created (makhlūq).

During the second half of the second century AH debates about the createdness of the Quran intensified, and the Muʿtazilite movement came to be identified as the defenders of the view of the createdness of the Sacred Text. During the caliphate of the Abbasid al-Maʾmūn (198–218/813–33) and as a result of the efforts of his vizier Aḥmad ibn Abī Dāʾūd, who had Muʿtazilite tendencies, the view that the Quran was created gained political support and even significance. In a letter to the governor of Baghdad, Caliph al-Maʾmūn openly declared that those who believed in the uncreatedness of the Quran were like Christians who considered Jesus the son of Mary to be uncreated, since he was seen as the Word of God.³ Following the assertion of this position and through the efforts of Aḥmad ibn Abī Dāʾūd, the event known as al-miḥnah (“the calamity”) took place, in which courts of inquiry were convened to investigate the views of the scholars of Baghdad about this matter, and those who did not adhere to the doctrine were persecuted.

It was during al-miḥnah that the Hadīth scholar Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (d. 241/855), who despite great pressure refused to accept the idea of the createdness of the Quran, came to be known as a hero and a model for later defenders of the uncreatedness of the Sacred Book. In the writings of Ibn
Ḥanbal, for example, in his letter to Musaddid ibn Masrahad, followers of Ḥadīth were presented as leaders in the defense of the uncreatedness of the Quran, and the Jahmites and Muʿtazilites were introduced as leaders of the opposite camp, those who believed in its createdness.⁴

Historical evidence reveals that, in spite of what has been reflected in later sources of the followers of Ḥadīth, or “People of Ḥadīth” (aḥāb al-ḥadīth), there was no unified view concerning the uncreatedness of the Quran even among the “People of Ḥadīth.” In the face of the strong theological discussions in favor of the createdness of the Quran, some of the “People of Ḥadīth” could not find firmly established documents against this view and on this issue sided with the Muʿtazilites and Jahmites. Among such figures one must mention the celebrated ʿAlī ibn al-Madinī (d. 234/848–49). In contrast to Ibn Ḥanbal, al-Madinī not only confirmed the createdness of the Quran,⁵ but also held other beliefs, such as determinism (qadar), that were close to the Muʿtazilite position.⁶

The juxtaposition of the ideas of Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal and ʿAlī ibn al-Madinī began a process that, during the century after the affair of the miḥnah, determined the lines of development of the beliefs held by different theological factions in Sunni circles. Ibn Ḥanbal’s view did of course have followers for many centuries after him. As late as the eighth/fourteenth century, Muḥammad Ḫusayn al-Dhahabī (d. 748/1348) rose to defend the position of Ibn Ḥanbal and the “People of Ḥadīth” against those who believed in the createdness of the Quran; without taking more moderate positions into consideration, he completely rejected the belief that the Quran was created.⁷

Some circles in the Sunni world, however, followed another path. Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh ibn Kallāb (d. after 240/854–55), one of the first Sunni theologians (mutakallimūn), put forth his own intellectual position on the problem of the eternity of the Quran, a position that did not take as its starting point the Quran as it was revealed in the Arabic language. He adopted an intermediate position holding that the Word of God is eternal in its essence; it is not composed of letters and sounds, does not have divisions, parts, and particulars, and does not change. Letters are the written forms of the Word of God and are for that reason subject to change. The Word of God is called the Quran when its form—that is, its written language, interpretation, and recitation—is Arabic, in the same way that it is called the Torah when its form is Hebrew.⁸

In this context one must also mention another Sunni theologian, Ḫusayn al-
Karābīsī (d. after 248/862–63), who, in turning the views of the scholars of Ḥadīth (muḥaddithūn) into a theological discussion, introduced the distinction between inner kalām (Word) and literal kalām.⁹

In the middle of the third/ninth century a tendency toward moderation appeared on both sides of this debate. On the side of the “People of Ḥadīth,” Muḥammad ibn Iṣmāʿīl al-Bukhārī (d. 256/870), the author of al-Ṣaḥīḥ and one of the greatest scholars of Ḥadīth, adopted an intermediate position. He believed that the uncreatedness of the Quran cannot be extended to the human reading of it. He developed the idea of literal kalām further and believed that the human language of the Quran is created. Because of his beliefs, discussed in detail and with great care in his Kitāb khalq afʿāl al-ʿibād waʾl-radd ʿalaʾl-jahmiyyah (The Book of the Createdness of the Actions of God’s Bondsmen and Refutation of the Jahmites), al-Bukhārī was severely criticized in his own lifetime by extremists among the “People of Ḥadīth,” such as Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyā al-Dhahalī (d. 258/872).¹⁰

Similar moderation can also be seen among theologians who held views similar to those of the Muʿtazilites. Muḥammad ibn Shujāʿ ibn al-Thaljī (d. 266/879), who was a Ḥanbalite theologian of the “People of Justice” (ahl al-ʿadl), asserted, in contrast to other members of his school, that to talk about the createdness or uncreatedness of the Quran is itself an innovation (bidʿah), and one must remain silent about it.¹¹ In the years leading up to the turn of the fourth/tenth century, Abuʾl-Ḥasan al-Ashʿarī (d. 334/946), the founder of the Ashʿarite school, reexamined the theory of literal (lafẓī) kalām and inner (nafsī) kalām and integrated this discussion into his theological system.

From the beginning of the fourth/tenth century on, as various theological positions became more distinct, the views concerning the createdness of the Quran coalesced into a few distinct positions. These positions consisted of complete denial of the createdness of the Quran by those who claimed to follow the traditions of the “ancestors” (salaf) and extremists among the “People of Ḥadīth,” insistence upon the createdness of the Quran on the part of the Muʿtazilite thinkers, and the proposal of literal kalām by the Ashʿarites. The view of Twelve-Imam Shiites from the fourth/tenth century on favors the createdness of the Quran despite differences of opinion on this matter during the period of the lives of the first eleven Imams.¹²
The belief that the Noble Quran contains an aspect or aspects that are miraculous can be seen in Quranic verses themselves, primarily in the āyāt al-taḥaddī (“verses of challenge,” e.g., 52:33–34). Theological discussion of the miraculous aspect of the Quran began in the middle of the second/eighth century with the famous Muʿtazilite Ibrāhīm Naẓẓām (d. 230/845). He proposed a view that came to be known as the theory of ṣarfah (“redundancy”). He believed that the miraculous aspect of the Quran is not to be found in its eloquence or structure. Rather, the miracle resides in the fact that whenever enemies try to compose words like it, God’s Will that they do so is removed from them; they thereby turn away from it and of necessity fail to achieve their original goal.13

After Naẓẓām the theory of ṣarfah had only a few followers among the Muʿtazilites. Outside of the circle of Muʿtazilites a number of figures such as Shiite authorities Shaykh al-Mufīd (d. 413/1022) and Sayyid al-Murtadā (d. 436/1044) supported this view of the miraculous nature of the Quran, but with some further elucidation and expansion.14 Among Sunni scholars, a number of figures also defended this view to some extent, including Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210).15

Another issue pursued by Islamic theologians in relation to the miracle of the Quran is the claim that it provides news of the invisible world, lifting the veil from hidden and unknown events of the past. No theologians oppose this view, although the more limited claim that news of the invisible world is the main factor constituting the reality of the miraculous nature of the Quran has only a few distinct supporters, among them the Sunni scholar Abū Suleyāmān al-Khaṭṭābī (d. 258/872).16

Another miraculous aspect of the Quran, possibly the most important one among theologians and one that was supported especially by some Muʿtazilites, is its order and harmony. Among the first figures to discuss this issue is the celebrated Muʿtazilite theologian and man of letters ʿAmr ibn Bahr al-Jāḥīz (d. 254/868), who devoted a book entitled Naẓm al-Qurʾān (The Order and Harmony of the Quran), a work that is now lost, to the explanation of this thesis.17 According to al-Jāḥīz, the Quran itself is miraculous speech the like of which no human beings can produce. This has nothing to do with the theory of ṣarfah (redundancy). In the theory of al-Jāḥīz and others who have followed his view, what has prevented enemies from producing the like of the Quran is a special characteristic of the Quran itself. That special characteristic resides in the particular order and harmony that can be found in the words of the Divine Text. Al-Jāḥiẓ believed there was an essential difference between the order and composition of the Quran and those of works composed by human beings. They are two basically different types of composition. Among other early Muʿtazilites who supported and wrote about the order and harmony of the Quran are Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad ibn ʿUmar al-Bāhilī (d. 300/913); Abū ʿAlī Muḥammad ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-Jubbāʾī (d. 303/915), of the school of Basra; and Muḥammad Zayd al-Wāsīṭī (d. 306/918), of the school of Baghdad.

After al-Jāḥiẓ the thesis that the order and harmony constitute the miracle of the Quran attracted the attention of not only Muʿtazilites, but also that of scholars belonging to different parts of the spectrum of Islamic thought. Among later Muʿtazilites who defended this thesis are Abū Bakr ibn al-Akshīd (d. 326/938) and Abū ʿAlī Ḥasan ibn ʿAlī ibn Naṣr (d. 312/924), both of whom expanded al-Jāḥiẓ’s thesis and wrote independent works on it. The most important Ashʿarite figure to expand this theory was Qāḍī Abū Bakr al-Bāqillānī (d. 403/1013), who in Iʿjāz al-Qurʾān (The Miracle of the Quran) sought to expound extensively upon what al-Jāḥiẓ had mentioned in summary fashion and to treat delicate aspects of this subject. He believed that the Quran possesses the highest degree of order, harmony, fluency, and beauty, which are miraculous and beyond what human beings are capable of producing.

Furthermore, beyond the works of theologians, the exposition of this thesis can also be found in the writings of such men of letters as Abū Hilāl al-ʿAskarī (d. ca. 400/1010), especially his al-Ṣināʿatayn (The Two Arts), and ʿAbd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī (d. 417/1078), especially his Asrār al-balāghah (Mysteries of Eloquence) and al-Risālat al-shāfiyah fī iʿjāz al-Qurʾān (The Salutary Treatise of Healing on the Miracle of the Quran). The efforts of al-Jurjānī in this context were in themselves a foundation for the expansion of the linguistic science of eloquence. Al-Jurjānī’s tendency toward Ashʿarism has been made clear in various traditional sources.

Finally, one must recall that some theologians, such as ʿAlī ibn Ṣādī al-Rummānī (d. 384/994), the great Muʿtazilite scholar, were among those who sought to present the multiple factors that make the Quran miraculous. In a treatise entitled al-Nukat fī iʿjāz al-Qurʾān (Points Concerning the Miracle of the Quran) he expanded his composite view of this subject.
The Noble Quran as Source of Knowledge

Obviously Muslim scholars cannot discuss or provide answers to religious questions without making use of the Quran as the most basic transmitted source of Islam or recalling its message in the intellectual content of their theology. It is for this reason that all theological sources have made use of Quranic references to one degree or another, depending on the circumstances. But because the number and uses to be made of Quranic verses related to theological questions (in the sense of kalām) are limited, references to Quranic verses in theological and doctrinal sources, although basic, have been few in number. Even the “People of Ḥadīth” have made much greater use of the Prophetic tradition (aḥādīth) than Quranic verses. This is also true for a large number of the discussions by theologians more attracted to rational argumentation; they have been more concerned with aḥādīth because of the very nature of theological reasoning.

Basing arguments extensively upon Quranic verses occurs especially in debates between the “People of Ḥadīth” and theologians. In this case it appears that the extensive use of Quranic verses is due to the fact that the Quran is shared in common in a basic manner by theologians and scholars of Ḥadīth, and in fact all Muslims. An outstanding example of this kind of writing is al-Ḥaydah (Projection) by ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Kanānī (d. 240/854), which contains the debate between himself and Bishr al-Marīsī (d. 218/833), one of the theologians of the “People of Justice” (ahl al-ʿadl). This text is one of a small number of theological works filled with references to Quranic verses.

In the case of certain particular branches of theology, such as the one concerned with the imamate, debates carried out between Sunnis and Shiites again reveal great interest in Quranic verses. From the Shiites’ side, usually in defense of their position concerning the “Household of the Prophet” (ahl al-bayt), what was of special interest to the authors were the conditions surrounding the revelation (shāʾn al-nuzūl) of certain verses. In such cases obviously the citation of Quranic verses by Shiite scholars was accompanied by a collection of aḥādīth concerning the reason for the revelation of those verses, aḥādīth that were usually drawn from Sunni sources so that they would be accepted by the Sunnis who held opposing views. This procedure produced many works with the title Mā nazala min al-Qurʾān fī ahl al-bayt (What Has Been Revealed Within the Quran Concerning the Household of the Prophet). Furthermore, one can see the same situation in certain other works of a theological nature, such as al-Shāfī (The Salutary) of Sayyid al-Murtaḍā.

In addition, references to the Quran can also be found in Quranic commentaries written from a theological or philosophical point of view. Works of this kind with a theological perspective are as old as texts on the science of theology itself, but philosophical commentaries appeared later and are also few in number. One of the first among those theologians seeking to write a Quranic commentary was ḡasan al-Baṣrī (d. 110/728). Al-Baṣrī was an influential teacher whose students included Wāṣil ibn ʿAṭāʾ (d. 130/748) and ʿAmr ibn ʿUbayd al-Baṣrī (d. 144/761), two scholars who would go on to become the founders of the Muʿtazilite school. ḡasan al-Baṣrī was in fact the author of a book of Quranic commentary.25

Quranic Commentaries Among the Muʿtazilites

The first Muʿtazilite Quranic commentary was that of ʿAmr ibn ʿUbayd al-Baṣrī, one of two founders of the Muʿtazilite school. Apparently this work was voluminous. At present there is no known manuscript of the book, but citations from it can be found in other commentaries. Parallel with the spread of the Muʿtazilite school was an increase in the number of Quranic commentaries. Toward the end of the second/eighth century, ʿAmr ibn Fāʾid al-Aswārī (d. after 200/815–16), a Muʿtazilite theologian, composed a major commentary, manuscripts of which were still available in the fourth/tenth century.26 Also in the beginning of the third/ninth century Abū Bakr al-Aṣamm, a scholar who branched out from Muʿtazilism and had certain theses of his own, wrote a book of Quranic commentary.27

The years marking the transition from the third/ninth to the fourth/tenth century were witness to increased activity among Muʿtazilite theologians in the field of Quranic commentary. Among scholars of this period one must mention Abū ʿAlī Muḥammad ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-Jubbāʾī (d. 303/915), the great theologian of Basra who, according to the fourth/tenth-century al-Fihrist (The Catalogue) of Muḥammad ibn Ishāq ibn al-Nadīm, wrote a book of Quranic exegesis considered to be of much importance for centuries not only by the Muʿtazilites, but also by Imāmī Shiites. Many quotations from this commentary appear in the works of Abū Jaʿfar Muḥammad ibn al-Shahrāshūb (d. 588/1192) and Sayyid ibn al-Ṭāʾūs (d. 664/1266). Also of note during this period was Abu’l-Qāsim ʿAbd Allāh ibn Aḥmad al-Balkhī (d. 319/931), the great theologian of Baghdad, whose book Jāmiʿ ʿilm al-Qurʾān (Comprehensive Science of the Quran) or Tafsīr al-kabīr (The Grand Commentary) was welcomed more by Shiite scholars than the commentary of al-Jubbāṭī. This work was one of the main sources of al-Tibyān (The Declaration) of Muḥammad ibn Ḥasan al-Ṭūsī (d. 460/1067) and was also used during later centuries by such scholars as Ibn al-Shahrāshūb and Ibn al-Ṭāʾūs. In this context we must also mention the great Muʿtazilite commentator Abū Muslim Muḥammad ibn Baḥr al-Iṣfahānī (d. 322/933 – 34), whose major commentary in fourteen volumes, Jāmiʿ al-tawīl li-ḥukm al-nuzūl (Comprehensive Hermeneutics of the Decree of Revelation), was used by such outstanding Shiite figures as Sayyid al-Murtaḍā and al-Ṭūsī.

Also during the fourth/tenth century such Muʿtazilite figures as Abū Bakr Qaffāl al-Shāshī (d. 384/994–95) and ʿAlī ibn ʿĪsā al-Rummānī (d. 384/994) continued this tradition by writing commentaries. In his Jāmiʿ ʿakhkam al-Qurʾān (Synthesis of the Commands of the Quran), the Mālikī commentator Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Qurṭubī (d. 671/1272) quotes this latter commentator with reference to his name. Moreover, Qāḍī ʿAbd al-Jabbār al-Hamadānī (d. 415/1024), the famous Muʿtazilite scholar of Rayy, wrote such works as Mutashābih al-Qurʾān (Metaphorical Verses of the Quran) and Tanzīh al-Qurʾān ʿan al-maṭāʾin (The Purity of the Quran Beyond All Tarnish), in which he sought to respond to questions that had arisen concerning certain verses of the Quran. Moreover, he also composed a third work dealing with Quranic commentary in general.

During the fifth/eleventh century a new wave of Muʿtazilite commentaries began. One of the most significant is the commentary of Muḥammad ibn ʿAlī ibn Mihrzād al-Iṣfahānī (d. 459/1067), who was followed by Abu’l-Ḥasan ʿAlī ibn Ḥasan al-Ṣandalī al-Naysābūrī (d. 484/1091–92), one of the companions of Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Ṣaymarī (d. 315/927), who began a commentary and succeeded in finishing half of the Quran. Another important figure is Abū Yūsuf ʿAbd al-Salām ibn Muḥammad al-Qazwīnī (d. 488/1095), who was the leader of the Muʿtazilites of his day in Baghdad. He composed a voluminous commentary that, if not an exaggeration, has been said to comprise three hundred and according to some five hundred volumes. His commentary on al-
Fāṭihah (“The Opening”) alone was seven volumes. Aḥmad al-Samāʿānī (d. 534/1140), who had studied this commentary, mentions that among all commentaries none was longer or of greater value. Abū ʿAbd Allāh ibn al-Najjār (d. 643/1245), the Baghdādī historian, states that al-Qazwīnī’s principal expertise was in fact the field of Quranic commentary.

The last outstanding Quranic commentary by Muʿtazilite scholars is al-Kashshāf ʿan ḥaqāʾiq al-tanzīl (The Unveiler of the Truths of Revelation) by Maḥmūd ibn ʿUmar al-Zamakhsharī (d. 538/1144), who was considered by Abū ʿAbbās Shams al-Dīn ibn Khallakān (d. 681/1282) as the leader of the Muʿtazilites of his day. This book, which has been printed many times, is one of the most enduring commentaries not only among Muʿtazilite works, but in the field of Quranic commentary in general. Many summaries of this book and commentaries on it appeared during later centuries. Despite theological differences between many Sunnis and Muʿtazilites, al-Zamakhsharī’s commentary never lost its pertinence for Sunnis and was also constantly studied by Shiite scholars. ʿAbd al-Karīm al-ʿIrāqī (d. 640/1242–43), who later joined the circle of the Muʿtazilites, wrote a response entitled al-Intiṣār liʾl-Zamakhsharī (The Revenge of al-Zamakhsharī) to refute the Muʿtazilite aspects of al-Kashshāf. This response is one of the last endeavors of Muʿtazilites to write Quranic commentaries.* The date of the decline of Muʿtazilite commentaries coincides in fact with the decline of Muʿtazilism itself.

Quranic Commentaries Among the Ashʿarites

The earliest Ashʿarites paid little direct attention to Quranic commentary. In some sources there is reference to a Quranic commentary entitled al-Mukhtazan (The Preserved) written by Abuʾl-ʿHasan al-Ashʿarī himself.* A century after him the celebrated Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (d. 505/1111), who was an Ashʿarite, showed special interest in this subject and composed several works, of which the most important is the well-known kalāmī commentary Jawāhir al-Qurʾān (Jewels of the Quran). The famous man of letters ʿAbd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī, who was also an Ashʿarite, in addition to writing on the miracle (iʿjāz) of the Quran, also wrote a commentary on it.* Considering the scholars of that period, one must also mention ʿAbd Allāh ibn Yūsuf al-Juwaynī (d. 438/1047), an Ashrā'ite of Khurasan, who wrote a large Quranic commentary. He was followed on this path by his son, Imam al-Haramayn ʿAbd al-Malik al-Juwaynī (d. 478/1085), who is one of the best-known Ashrā'ite theologians.

The peak of Ashrā'ite writings in the field of Quranic commentary occurred in the second half of the sixth/twelfth century, and the most outstanding figure of this epoch is Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210). In the Sunni world his Tafsīr al-kabīr (The Grand Commentary), consisting of many volumes, is considered the most outstanding kalāmī commentary. This work is among his last writings. As he wrote in the introduction, he sought to reinterpret Ashrā'ite kalām on the basis of the Quran and the direct understanding of its verses. To judge the extent to which he succeeded in the task of directly comprehending the meaning of Quranic verses while avoiding a priori kalāmī judgments is beyond the bounds of this brief presentation. In any case the distance between al-Rāzī’s kalāmī positions in his purely theological works and other Ashrā'ite writings and those in his commentary demonstrates that he had taken some strides on this path.

In the latter part of this century, Abū Ḥāmid ʿUthmān ibn ʿUmar al-Fīrūzābādī (d. 675/1276–77), an Ashrā'ite theologian from the province of Fars in Persia, wrote a work entitled Farāʾid al-tafsīr (Precious Gems of Exegesis) as a gloss upon the Kashshāf of al-Zamakhsharī. In this work al-Fīrūzābādī sought to respond to al-Zamakhsharī’s Muʿtazilite interpretations from the Ashrā'ite point of view.

This wave of Ashrā'ite scholarship continued into the eighth/fourteenth century among such figures as Sharaf al-Dīn Ḥasan ibn Muḥammad al-Ṭayyibī (d. 743/1342), who wrote the voluminous Tafsīr al-Qurʾān (Commentary on the Quran) and glosses upon the Kashshāf of al-Zamakhsharī, and Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad ibn Lubān al-Miṣrī (d. 749/1348–49), the author of Radd al-mutashābih ila’l-muḥkam (The Refutation of the Metaphorical by the Firm). A notable figure belonging to this current of thought is Saʿd al-Dīn al-Taftāzānī (d. 792/1390), who composed glosses upon the Kashshāf. This theologian also wrote another Quranic commentary, this time in Persian with the title of Kashf al-asrār (Unveiling of Secrets). Even after this period Ashrā'ite commentaries continued to appear. In connection with similar theological currents, one can mention Akmal al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Bābartī (d. 786/1384), a follower of the school of al-Māturīdī, who wrote glosses upon the Kashshāf as well as an independent Quranic commentary.
Among later scholars who continued the school of the “People of Ḥadīth” and the Salafī school (followers of the ancestors) in disputing kalāmī positions, some were themselves engaged in kalām. Among this group is first of all the Egyptian scholar Nāṣir al-Dīn Ḥāmid ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Manṣūr (d. 673/1274–75), who in addition to an independent Quranic commentary composed a work entitled al-Intīṣāf min al-Kashshāf (Taking Revenge from al-Kashshāf), which seeks to refute the Muʿtazilite views of al-Zamakhsharī in his Kashshāf. The most important Salafī scholar within this current of theological (kalāmī) studies and commentaries is, however, the famous scholar Ḥāmid ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728/1328), who took important steps in this field by writing a number of works on Quranic commentary and the “principles of commentary” (uṣūl al-tafsīr).

Quranic Commentaries Among Imámite Theologians

On the basis of Imámite (Twelve-Imám Shiite) bibliographical sources, it can be asserted that some of the earliest Imámite theologians were concerned with and wrote works of Quranic commentary. Among these works one can mention the commentary of Sawā ibn ʿAbdik al-Jurjānī (d. 360/971) and Abū Manṣūr al-Naysābūrī (d. 429/1038), who were near contemporaries of Abū Sahl Nawbakhtī (d. 311/923). Also from the first half of the fourth/tenth century one can mention Muḥammad ibn Baḥr al-Rahnī (d. ca. 330/941–42), who contributed to this current with his commentary entitled Kitāb al-burḥān al-sadīd min ʿawn al-madīd (The Book of Salutary Demonstration from the Extended Help).

With the formation of the Imámite school of theology in Baghdad, Quranic commentary became one of the major subjects of concern. Sayyid Sharīf al-Raḍī (d. 408/1018), who belonged to this school, wrote an extensive commentary in some ten volumes entitled Ḥaqāʾiq al-tanzīl (Truths of Revelation). The five volumes that survive from this work clearly reveal its kalāmī character. As for Shaykh al-Mufīd, the founder of the Imámite school of theology, we only know that he wrote a refutation of the commentary of Abū ʿAlī al-Jubbār. Another scholar of this school, Sayyid al-Murtaḍā, deals in a selective manner in his celebrated book al-Amālī (Summary Sayings) with discussions of Quranic commentary and comments in a theological as well as literary manner upon certain verses.
Although Shaykh al-Ṭūsī and Sulaymān al-Ṣahrashti (fifth/eleventh century) were not exactly members of the Baghdādī school, they were nevertheless trained in that school. The Kitāb al-tibyān fī tafsīr al-Qur’ān (The Book of Declaration in Exegesis of the Quran) by Shaykh al-Ṭūsī, in ten volumes, contains extensive selections from earlier theological commentaries, especially those of the Muʿtazilites. Depending on the nature of the verses concerned, it contains extensive kalāmī discussions. This work is in fact the oldest commentary of its kind and one of the most extensive Imamite commentaries that have survived. Later Imamite commentaries such as Majmaʾ al-bayān (Concourse of Explanation) of Abū ṣAlī al-Ṭabrisī (d. 548/1153–54) and Rawḍ al-jinān (Meadow of Paradise) of Abu’l-Futūḥ al-Rāzī (d. 525/1131) were deeply influenced by it. In speaking of the scholar Sulaymān al-Ṣahrashti, who lived in the latter part of the fifth/eleventh century, one must also mention his refutation of the commentary of the Muʿtazilite theologian Abū Yūṣuf al-Qazwīnī, to which Ibn al-Shahrāshūb refers.54

During the middle centuries of Islamic history, among Imamites, as among Sunnis, preaching came to predominate over the writing of commentaries, and kalāmī commentaries became rare. Among works on commentary that were nevertheless written during this period, one must mention Mutashābihāt al-Qurʾān (Metaphorical Verses of the Quran) by Ibn al-Shahrāshūb, which is one of the few commentaries organized according to subject matter. In a manner that is unprecedented among older commentaries, the author comments upon verses of the Quran based on subject matter rather than the order of the verses as they appear in the Quran.

In later centuries, although Imamite theology entered a new period of expansion and prominence through the efforts of Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī (d. 672/1274) and others, kalāmī commentary became less prevalent. Among the limited number of works in this field after al-Ṭūsī, one can note the efforts of Qūṭb al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Rāzī (d. 766/1365). He wrote glosses upon the Kashshāf of al-Zamakhsharī and evaluated the theological (kalāmī) interpretation of the author. These glosses were later criticized by Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Āqsarāʾī (d. 771/1369 or 791/1389).55 Needless to say, the writing of Quranic commentaries among both Sunnis and Shiites continued after the classical period into the fourteenth/twentieth century; examples are the commentaries of Bāḍīʿ al-Zamān Saʿīd al-Nūrṣī (d. 1379/1960), Abu’l-Kalām Āzād (d. 1377/1958), Mawlānā Mawdūdī (d.

1399/1979), Sayyid Quṭb (d. 1386/1966), and Muḥammad Ḥūsayn Ṭabāṭabā’ī (d. 1401/1981). Moreover, commentaries continue to be written today. Although these commentaries are not strictly speaking kalāmī, they nevertheless contain some kalāmī discussions and need to be mentioned. Most such works continue classical currents of Quranic commentary, but in a new context.

Quranic Commentaries Among the Philosophers and Some Sufis

The Quranic revelation created the worldview within which Islamic philosophers philosophized even if they continued to make use of ideas inherited from Greek philosophers such as Plato, Aristotle, and Plotinus. Such questions as the relation between faith and reason, the eternity or newness of the world, the relation between revealed and rational knowledge, the epistemological meaning of revelation as understood in relation to the Quran, and many other issues discussed extensively by Islamic philosophers were related directly to the Quran as source of both ethics and knowledge for Muslims. Even the name of philosophy in Arabic, al-falsafah, taken from the Greek word philosophia, came to be complemented by the word ḥikmah (“wisdom”), taken from the Quran, and many a later Islamic philosopher came to be known as a ḥakīm, that is, a possessor of ḥikmah.

In addition to this general influence of the Quran on the whole Islamic philosophical tradition, some Islamic philosophers also wrote direct commentaries on certain verses or sūrah s of the Sacred Book. Abū Naṣr al-Fārābī (d. 339/950), the second major Islamic Peripatetic (mashshāʾī) philosopher following Abū Yaʿqī al-Kindī (d. ca. 252/856), not only discussed the meaning of revelation from the point of view of epistemology, but also in his Fuṣūs al-ḥikmah (Ringstones of Wisdom) commented upon certain Quranic verses. His successor in this school and the most influential of Islamic philosophers, Abū ʿAlī ibn Sīnā (Avicenna, d. 428/1037), took it a step further and wrote separate works of commentary on certain sūrah s of the Quran, including al-Ikhlāṣ (“Sincerity”), al-Falaq (“The Daybreak”), al-ʿAʾlā (“The Most High”), and part of al-Fuṣṣilat (“Expounded”). In addition, in the Risālat al-nayrūziyyah (The Nayrūzi Treatise), attributed to him, there is a commentary on the single letters that appear at the beginning of some of the sūrah s of the Quran.

The most influential commentary of Ibn Sīnā, however, is his philosophical commentary on the Light Verse (āyat al-nūr; 24:35). This commentary appears not as a separate work, but as part of his last philosophical masterpiece, Kitāb al-īshārāt wa’l-tanbīhāt (The Book of Directives and Remarks). This work influenced many later philosophers, and even the theologian and Sufi al-Ghazzālī, the author of Mishkāt al-anwār (Niche of Lights). This latter work itself played an important role in the teachings of Shīhāb al-Dīn al-Suhrawardī (d. 587/1191) and the founding of the School of Illumination (al-īshrāq) and definitely influenced the magisterial commentary of Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī (Mullā Ṣadrā; d. 1050/1640) on the Light Verse.

Among other Peripatetics who commented upon certain verses of the Quran and tried to correlate their meaning with philosophical teachings, one must mention Abu’l-Walīd Muḥammad ibn Rushd (Averroës, d. 595/1198), who in his Faṣl al-maqāl (The Decisive Treatise) sought to harmonize the Divine Law (al-Sharīʿah) and philosophy (al-ḥikmah). In this task he was joined by many Ismāʿīlī philosophers before him such as Nāṣir-i Khusraw (d. ca. 470/1077). In fact, other Ismāʿīlī philosophers also quoted Quranic verses and sought to comment on them philosophically. As an example one can cite the famous Rasāʾil (Epistles) of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ (“Brethren of Purity”), written during the fourth/tenth century, a work of general Shiite character claimed by Ismāʿīlīs as their own.

One can see a greater interest in philosophical commentary on the Quran in the School of Illumination, whose founder, Suhrawardī, turned to the Quran more than any of his predecessors or contemporaries. Almost all the works of Suhrawardī cite Quranic verses, upon which he then comments. This is especially true of al-Alwāḥ al-ʿimādiyyah (The ʿImādī Tablets), which is in reality itself a Quranic commentary. The first commentator on Suhrawardī, Shams al-Dīn Shahrazūrī (d. after 687/1288), also mentions a work by Suhrawardī with the title Tafsīr al-Qurʾān (Commentary on the Quran), which, however, is lost. It is also notable that Suhrawardī used specific Quranic terms for some of the most important ideas expressed in his works, terms such as nūr (“light”), which he uses as the central concept of Illuminationist philosophy, referring directly to the Quranic usage of this term. He also uses the Quranic term ghasaq (“obscurity”), by which he means the physical body, for the first time in Islamic philosophy.

Before proceeding any further, it is important to say something about the method used by the Islamic philosophers in their commentaries on the Quran.
This method, called ta’wil, which literally means taking something back to its origin, is central to both Shi’ite and Sufi methodology. According to these schools, not only is God both al-Bā’in (“the Inward”) and al-Zāhir (“the Outward”), as asserted by the Quran, but also all things have an inward and an outward aspect, especially the Word of God, the Quran, according to the text of the Quran itself.

One must not, however, confuse the philosophical method of Quranic commentary and the Shi’ite or Sufi method. There is a long tradition of Sufi commentaries that includes such works as the Tafsīr of Sahl al-Tustarī (d. 283/896); Haqā’iq al-tafsīr (Truths of Quranic Commentary) of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī (d. 412/1021); Laḥ’if al-ishārāt (Subtleties of Indications) of Abu’l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (d. 465/1072); Kashf al-asrār wa-ʿuddat al-abrār (The Unveiling of Mysteries and Provision for the Pious) of Rashīd al-Dīn al-Maybūdī (d. 520/1126); ʿArāʾis al-bayān (Brides of Elucidation) of Rūzbihān al-Baqlī al-Shīrāzī (d. 606/1209); several commentaries attributed to Ibn ʿArabī (d. 638/1240) as well as al-Futūḥat al-makkiyyah (The Meccan Openings), which is in reality a commentary on the Quran; Ta’wil al-Qur’ān (Hermeneutics of the Quran) of ʿAbd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī (d. 736/1336); and Mawāhib-i ʿaliyyah (Lofty Gifts) of Ḥusayn ibn ʿAlī al-Kāshīfī (d. 910/1504). This tradition was later continued by such figures as Shāh Walī Allāh of Delhi (d. 1176/1762), Sultān ʿAlī Shāh (d. 1327/1909), Ṣafī ʿAlī Shāh (d. 1361/1899), Mawlānā ʿAlī Thanwī (d. 1362/1943), and many others. The Sufi tradition, along with the tradition of Shi’ite commentaries, was also to influence later philosophical commentaries, especially those of Mullā Ṣadrā, but must not be confused with philosophical commentaries strictly speaking.

One can see commentaries on some Quranic verses in the works of the members of the School of Shiraz, which was the central locus of philosophical activity from the seventh/thirteenth through the tenth/sixteenth century. But the peak of philosophical commentary on the Quran is to be found in the writings of Mullā Ṣadrā (d. 1050/1640). In the introduction to his magnum opus, al-Asfār al-arbaʿah (The Four Journeys), he reminds readers that the goal of the Transcendent Theosophy/Philosophy, or al-ḥikmat al-mutaʿāliyyah, which is the name of the new philosophical school established by him, is to integrate qurʾān, ʿirfān, and burhān, that is, the Quran, gnostic knowledge, and philosophical demonstration. And indeed we find references to the Quran and the Ḥadīth throughout his works. Moreover, with the aim of bringing out the philosophical meaning of the Quran, he composed commentaries on specific sūrahs and verses that have been assembled together in seven large volumes as Tafsīr al-Qurʾān al- karīm (Commentary on the Noble Quran).

Mullā Ṣadrā also wrote Asrār al-āyāt (Mysteries of Quranic Verses), in which he discusses his understanding of the method of hermeneutic interpretation (tawʾīl), which does not follow completely the methods of earlier works of Quranic commentary. Finally, one must also mention another major work of Mullā Ṣadrā, Mafātīḥ al-ghayb (Keys of the Invisible World), which deals with the inner meaning of the Quran.

These works influenced many Qajar philosophers of the thirteenth/nineteenth century, such as Mullā ʿAlī Nūrī (d. 1246/1830–31), who wrote glosses upon them. Perhaps the greatest Islamic philosopher of that period, Ḥājjī Mullā Hādī Sabzawārī (d. 1289/1872), also followed Mullā Ṣadrā in commenting on Quranic verses. He did not, however, compose a separate work dedicated only to Quranic commentary, although he did write well-known commentaries on famous Shiite prayers that were themselves based on the Quran.

Many scholars, including a number from Egypt, have severely criticized the whole tradition of philosophical commentaries on the Quran. We can find allusions to this matter as early as the work of Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad al-Thaʿlabī (d. 427/1035). The greatest opposition, however, came from Ibn Taymiyyah, who again and again turned to the criticism of the philosophers’ understanding of the Quran. Nor did such criticism cease in the eighth/fourteenth century. It has continued among certain jurists and theologians to this day, as has opposition in certain circles to Sufi commentaries.

In conclusion, it is necessary to say a few words about the major contemporary scholar, gnostic, and philosopher Muḥammad Ḥusayn Ṭabāṭabāʾī (d. 1401/1981), the author of the twenty-seven-volume Quranic commentary al-Mīzān fī tafsīr al-Qurʾān (The Balance in the Exegesis of the Quran). In composing this most extensive of fourteenth/twentieth-century commentaries, he drew from all the different approaches of earlier commentators, whether they were historians, linguists, jurists, theologians, philosophers, or Sufis. Being the great philosopher that he was, he interpreted many verses philosophically, so that al-Mīzān may be considered to some extent part of the tradition of philosophical commentaries on the Quran. Nevertheless, he opposed strongly imposing certain theological or philosophical ideas upon Quranic verses. He sought to interpret the verses of the Quran through other verses of the Quran itself, and yet the result is a commentary that is at once theological, philosophical, and mystical. It also deals with the language of the Quran, the meaning of the sacred history contained in it, and its legal, ethical, metaphysical, cosmological, and eschatological doctrines.

Translated by Seyyed Hossein Nasr
The Arabic word ṣūfī, from which English “Sufism” is derived, was first used to designate a certain type of religiosity in the second/eighth century. The original meaning of the word seems to have been “someone who wears wool,” though other derivations have also been proposed. Once the word came into use, Muslim scholars never reached any consensus as to what exactly it implied. Down into the seventh/thirteenth century, it was generally used to characterize certain saintly figures and their teachings, and from then on it was also applied to various “orders” (lit. “paths,” ṭaruq; sing. ṭarīqah), within which teachers guided students on the quest for God. Many scores of such orders still flourish in the Islamic world, each of them tracing its lineage back to one or more founding saints and eventually to the Prophet. For centuries, the orders played a dominant role in the religious life of the Muslim community, but more recently the politicized forms of Islam known as “fundamentalism” have to a notable degree obscured their presence, at least to the media.

Modern-day scholars commonly take the word “Sufism” as a synonym for mysticism, spirituality, or esoterism, all of which suggest something of what the word has connoted. For the purposes of this essay, Sufism can best be understood in relation to the structure of the Islamic tradition. The twin foundations of Islam—the Quran and the Sunnah—provide guidance on three levels: activity, understanding, and transformation; or practice, thought, and spirituality. As Muslims drew out the implications of God’s Guidance on the level of practice and activity, they gradually brought into being the realm of jurisprudence (fiqh) and the schools of the Revealed Law (the madhāhib of the Shari‘ah). As they pondered the implications of Divine Guidance for a correct understanding of God, the cosmos (“everything other than God”), and human embodiment, they gave rise to schools of thought like kalām (theology) and philosophy. At the same time, many Muslims—often the same figures involved in the first two realms—held that the goal of both right activity and correct understanding was transformation of the soul, that is, achieving inner conformity with al-Ḥaqq, “the Real,” the Supreme Truth and Absolute Reality that is God Himself. It is these Muslims who were often called “Sufis” by their contemporaries or by later generations.

The outstanding characteristic of the Sufi approach to the Islamic tradition has been to focus on assimilating the soul to the Divine Word, always on the basis of the model established by the Prophet. Addressing him, the Quran says, Truly thou art of an exalted (ʿaẓīm) character (68:4), and it was lost on no one that the Quran uses the same adjective to refer to itself—the Mighty (ʿaẓīm) Quran (15:87). The exaltedness of the Prophet’s character derives precisely from the fact that he had assimilated the Quran into his very being. This is how Sufis have understood the saying of the Prophet’s wife ʿĀʾishah, when she was asked about his character after his death. She replied, “Have you not read the Quran? His character was the Quran.”

The Quran’s role in the soul’s transformation is implicit in the accounts of the Prophet’s ascent (miʿrāj) to God, the “Night Journey,” to which reference is made in 17:1: Glory be to Him Who carried His servant by night. Laylat al-isrāʾ, “the Night of the Journey,” or al-miʿrāj, “the Ascent,” was understood as the fulfillment of laylat al-qadr, “the Night of Power” (97:1–3). Having brought the Divine Word down to the Prophet on the Night of Power, Gabriel took him up to meet God on the Night of the Journey. He could encounter God precisely because “His character was the Quran,” which had descended into his soul and transmuted it into a luminous lamp (33:46) in answer to his prayer, “Make me into a light.” The Quran itself, after all, is the light (64:8), revealed by the Light of the heavens and the earth (24:35) to bring forth mankind out of darkness into light (14:1).

The Path of Transformation

Sufi teachers frequently spoke of the goal of the Islamic tradition as “realization” (taḥqīq), a word derived from the same root as the Divine Name al-Ḥaqq, the Real, the Right, the True, the Appropriate. Grammatically, realization means to actualize truth (ḥaqq) and reality (ḥaqīqah), and in Sufism it came to designate the end result of following the path to God. To achieve realization means to reach the Real, to see and understand all things in light of the Real, and to act rightly and appropriately in all situations. This demands the transformation of the very being of the seeker, and it is precisely the role of Sufi writings to explain the nature of this transformation, to describe the path that can lead to it, and to offer practical instructions and means on how one can travel on the path.

The notion of “path” is central to Muslim self-understanding. During every cycle of the daily prayers Muslims recite al-Fāṭiḥah (Sūrah 1). After praising God and declaring human neediness, the sūrah voices the heart of the religious quest: Guide us upon the straight path (1:6). It is this very path (ṣirāṭ) that is embodied as the bridge (ṣirāṭ) over Hell that everyone must attempt to cross on the Day of Resurrection. Those who follow the Divine Guidance in this life will pass over safely, and those who ignore it will fall into the Fire. The Quran makes “guidance” (hudā) the general attribute of prophets, and it ascribes “misguidance” (iḍlāl) to Satan. Addressing the Prophet, it says, Truly thou dost guide unto a straight path (42:52). But it also reminds us that the Prophet guides only on the basis of God’s Guidance, and that God alone is the ultimate Guide: Surely thou (Muhammad) dost not guide whom thou loveth, but God guides whomsoever He will (28:56).

Quranic words for “path” or “road” play a prominent role in conceptualizing the tradition. Sabīl designates the general path of right guidance, especially in the phrase “the path of God.” Sharīʿah, “avenue,” comes to designate the specific path of right practice codified in Islamic Law and jurisprudence as well as prophetic guidance generally (especially in the plural form, sharāʾiʿ, “paths,” i.e., “religions”). Ṭarīqah comes to mean the path of spiritual discipline, the inner journey toward right understanding and right conformity with the Real that is taught by the Sufi masters (shaykhs, pīrs); hence its use to denote the Sufi orders.

In summarizing the nature of the path to God, teachers often spoke of “purification of the soul” (tazkiyat al-nafs), an expression derived from 91:7–9. Purification demands eliminating blameworthy character traits (akhlāq dhamīmah) and acquiring praiseworthy character traits (akhlāq ḥamīdah). Akhlāq, or “character traits,” is the plural of khuluq, “character,” and is used to designate the science of ethics (ʿilm al-akhlāq). Among all of God’s servants, the one who had the most “exalted character” was Muhammad, literally “the Praised One,” also called Aḥmad, “the Most Praiseworthy” (61:6). The Quran speaks of God as “the Praiseworthy” (al-Ḥamīd), the implication being that no one else is truly worthy of praise. If the Quran calls the Prophet both “Muḥammad” and “Aḥmad,” this is because his character conforms to God’s “character,” which is to say that “his character was the Quran,” God’s Speech and Self-Expression.

In short, all those who want to purify their souls must follow the straight path, the path of God. This requires imitating the Prophet on two basic levels: right activity, by following the Sharī‘ah; and right understanding and realization, by following the ṭarīqa. Imitating the Prophet can lead to the recovery of the soul’s primordial nature (fitrah), created in God’s “image” or “form” (ṣūrah). Hence Sufis commonly spoke of the goal as “coming to be characterized by the character traits of God” (al-takhalluq bi-akhlāq Allāh), and they understood that the Prophet’s “exalted character” derived precisely from his being characterized by the entire range of Divine Names and Attributes, his full realization of the Reality of the Real. Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (d. 505/1111) devotes a chapter of his commentary on the Divine Names to this process and, following terminology long since used by both Sufis and philosophers, he refers to the goal as the actualization of one’s innate ta’lūlah, “being like unto Allāh,” that is, “deiformity” or “theomorphism.”

The fact that Sufis have focused their attention on achieving spiritual transformation helps explain their dedication to what one scholar has called the “Quranization of memory.” This meant not only that they, like other Muslims, put great stock in the memorization and recitation of the Quran and invocation of the Divine Names contained in the Quran, but also that they voiced their teachings in Quranic terminology and kept in mind that the purpose of all their efforts was to assimilate the Divine Word. Always the goal was for the soul to be transmuted into the Divine Light, the living reality of God’s Self-Expression. This special dedication to the Quran can be observed clearly among the Sufi teachers of the early generations, who are remembered mainly by aphorisms that elucidate the spiritual significance of key Quranic words and phrases. When later Sufis began to write detailed expositions of the human situation vis-à-vis God and the cosmos, they filled their works with commentary on Quranic verses. One of the best examples here is Ibn ʿArabī (d. 638/1240), whom the Sufis call “the Greatest Master,” because of the unsurpassed detail and profundity with which he explained the nature of the path to God. His monumental al-Futūḥāt al-makkiyyah (The Meccan Openings) is nothing if not a series of meditations on the Quran and its inner meaning.

In the Sufi reading of the Islamic tradition, every human being is called to undertake the path of spiritual transformation. All have inherited the knowledge of the names that God taught Adam (2:31), and all are capable of recovering this primordial, Adamic knowledge by assimilating the Quran. In two verses, the Prophet is instructed to say, I am only a human being like you (18:110; 41:6). Like us, he had inherited knowledge of the names from Adam, but unlike us, the verses go on to say, God sent down upon him the revelation of His Unity. It was this event that allowed him to follow the Divine Guidance back to its source and recover the primordial human nature, the fiṭrah. As mortals like him, we can follow in his footsteps.

God’s Signs

One might say that the goal of Sufi theoretical teachings is to provide a cosmic anthropology combined with cosmology, that is, an exposition of human nature with respect to God’s purpose in creating the universe. Right understanding of human nature must begin at the beginning, which is God, the assertion of whose unity, tawḥīd, is the first principle of Islamic faith. Tawḥīd is expressed most succinctly by the first part of the shahādah, “(There is) no god but God,” a formula that provides the core of Islamic thought. Its two halves—typically called the negation (nafy) and the affirmation (ithbāt)—negate Divine Qualities from everything other than God and ascribe all Reality and all Qualities to Him alone.

The dialectic established by this negation and affirmation reverberates throughout the writings of the Sufis and provides the basic standpoint for understanding the Quran’s message, which is encapsulated by God’s “Most Beautiful Names” (al-asmāʾ al-ḥusnā). Thus, for example, if God is the Creator (al-Khāliq), this means that there is no creator but God. In other words, this Name negates ontological creativity from creatures and affirms that it belongs to God alone. The Quran puts it rhetorically: Is there a creator other than God? (35:3). If God is the Strong (al-Qawī), then there is no strength save in God (18:39). If He is the Rich (al-Ghanī), then, O mankind! You are needful of God; and He is the Self-Sufficient, the Praised (35:15). If He is the Sovereign (al-Malik), then unto God belongs sovereignty over the heavens and the earth (3:189) and He has no partner in sovereignty (17:111).

Meditating on God’s Quranic Names leads to the understanding that everything in the universe comes from God, returns to God, and is sustained and supported by God at every moment. The universe is in reality a vast panorama of God’s “signs” (āyāt), a word that the Quran uses to designate the phenomena of the natural realm, the perception and awareness of the soul, the activities and miracles of the prophets, and its own verses. It calls upon people to reflect and meditate on the signs, each of which displays marks and traces of God’s Most Beautiful Names. The broad manner in which the Quran speaks of signs/verses leads to a discussion of three books—the cosmos, the human soul, and the Quran itself, the last of which is the key to the interpretation of the first two. As Ibn ʿArabī tells us, all of the cosmos is “letters, words, sūrah{s}, and signs/verses, so it is the Great Quran.”\(^5\) His student Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Qūnawī (d. 673/1274) often elaborates on this imagery. In one passage he explains why the human soul, taught all the names by God, is God’s revealed book:

Have you not heard the Words of God? Read your Book! On this Day, your own soul suffices as a reckoner against you [17:14]. Whosoever reads this Book has come to know what has been, what is, and what will be. If you cannot read all of your Book, then read of it what you can. Have you not seen how He says, And within your souls. Do you not then behold? [51:21] And have you not seen how He says, We shall show them Our signs upon the horizons and within themselves till it becomes clear to them that it is the truth. Does it not suffice that thy Lord is Witness over all things? [41:53]. . . So this, my son, is the Book and the knowledge of the Book. And you are the Book, as we said. Your knowledge of your own soul is your knowledge of the Book. And there is not anything moist, which is the visible world, or dry, which is the spiritual world and everything beyond, but that it is inscribed in a clear Book [6:59], and that is you.\(^6\)

Everything in the universe, the soul, and the Quran is a sign/verse. All signs need to be deciphered through both negation, “no god,” and affirmation, “but God.” With regard to negation, signs have no reality compared to God’s infinite Reality; as for affirmation, each sign points to the Real, for all qualities derive their sustenance from His Qualities. Inasmuch as all things denote God’s Names and Attributes, everything in the entire universe is a tajallī, a “theophany,” a Divine “Self-Disclosure” (tajallī). This word is taken from a verse in which Moses asks God to show Himself. God replies that Moses will not be able to see Him. And when his Lord manifested Himself (tajallā) to the mountain, He made it crumble to dust, and Moses fell down in a swoon (7:143). The blinding light of theophany negates the mountain and its viewer, just as every sign, seen with the eye of discernment, negates the unreal and affirms that there is nothing real but the Real.

Each of the cosmic signs/verses is a specific thing, event, word, or sentence, but each also points to something else beyond itself. The signs/verses that make up the Quran are also pointers; yet the Quran is the clear Book (12:1) and the clear Quran (15:1), providing the clarity and insight with which to interpret the signs in the cosmos and the soul. To understand this Divine Guidance, however, people must dedicate themselves to what the Book asks from them, not least following God’s path and careful study of His Word. Without understanding the written signs of the Quran, they will never be able to decipher the cosmic and inner signs. They will then be heedless of their own role in creation and unable to deal with the world and themselves appropriately and rightly (bi’l-ḥaqq), that is, in conformity with the Reality of the Real.

The Face of God

The Quran sometimes speaks of God’s Self-Disclosure as His “Face” (wajh), as in 2:115: Wheresoever you turn, there is the Face of God. In other words, God discloses Himself in everything; so each is a sign affirming God’s Reality and negating its own independent reality. At the same time, however, each thing is simply itself; so it is a veil that conceals the Divine Face disclosed within it. A second verse suggests something of the two-sided nature of the Divine Self-Disclosure with its grammatical ambiguity: All things perish, save His Face (28:88), a sentence that can equally well be read, “Each thing perishes except its face,” that is, the thing’s face. If we take the pronoun to mean “His,” then the verse affirms the permanence of God and negates the permanence of all things. If we take it to mean “its,” then a thing’s face, that is, its aspect of relation to God, is permanent, but not the rest of the thing. Ibn ʿArabī explains that this permanent face of a thing is its inmost reality, which is always gazing upon God, a reality that is ultimately nothing other than the Face of God gazing upon it. He calls this inmost reality God’s “Specific Face” (wajh khāṣṣ), meaning that God in His infinite Knowledge has an infinity of Faces, each of which is turned toward a specific thing to bring it into existence and sustain it.

The Quran tells us that seekers of God desire the Face of God (30:38), and it praises those who turn their faces to Him: Whosoever submits (islām) his face to God and is virtuous (muḥsin) has indeed grasped the most unfailing handhold (31:22). By submitting their faces to God, seekers find their own true faces, which are the same as the Specific Faces that God has turned toward them. The two faces are ultimately one, for “there is no face but God’s Face.” Those who seek God’s Face, then, are striving to recognize the Face of God that is their own true self.

This quest to recognize God’s Face helps explain one of the senses of the famous ḥadīth, “He who recognizes himself recognizes his Lord.” This ḥadīth, which is constantly cited in Sufi texts, is usually translated, “He who knows himself knows his Lord.” The verb ‘a.rafa, however, designates recognition (i.e., re-cognition) rather than simple knowing (which is designated by ‘alima). The use of this specific word suggests that the knowledge gained from coming to know oneself is in fact a renewed knowledge of what one already knows in one’s inmost being. Indeed, so important is this notion of “recognition” that Sufism is often called ma‘rifah or ‘irfān, both of which are verbal nouns from the verb ‘a.rafa. If scholars usually translate these two words as “gnosis,” it is because this English word means immediate knowledge of spiritual truth, and this suggests something of the nature of the self-recognition that is simultaneously God recognition.

It is worth recalling here that the Quranic term dhikr denotes both the “reminder” that comes from God and the “remembrance” that is the human response to that reminder. At the same time, the word also means “to mention” or “to invoke,” and the Quran frequently encourages mentioning or invoking the Name of God as a means of remembering Him, as in 76:25: Invoke the Name of thy Lord morning and evening. This Quranic teaching is the basis for the universal practice of remembering (dhikr) God’s Name (or “invocation”) found in all the Sufi orders. The Quran’s use of this word and its cognates shows that, in the Quranic view of things, we already possess the knowledge that we are being reminded of, but we must recover it. In short, true recognition of oneself demands seeing oneself as a Face of God and understanding that “everything is perishing but His Face,” which is none other than one’s true face. The ultimate identity of God’s Face and the human face reminds us that our remembrance of God is simultaneously God’s remembrance of us: Remember Me, and I shall remember you (2:152).

Still another verse that mentions God’s Face is the source of one of the most famous conceptual pairs in the Sufi vocabulary, fanāʾ, passing away or annihilation, and baqāʾ, remaining or subsistence: All upon it passes away. And there remains the Face of thy Lord, Possessed of Majesty and Bounty (55:26–27). All signs disappear, but the Divine Face that discloses itself in the signs remains. Sufis take this not only as a statement of the transitory nature of the world, but also as a call to action. Seekers must recognize the passing nature of their own souls save their “faces” and find the permanent Face of the Real; they must negate the veils and affirm the Face, which is to say that they must annihilate their own ignorant and limited selves, so that they can behold the Divine Face.

Human beings, created by God to be His vicegerents (khalāʾif; sing. khalīfah) on earth (2:30), can play their proper roles only if they recognize who they are and who their Lord is. Adam was taught all the names, but he forgot (20:115) and disobeyed (20:121). God forgave Adam and appointed him as prophet and vicegerent, but most of his children are dominated by forgetfulness and disobedience. God sends guidance precisely to remind them of their role in creation. When they remember, they will understand that they should be striving to actualize the character traits that are latent in their primordial nature. Veils must be lifted so that the Face of God may appear. Blameworthy character traits must be annihilated, and praiseworthy character traits—the traits instilled in the fitrah—must become manifested to subsist. Guided by the negation of the veil and the affirmation of the Face, seekers of God aim to follow the Prophet on the ladder of ascent and to recover their own primordial form in the Divine Presence, their own original faces before they were born of their parents. When all ignorance and blameworthy character traits have been annihilated, only God’s Face—the magnificent character of the Real—remains.

Love

Historians have noted that Sufism has had a remarkable ability to appeal to the masses and permeate popular culture. The Sufi reading of the Quran was transmitted through the personal radiance of saintly teachers and a vast literature, much of it presented in the form of poetry and song. Theologians and jurists preferred dry disquisitions in Arabic, the universal language of Muslim scholarship, though they often wrote more popular works in Persian, Turkish, other languages, and even Arabic itself. Poets sang their songs in their own languages, and poetry became a beautiful and accessible vehicle for Sufi teachings. The monumental Mathnawī of Jalāl al-Dīn al-Rūmī (d. 672/1273), for example, has often been called the Quran in the Persian language. This is not because it bears any outward resemblance to the Divine Word, but rather because Rūmī was able to capture in a non-technical, everyday language, understandable to any Persian speaker, what he himself calls “the roots of the roots of the roots of the religion”\(^8\)—which is an apt description of the Quran itself, the foundation of everything Islamic.

The basic theme of most popular poetry, especially Sufi poetry, is love, with all of its ups and downs, its joys and sorrows. The contours of Sufism as a cosmic and spiritual anthropology can perhaps best be seen by looking at a few Quranic verses about love and the manner in which these verses were understood. The most commonly cited is no doubt 5:54, God will bring a people whom He loves and who love Him, usually in the abbreviated form, He loves them, and they love Him. The theologian Ahmad al-Sam`ānī (d. 534/1140) explains that God mentions His Most Beautiful Names in the Quran so as to clarify to His servants that they must negate Divine Attributes from themselves and affirm them for God alone. God speaks of His Exaltation and their abasement, His Knowledge and their ignorance, His Holiness and their taintedness, His Life and their death, His Unity and their multiplicity. But “when He gave news of love, just as He affirmed love for Himself, so also He affirmed love for us—He loves them, and they love Him.\(^9\)

Notice that this verse speaks of both God and human beings as lover and beloved. Tawḥīd alerts us to the fact that there can be no true lover and no true beloved but God. So in what sense can human beings be called lovers of God, and why should they be the objects of God’s Love? We can begin by recalling that the Prophet said, “God is beautiful, and He loves beauty.”\(^10\) With regard to tawḥīd, this means that nothing is truly beautiful but God, and that no one truly loves but God. Nonetheless, God created human beings in a beautiful form: He formed you and made beautiful your forms (40:64). Our forms are beautiful because God created us in His own “form,” which is to say that He in-formed us with the Most Beautiful Names. God loves beauty; so He loves the beauty of human forms, which is to say that He loves the manifestation of His own Most Beautiful Names in creation.

Why, then, did God create the universe in the first place? In the Quran He says, I did not create jinn and mankind, save to worship Me (51:56), the last phrase of which can also mean “to serve Me.” Fulfilling the proper human role as God’s vicegerent demands serving the Lord, and no service is greater than negating oneself and affirming God, annihilating blameworthy character traits and allowing the Divine character traits to subsist. But what does service/worship have to do with love? Here Sufi texts like to quote the hadīth qudsī, “I was a hidden treasure, and I loved to be recognized; so I created the creatures so that I would be recognized.” In other words, God created the universe because, as the verse of mutual love puts it, He loves them; that is, He loves human beings; so He gave them the capacity to recognize Him and to love Him in return. By recovering their fitrah, they recognize themselves as God’s servants, and they recognize their Lord as the possessor of the Most Beautiful Names, which are also the Most Lovable Names, for beauty attracts love. Recognition, in other words, turns their love toward God, and love demands devoted service.

So, there is no lover but God, and He loves them, that is, human beings created in His “form,” for they are the Self-Disclosures of His Most Beautiful Names. And there is no beloved but God, which is to say that human beings love God and God alone, whether they know it or not. This is because no one is beautiful but God; so all love is attracted to His Beauty. Sufi authors are especially fond of explaining this truth, for it goes against common sense, which tells us that we love this person or that thing. Indeed, the Quran remarks, Made to seem fair unto mankind is the love of passions, among them women, children, heaped-up heaps of gold and silver, horses of mark, cattle, and tillage (3:14). But why do these things “seem fair”? The reason is that they love Him and they see the Beauty of God’s Face in His signs without being aware of it. As Rūmī puts it, the objects of love are gold-plated by God’s Attributes. People should strive to recognize that it is not these objects per se that they love, but God. Ibn ʿArabī explains the point in this way, referring first to a series of beautiful women celebrated in Arabic poetry:

No one loves anyone but his own Creator, but he is veiled from Him by love for Zaynab, Suʿād, Hind, Laylā, this world, money, position, and everything loved in the world. Poets exhaust their words on all these existing things, but they do not know. The gnostics [i.e., those who “recognize” themselves and God] never hear a verse, a riddle, a panegyric, or a love poem that is not about God, hidden beyond the
The significance of the verse of mutual love becomes a bit clearer as soon as we reflect upon what lovers desire. If He loves them and they love Him, both God and human beings desire the same thing, which is to be together. To use the technical language of Sufism, they desire union (wiṣāl), not separation (firāq), for love can never be consummated at a distance. It is equally true, however, that lovers cannot come together unless they are at first apart. It is precisely the desire for union that incited the One Reality to bring about duality and separation in the first place. His Command when He desires a thing, says the Quran, is only to say to it, “Be!” and it is (36:82). This desire to create things is none other than the Hidden Treasure’s love to be recognized, for without a separate creation, there would be none to recognize Him and none to love Him.

So the goal of God’s creative activity is not, as some might think, for there simply to be a world out there, but rather for God and His loved ones to come together, as they were before creation. Rūmī explains this game of love when he says that all of us used to be fish swimming in the ocean of Divine Unity, unaware of our distinction from the water. Then God threw us up on dry land, the realm of separation, longing, pain, and suffering. Only by tasting separation can we remember the joy of water and desire to return to it. Once we return, we will swim in the Ocean of Unity again with full awareness of the joy of consummated love.

The most explicit reference to union with God in the earliest Islamic sources is probably the sound ḥadīth qudsī in which God speaks of the servant who seeks nearness to Him through good works. When the servant advances on the path, then, God says, “I love him, and when I love him, I am the hearing with which he hears, the eyesight with which he sees, the hand with which he grasps, and the foot with which he walks.” This ḥadīth has been the subject of endless explication in Sufi texts, for it describes in concrete terms the fruit of He loves them. But they love Him also plays a basic role: the servants’ love for God drives them to follow the path of guidance. If their love were to be misguided, then they would be attracted to the gold plating rather than to God; so they would not advance on the path. To advance they must act beautifully and virtuously (iḥsān) and come to be characterized by beautiful character traits. The only way to accomplish this is to follow in the footsteps of the Prophet. The Prophet is instructed, Say, “If you love God, follow me, and God will love you” (3:31).
When God does love us, then He will be the hearing with which we hear, the eyes with which we see, and the heart with which we love.

“God is beautiful, and He loves beauty.” Clearly the Prophet, the last of the prophets and the “most praiseworthy” of God’s creatures, is the embodiment of human virtue and beauty. As the ḥadīth qudsī puts it, “But for thee [O Muhammad], I would not have created the spheres.”

God created the universe out of His Love to be recognized, and the Prophet fulfilled this role in the most perfect manner, making him God’s foremost beloved and the model that all lovers should follow. By following the Prophet, they can actualize the Most Beautiful Names within their own character, and it is the beauty of the reflection of these Names in human beings that God loves. It is of course also true that God loves all human beings, and indeed all creatures. He made beautiful all that He created (32:7), and He loves the beautiful. So also the fruit of His “love to be recognized” was the creation of all creatures, not just human beings.

Nonetheless, the Quran never mentions explicitly any creatures other than human beings as the objects of God’s Love. Specifically, it says that God loves the beautiful-doers (those who have iḥsān, in five verses), the God-fearing (three verses), the just (two), the self-purifiers (two), the repentant, the patient, and those who trust in Him. It also says that there are people whom God does not love: unbelievers, wrongdoers, workers of corruption, transgressors, and those who are immoderate, proud, and boastful. In other words, the Quran tells us that God has a special love for those who choose to follow His ways, and this love is not exactly the same as the love that brought the universe into existence. The ways of God followed by those whom He loves are encapsulated in the beautiful example (33:21) and exalted character of the Prophet.

Explicating the path of becoming adorned by beautiful character traits provides the basis for numerous books by Sufi masters. Probably the most famous of these in the West is Manṭiq al-ṭayr (The Language of the Birds), by Farīd al-Dīn ʿAṭṭār (d. 618/1221), a book-length Persian poem that has been translated into English several times. The title refers to a Quranic verse in which Solomon is said to know the language of the birds (27:16). In ʿAṭṭār’s reading, the verse is alluding to Solomon’s prophetic knowledge of human souls, who alone among all creatures have the potential to fly into God’s Presence. Each of the birds in the tale represents a human type with its own strengths and weaknesses. After a great deal of discussion and debate, thirty birds agree to set out on a quest for the Sīmurgh, the fabulous king of the birds who dwells in a faraway country. With much hardship they fly over seven mountains, each higher than the previous one and each representing a stage on the path to God, a character trait that must become a permanent quality of the soul. The seven stages—seeking, love, recognition, independence, unity, bewilderment, and poverty—are based on Quranic terminology and reflect centuries of Sufi teaching and practice aimed at recovering the fiṭrah and achieving “deiformity.” Reaching the end of the path, the birds find that all of their own character traits have been annihilated and only the traits of the Sīmurgh subsist. The “thirty birds” (ṣī murgh) come to recognize that from the outset, they had been the Self-Disclosure of the Sīmurgh.

Sufi teachers enumerate the stages on the path to God in many different ways, but their common insight is that the Quran and the Sunnah provide the guidelines for the realization of the Divine Form that is latent in every soul. Each human being is called to recognize the Hidden Treasure, to recollect the names taught to Adam, to love the true Beloved, and to be embraced by the true Lover. To be fully human demands actualizing and realizing the meaning of tawḥīd in the depths of the heart. Rūmī sums up the Quranic path of Sufism:

> Love is that flame which, when it blazes up, > burns away everything except the Subsistent Beloved.
> It drives home the sword of “no god” in order to slay other than God.
> Look closely—after “no god” what remains?
> There remains “but God,” the rest has gone.
> Bravo, O great, idol-burning Love!⁴⁶
Among the numerous historians and specialists who have studied Islamic art, quite a few have attempted to sort out and analyze its specific traits in order to explain how, through the centuries when and in the countries where this art has appeared, it has marked with the same novel and original imprint the architecture, decorative forms, and many branches of the craft industry. This originality, however, together with the most conspicuous characteristics of this art, is obviously the result of the intimate relationship established since the advent of Islam between some forms of artistic production and the precepts and practices of the new religion, born from the Quranic revelation and the Prophetic tradition, or Sunnah. Therefore, it is this relationship that we shall try to elucidate here, first by examining what the Quran says about the creative power of human beings, and then by searching in the Noble Book and in the lessons the Prophet drew from it and passed to his community for the fundamental constituents of Islamic aesthetics and the ethical code of Muslim artists. Armed with these guides, we shall be able to review the main branches of Islamic artistic production and observe how each of them bears the mark of the theological foundations (uṣūl al-dīn), the ethical rules (muʿāmalāt), and some of the great symbols and similes (amthāl) that initiated it and accompanied its development.

Homo Faber

Addressing the idolaters who were offended at seeing him striking with his right hand the statues of their divinities, Abraham said, Do you worship that which you carve, while God created you and that which you make? (37:95–96). With these words, the Friend of God reminded them of a truth that the Noble Quran unflaggingly calls to human beings’ attention: God alone, the omnipotent Creator and Lord of the universe, controls the destiny of all creatures, and no human being may pretend to take His place in the creative act, since none is like unto Him (112:4). And yet, having decided to create human beings in His image (ʿalā sūratihi), God has invested them with, among other faculties, a creative power that each individual is free to use according to the Eternal Decree.

The similarity between the creative act of human beings and that of God is implied in the Quran when God says of Himself, He created man from dried clay, like earthen vessels (55:14). Proceeding in the same order from the human level to the Divine, the theologian and mystic Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī writes: “Just as the architect first draws (yuṣawwiru) all aspects of a house on a blank piece of paper in order to build it subsequently according to the copy (nuskhah), so too the Creator of the heavens and earth inscribed the Preserved Tablet (al-lawḥ al-maḥfūz; 85:22) with a blueprint of the Word from its beginning to its end before bringing it into existence in accordance with His copy.”

Like the Creator, the artist, artisan, or crafts worker (ṣāniʿ)—in the traditional context, all these terms are synonyms—starts with a “blank canvas” that is devoid of any representation, whether it is the architect’s blank page, the carver’s bed of plaster, or other workers’ naturally occurring or prepared surfaces of earth, wood, metal, textiles, or leather, in order to re-create on it an image formed in the imagination. The work, then, is completed in three stages, namely, conception (taqdīr), creation or production (ījād), and shaping (taṣwīr), the last of which gives the object its form. These stages have their prototypes at the Divine level, since God, according to a series of Names attributed to Him in the Quran, is called the Creator (al-Khāliq), the Maker (al-Bāriʿ), and the Fashioner (al-Muṣawwir; 59:24). The first Attribute implies a sense of predestination, as in the verse, He . . . Who created everything, then measured it out with due measure (25:2); the second suggests the power to originate and bring to life; and the third describes how He bestows on all that He makes the most perfect and beautiful form.

The actual process of artistic creation has perhaps nowhere been analyzed and explained with such clarity in Islam as in the Epistles (Rasāʾil) of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʿ (“Brethren of Purity”), a group of Muslim philosophers who in the fourth/tenth century compiled an extremely detailed encyclopedia of contemporary sciences and their spiritual and metaphysical foundations. Distinguishing between practical arts (al-ṣanāʾiʿ al-ʿamaliyyah) and theoretical arts (al-ṣanāʾiʿ al-ʿilmiyyah), that is, the creation of an object and its preexistent form in the human intellect, the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʿ showed that the created object
(al-maṣnūʿ) is a homogeneous entity composed of substance and form.²

This is the sacred basis of all art as practiced by artists who seek to conform to God’s Will and create only by the power delegated to them and through an association with Heaven that spans the various degrees of Divine manifestation. In this respect, Seyyed Hossein Nasr has pointed out that the word ṣanʿah has been used by the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ to designate “art” in the sense of “production,” because it encompasses all human creativity:

Now used to mean also “technology,” it refers to the crafts, which are identical with art, or more precisely the plastic arts in the Persian and Islamic contexts. There are no arts “and” crafts; the two are one and the same. To make a beautiful plate or pot is as much art as to paint a miniature. The word ṣanʿah, therefore, confirms once again through the very breadth of its meaning the unity of art and life which has characterized Persian culture, like every other authentic traditional culture, throughout history.³

However, human participation in the Divine Quality of Muṣawwar carries an intrinsic limit, since human artists are unable to give life to the creatures they reproduce, even if done with a great degree of perfection. Their creativity, then, is tainted by a gross imperfection, the result of a vain attempt to equal the Creator. The “Greatest Master” Ibn Ḥarbī (d. 638/1240), in his commentary on the famous ḥadīth about the condemnation that awaits the “fashioners of images” (muṣawwarūn), explains: “God has condemned and threatened the shaper (muṣawwar), because he has not completed the form that he has created.”⁴

Another interpretation of the same ḥadīth is given by Titus Burckhardt in the prologue to his remarkable book on the art of Islam. Commenting upon the sacred character of the Kaʿbah and its value as the symbol of pure monotheism, Burckhardt recalls how the Prophet overturned the 360 idols surrounding the monument and ordered the effacement of the realistic paintings executed inside it. He adds:

This traditional story demonstrates the meaning and the scale of what is erroneously called “Muslim iconoclasm,” and which we would rather call “aniconism”: if the Kaʿbah is the heart of man, the idols, which inhabited it, represent the passions which invest the heart and impede the remembrance of God. Therefore, the destruction of idols—and, by extension, the putting aside of every image likely to become an idol—is the clearest possible parable for Islam of the “one thing necessary,” which is the purification of the heart for the sake of tawbīd, the bearing of witness or the awareness that “There is no divinity save God.”

The feeling of being no more than an instrument in the hands of an All-Wise and Guiding Will infinitely greater than their own is reflected in the care that artists take to follow as closely as possible the guidelines conveyed by the Quran, commented on by the Hadīth, and translated into rules and practices by the virtuous ancestors, the salaf al-ṣāliḥ. Filled with the certitude that the whole creation is the work of God, Who perfects (atqāna) all things (27:88), and having heard that the Prophet Muhammad said, “God loves if one of you makes something that he leads it to perfection (yutqinahu),” Muslim artisans endeavor to adopt itqān, the “search for perfection,” as a permanent ideal and rule of behavior. The self-discipline followed by artists to attain perfection (or rather to approach it, since any believer knows that complete perfection belongs only to God) is very similar to the effort of the faithful who purify their souls by intensive devotions. Whence the ḥadīth: “God, indeed, loves the believing servant who practices a craft.”

Artists who produce well-finished artifacts are also motivated by the feeling of participating at their own humble level in God’s plan of action, a plan that includes the radiation of beauty throughout the created world. To a visitor who was anxious to know whether a person attracted to fine garments and shoes would have access to Paradise, the Prophet answered: “God, truly, is beautiful; He loves beauty!” This saying contains a double invitation: to recognize God as the Source of beauty and to please Him with one’s own production. No incentive, it seems, may have ever proved more effective than this ḥadīth in stimulating the zeal of the innumerable believers who, through successive generations, have used the formal language of art to celebrate the glory of the All-Powerful Lord.

Two Celestial Gifts
The very words by which the Quranic revelation began fourteen centuries ago, in AD 610, summoning Muhammad to recite and proclaim the Divine message, not only brought the good news that God still cared for the salvation of human souls, but, as pronounced in Arabic by the Archangel Gabriel, carried a unique resonance and strength: Recite in the Name of thy Lord Who created, created man from a blood clot. Recite! Thy Lord most noble, Who taught by the Pen, taught man that which he knew not (96:1–5).

In addition, they contained the seed and heralded the advent of two art forms that are among the most precious aids enabling people to respond to the will of their Creator, Who declared, I did not create jinn and mankind, save to worship Me (51:56), and also, The remembrance of God is surely greater (29:45). How could human beings effectively conform to their true raison d’être, which is to worship God and remember Him as constantly as possible, unless they received assistance from the Lord Himself?

The answer to that question can be found in the history of humanity as revealed in the Holy Book. Created in the most beautiful stature according to 95:4, human beings lost their pristine nature through their own pride and disobedience of the Divine Command; after they had been driven out of Paradise, God forgave their error, and all the generations born from Adam through thousands and thousands of years have received sacred teachings brought to them by successions of envoys, prophets, and holy preachers.

The last of these merciful interventions is the Quran, that is, the “reading” or “recitation,” descended from its heavenly Source to be heard, memorized, and incessantly repeated. In its auditory form, it is the source of the first art of Islam, psalmody, which manifests in time the sounds and modulations of the verses of the Noble Book. And since the revealed words are composed of letters and assembled in a book, they may be seen as the source of the second major art form of Islam, calligraphy, which visually transcribes the Holy Word and gives it a spatial location. This is an art form that humans carry within themselves, in some way, from the very beginning of the revelation, since God taught by the Pen, the calamus or reed, a symbol of the Prime Intellect, which, having been plunged in the ink of Divine Wisdom, traces the sacred signs and grants to human beings access to knowledge.

The psalmody of the Quran is the sacred art par excellence. “God has never sent a prophet without giving him a beautiful voice,”9 declared the Prophet Muhammad, and the history of the Quranic revelation illustrates the pertinence of this remark. Brought to human beings in a clear, Arabic tongue (26:195), the Divine message had to be proclaimed clearly. Recite the Quran in a measured pace was the command given to Muhammad (73:4), and he himself, in a hadīth, recommended to the faithful: “Make beautiful your voices [while reciting] the Quran,” meaning that there exists a veritable correspondence between the Divine Word and the human voice.

“Recite the Quran following the melodies and intonations of the Arabs,” the Prophet also recommended. That this injunction was generally followed is demonstrated by the undeniable kinship that exists between all the styles of psalmody present in the Muslim world. It is true that in the course of its expansion in space, the art of psalmody, even though its major structural elements had been fixed at an early date by several recognized schools, absorbed a number of melodic elements present in various local milieus, giving birth to easily recognizable, characteristic styles. All these styles, however, bear the indelible stamp of Islam; they incorporate a unique sonorous sound, the one that has been and still is the vehicle of the Quranic message.

Practiced on all occasions, individually or collectively, psalmody is for each believer the means par excellence of remembering God and of meditating on His signs and blessings, following His injunction: Truly in the creation of the heavens and the earth and the variation of the night and the day are signs for the possessors of intellect, who remember God standing, sitting, and lying upon their sides, and reflect upon the creation of the heavens and the earth, “Our Lord, Thou hast not created this in vain. Glory be to Thee! Shield us from the punishment of the Fire” (3:190–91). Taught to children from the earliest age, it not only impresses upon them the spiritual and moral precepts of Islam, but acts on the very fiber of their artistic sensibility and actions, through the alchemy of the Word, a transmutation that restores to human nature something of its primordial sacredness.

Making perceptible the eternal truth and beauty of the Quranic message is also the role of calligraphy. It served to establish, a few years after the death of the Prophet, a complete and definite recension of the Noble Book, and it has never ceased to spread the text in all directions, giving birth to forms and styles of writing the aesthetic qualities of which arouse the admiration even of non-Muslims and non-Arabists.

Each script, in playing on the forms, dimensions, and proportions of the letters, brings certain Divine Attributes into greater relief. Thus, the Divine Majesty and Transcendence are evoked by the vertical strokes, especially those of the alif, symbol of the Oneness of the Supreme Principle, Allāh, which stamps its mark on the rhythms of the discourse. Beauty and Immanence are expressed by the horizontal lines, above and below which are written the diacritic and vowel signs, like the notes of a musical score. Mercy and Plenitude are suggested by the rounded forms, which in some styles of calligraphy exhibit generous curves under the horizontal plane. To this type belongs, for example, the letter nūn, which is a symbol of the protection granted to the prophet Jonah (Yūnus or Dhu’l-Nūn), who was swallowed by a whale and miraculously rescued.13

“Whoever taught me one letter, I have become his slave!” This saying is by ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet Muhammad and the person to whom is attributed the Kūfic script, which developed in the city of Kufa about AH 30. This script illustrates the value and importance of the letters as keys for the understanding of hidden mysteries and for obtaining special graces. In fact, a whole discipline, the “science of letters” (ʿilm al-ḥurūf), is based on the individual forms and arithmetic values of the letters (abjad) of the Arabic alphabet. At a popular level it is practiced by a certain class of fuqahāʾ (jurists, Quranic teachers; sing. faqīh) who have also acquired a knowledge of folk medicine and may prepare for their patients amulets (ḥirz, tilismān) bearing magic squares and written formulas drawn from the Quran.

Just as the Divine Word chanted from minarets is diffused in all directions, weaving a network of sound around the whole space, so are the written verses present everywhere: on the pages of handwritten and printed maṣāḥif (“copies,” sing. muṣḥaf) of the Quran present in every Muslim home, on the epigraphic friezes of monuments, and on a multitude of ritual objects: candlesticks, lamps, lecterns, votive banners, embroidered cloths hung on walls or covering a catafalque after the example of the black velvet kiswa that is wrapped around the Kaʿbah and renewed annually. Weapons, jewelry, wooden and metal chests, and domestic utensils like ewers and basins also bear formulas quoted or derived from the Quran, which are believed capable of keeping pernicious influences at bay and attracting Divine Protection to those who bear, use, or merely look at them.

The inscriptions most frequently chosen as cues for recollection are the shahādah, especially its first part, lā ilāha illa’Llāh (“No god, but the One God”), and the Supreme Name, Allāh. Both may be seen drawn in “square Kūfic” characters with enameled bricks on the facades of many monuments in Iran and central Asia, traced in large ornamental style, the so-called thuluth, on the majolica coverings of Near and Middle Eastern mosques and palaces, and written in various styles of calligraphy wherever the human eye can perceive them: not only in oratories, but also in merchants’ boutiques, artisans’ workshops, and family sitting rooms.

Although psalmody and calligraphy were instruments built directly into the revelation to facilitate the penetration and firm establishment of the Divine message, other forms of art were soon developed, in full accordance with the monotheistic dogma and the legal prescriptions, to respond to the moral, social, and material needs of the newly established community of believers (ummah). The first of these needs, deeply felt by the Prophet as he was making his way toward Madinah on the hijrah as an emigrant (muhājir) from Makkah, was for a place where he himself would live and where he and his disciples could meet and pray together.

The Prophet’s Mosque in Madinah

The need for a suitable worship venue was in perfect harmony with the Divine Custom (sunnat Allāh), according to which, during the whole course of history and as an aid to His prophets and messengers, [It is] in houses (buyūt, sing. bayt) that God has permitted to be raised and wherein his Name is remembered (24:36). Just as the vessel constructed by Noah as a blessed refuge from the flood was made before Our Eyes and by Our Revelation (23:27); just as the Kaʿbah (al-bayt), when built by Abraham and Ishmael, was made a place of visitation for mankind, and a sanctuary (2:125); just as Solomon built sanctuaries (maḥārib, sing. miḥrāb) with some jinn who worked before him by the leave of his Lord (34:12); it was also with a special charism that Muhammad was led to the place where he built the mosque that was to be known forever as the ḥaram al-nabawī, the Sanctuary of the Prophet.

This is how it happened. When the Prophet, after migrating from Makkah, arrived in Yathrib—the future Madinah—mounted on his she-camel Qaṣwāʾ, he was welcomed with such enthusiasm that he had to refuse some of the offers of hospitality made by a number of disciples. To those who tried to grasp the camel’s bridle and lead her to their respective dwellings, the Prophet said, “Leave her alone! She is under the Command of God.” In fact, after several hesitations, she definitely stopped and bowed down so that the Prophet could dismount; he knew that the place she had chosen was the right one. The next day, after the price of the land had been paid to the two orphans to whom it belonged, the Prophet traced the floor plan of the mosque and, with his Companions, started digging to lay the foundation.

The construction of the mosque took seven months. For its design, planning, and construction, the Prophet must have received the same heavenly assistance that had been given to the saintly builders of the past, especially since no building had ever been erected in the whole of Arabia that could have been used as a model fitting the needs of the new community. The final layout of the mosque was simple and adaptable; it consisted of a vast enclosed courtyard, the ṣaḥn, accessible by three doors. A part of it, along the qiblah wall, covered with a thatched roof supported by palm-tree trunks, served as the regular prayer room. The largest space was left open to the sky, ready at all times to welcome the visitors desirous to meet or just see the Prophet, to attend some religious or social gathering, or to stay in the blessed precinct while occupying themselves with some minor handicraft.

On one of the lateral sides of the ṣaḥn were the houses or “apartments” (ḥujurāt) of the Prophet and his wives, a proximity mentioned in the Quran (49:4–5) as having caused some problems for the Prophet, paving the way for the formulation, at a later stage of urban development, of standard rules of correct behavior and good neighborly relations between citizens. Another aisle sheltered a long bench (ṣuffah) where visitors could rest and where homeless Companions were hosted and could benefit from the Prophet’s proximity. One of them, Abū Hurayrah (d. 61/681), is still venerated for having kept and transmitted, thanks to his prodigious memory, thousands of the Prophet’s aḥādīth.

The primary piece of liturgical furniture was the minbar, a wooden pulpit with two steps supporting a platform on which the Prophet could sit or stand when he delivered khutbahs (“sermons”) and solemn proclamations. The qiblah, the direction believers face while performing the canonical prayers, was marked in the very early days by the ʿanazah, a lance that the Prophet planted in front of him before leading the prayer, as he used to do during the military expeditions when he prayed in front of his troops. The lance was soon replaced by one or two big stones leaned against the north wall, in the direction of Jerusalem. This was the first miḥrāb, or niche in a mosque wall indicating the qiblah. A few months later, when the revelation changed the qiblah from Jerusalem to Makkah (2:142–44), the stones were transported to the middle of the southern wall, an indication that all believers had henceforth to face, when praying, toward the Masjid al-Ḥarām, the Sacred Mosque of Makkah, in the center of which stands the Holy Kaʿbah.

As soon as it was erected, the Prophet’s Mosque gained the unanimous approval of the Prophet and the believers who prayed and meditated in it, asking God for the strength to fight against their outer and inner enemies in ranks, as if they were a solid structure (bunyān marṣūs; 61:4). It was also an effective setting for establishing bonds of mutual understanding and affection among the faithful. As the population of Madinah increased, the ʿāhn became so frequented that seven years after its completion it became necessary to enlarge it. The work was done during the third year preceding the Prophet’s death (11/632). According to his will, he was buried in his wife c ʿĀʾishah’s apartment, at a place known as the Rawḍat al-sharīfah, “The Noble Garden,” near the minbar from which he used to address the faithful. In spite of the many reshapings for restoration and enlargement carried out in the course of centuries, the Jāmiʿ Nabawī (Mosque of the Prophet) is still considered the second most sacred—after the Kaʿbah—religious monument of Islam, the one where it is possible to pay a pious visit (ziyārah) to the tomb of the last prophet whom God had chosen, among all people, to receive and proclaim His sublime last message to humanity.

The Prophet’s Mosque, classified by orientalists as belonging to a group called “Arab” (because it was built by Arabs with their local methods and materials) or “hypostyle” (because of the rows of columns that divided the space and supported the ceilings), has played an essential role in the development of Islamic architecture. Its layout has been adopted for the construction of a long series of celebrated monuments, starting with the Mosque of ʿAmr, built in Fusṭāṭ (Cairo) in 22/643 as a replica of the Prophet’s Mosque; however, in the later mosque the palm-tree trunks supporting the roof were replaced by columns and, for the first time, a square minaret (manār), possibly inspired by the steeples of the Christian churches of northern Syria, was annexed to the ʿāhn. Among the other mosques of the same type erected during the Umayyad caliphate (41–132/660–750), some are well preserved and still in use today. Among them are the Great Mosque of Qayrawān, founded by ʿUqbah ibn Nāfiʿ in 50/670 and finely restructured in 200–249/816–63; Jāmiʿ al-Aqṣā of Jerusalem (83/702); and Jāmiʿ al-Umawī of Damascus (86/705). Mention must also be made, for their historical importance and architectural characteristics, of the Great Mosque of Cordoba, founded in 137/755 and subsequently extended three times, the Great Mosque of Sāmarrā (231–37/846–52), and the mosques of Ibn Ṭulūn (262/876), al-Azhar (362/973), and al-Ḥākim (381/991) in Cairo.\(^\text{15}\)

Although quite different structurally from the Holy Kaʿbah, which in the Quran (22:26) is called Bayt Allāh (“the House of God”), the Prophet’s Mosque, which his followers in Madinah called Bayt al-Nabī (“the House of the Prophet”), has been the object of almost the same kind of veneration as the Bayt Allāh. This comes from the fact that both “Houses” share the same characteristic: each is a sacred space, a haram, with special status deriving from the pact sealed between God and one of His faithful servants, in the first case the prophet Abraham and in the second the Prophet Muhammad. In Madinah, holy protection was bestowed upon the mosque built at the place and with the layout fixed by Providence, so that during the decade between the first year of the hijrah (AD 622) and the departure of the Prophet Muhammad from this world all of the doctrinal and practical content of the Islamic religion could be revealed, commented on, and applied by members of the newly constituted Muslim community; the Mosque of the Prophet served as the primary center for all these aspects of the nascent Muslim society. As expressed by a connoisseur of Islamic civilization: “The Prophet’s house-mosque became the context as well as the core of his communal tradition. In spite of its successive physical transformations well beyond its original simplicity, it acquired an archetypal stature as a mental model of social behavior and architectural imagination.”\(^\text{16}\)

The haram ideal has been so strong that it has had a major influence on the physical and social development of Islamic cities. Made conscious of their state of estrangement from the Divine Presence by the severe teachings of the Quran, Muslims have realized that the protection offered by the Prophet’s Mosque was largely due to its specific, compact architectural layout inspired by him and that this could be extended to other components of the urban environment. Hence the quasi-systematic preference given to the “internal courtyard” system of construction for the private houses, mosques, and the majority of buildings in general in the classical cities of the Islamic world.

Seen from the air or surrounding hills, the Islamic city is easily recognizable by its appearance as a cellular conglomerate. Each cell comprises a square or rectangular structure surrounding a courtyard onto which open the living quarters of houses, the workshops and storerooms of bazaars and caravanserais, the rooms of religious colleges (madrasahs), or the galleries and prayer halls of mosques. Even though they may be of different sizes according to their functions, these quadrangular cells give the urban canvas a homogeneity akin to that of a biological organism, as it is formed from similar and compatible elements able to multiply and interweave without undue interference as the city develops. In fact, the classical Islamic city is a haram, a sacred place for its occupants, just as every mosque is a haram, and just as every family house, folded in on itself, closed to the exterior and open to the courtyard and the sky, is also a haram, a sanctuary where the father officiates as an imām and the mother as an unchallenged mistress of domestic life.

A Gift of Synthesis

When Muslim crafts workers who had moved from Arabia and settled in parts of the Near and Middle East were called to participate in the expansion and embellishment of recently conquered cities, they came across and had to assimilate techniques and materials that were previously unknown to them. Their ability to adopt and even perfect building and decorative techniques and forms from other civilizations may be attributed to an intuitive feeling that many of these “novelties” were quite compatible with their own ancestral customs and Islamic cultural heritage. In other words, they perceived these creations as blessed gifts issuing from the inexhaustible reservoir of traditional Wisdom provided by the Lord, Who provides for whomsoever He will without reckoning (e.g., 2:212). Among the significant elements borrowed from previous cultures, one may note:

1. Architectural components such as the Byzantine dome, a reminder of “the world above us,” and the Sassanid arch, a universal symbol for the intimate relationship between Heaven and earth.

2. Urban planning concepts, such as the arrangement of the Roman castrum with its two perpendicular axes or the composition of the Persian garden.

3. Structural and decorative features and motifs, including the Roman niche, originally made to shelter the statue of a god or hero and converted by Muslims to the mihrāb, a reminder of the right orientation for prayer; the Persian muqarnas, often described as a stalactite or beehive; and Coptic geometric and linear patterns, which have been cleverly integrated into “arabesques” by generations of artisans.⁷
A Perpetual Source of Inspiration

This brief look at the history of Islamic art brings us back to the heart of our subject and leads us to consider the specifically Quranic origin of some of the great themes that have continually caught the attention of artisans, who have translated them from the world of ideals into the concrete language of forms. A first example is the Light Verse (āyat al-nūr, 24:35), which celebrates the radiance (tajallī) of God over the whole universe and proposes for meditation the simile of a lamp in a niche, lit by the oil of a blessed tree. This verse has inspired not only the generations of crafts workers who have built and decorated the splendid miḥrābs that can still be admired today from the far west (Cordoba, Fez) to the extreme east (Isfahan, Delhi) of dār al-islām (“the Abode of Islam”), but also the artisans who have wrought various metals to furnish mosques, palaces, and simple houses with fine chandeliers, lamps, and candlesticks and who have applied the highly symbolic image of the miḥrāb—an arcade with a lamp hanging from its apex—to ornament wood and ceramic panels, mural tapestries, and prayer carpets.

Another source of inexhaustible creativity has been the verse in which God says of Himself, We made every living thing from water (21:30). Whereas the primordial water, the materia prima (“first material”) of the creation, which the Bible designates as “the waters that were above the dome” (Genesis 1:7), cannot be represented by any artistic process, the lower waters, which lay under the dome and which the Quran designates by the sole word water, deserve the attention of artists. A gift of God indispensable for the material and spiritual life of every human being, the earthly water is common property, and every ruler or group leader has the obligation to ensure its equitable distribution among all members of the community. This explains the remarkable degree of development achieved in all Muslim countries with hydraulic works found in the countryside and city alike: irrigation canals and pools, waterwheels and aqueducts, and public fountains, not to mention the facilities needed for ritual purification in the form of baths (ḥammāms), latrines, and ablution basins.

Water symbolizes beauty, joy, and plenitude, and in patrician and princely gardens it flows and sings continuously. When it is not actually present, because of unfavorable climatic or housing conditions, an effort is made to at least suggest its existence by some evocative means like a cruciform design on the pavement of the inner courtyard recalling the four rivers flowing in Paradise or an orderly arrangement of plant and flower pots simulating the outline of a riyāḍ, the classical closed garden with its partitioned borders and beds of vegetation.

In Arabic, the word jannah, which often appears in the Quran, may be used to designate an earthly or a heavenly garden, and for Muslims, especially in semi-arid countries, any garden, whether modest or richly arranged, allows the imagination a precursory sense of the joys that await the elect in their happy Abode. Processes and devices capable of enhancing this connection have been carefully selected and successfully applied throughout the centuries by the master gardeners of Islam. They include the planting of trees that have great longevity, like yews and cypresses, or bear the fruits of Paradise, like the dates and pomegranates mentioned in Quranic descriptions of the heavenly Garden; the choice of flowers whose fragrance is suggestive of an immaterial beatitude; the use of water mirrors, which produce an inverted image of earthly things and therefore consciousness of their impermanence; and the setting up of pleasant dwellings analogous to those reserved for the companions of Heaven in the form of pergolas, pavilions, and tents woven out of sumptuous brocades. To make sure that hearing, like the other senses, received its full part of joy in this place of delight, landscape architects working in the Shalamar Garden of Lahore (1641) caused water to zigzag upon marble grids and cascade before running into marble basins, so that the murmur of the stream may sweetly accompany the cooing of the doves.

We will now look at two testimonies illustrating the very close relationship between Muslim artists’ work and their thoughts and feelings concerning religion. In fact, this relationship is always harmonious, based on the faith in the one true God, the Merciful and Compassionate, and on a full confidence in His Wisdom. After the exposition of some theoretical and historical foundations of the art of Islam, some reflections based on the experience of artists may offer a welcome confirmation of the high value of Islamic art as an instrument of spiritual elevation.

The first testimony is an account that comes from Titus Burckhardt, who relates his visit to an old comb maker in the historic city of Fez, where he watched him detaching the horns from the skulls of oxen, splitting them, opening them out over a flame, and filing each tooth of the comb with the greatest of care. The craftsman said to him:

My work may seem crude to you, but it needs a sixth sense which I cannot describe in words. I only realized it myself after many years and, even if I wanted to, I could not teach it directly to my own son if he was not already capable of seeing it for himself. It is a trade which goes back from apprentice to master as far as to our lord Seth, who was the first to teach it to men. What comes from a prophet—for Seth was a prophet—is always remarkably profitable, both outwardly and inwardly. What I gradually came to realize is that nothing is done randomly in this trade. In every movement or gesture of the hand, there is a modicum of wisdom. Not everybody understands this. But, even so, it is stupid and indefensible to deprive people of the heritage of the prophets by sitting them in front of machines where, day after day, they are required to carry out meaningless tasks.\(^{18}\)

In the second case, a researcher who was conducting a survey among those specializing in decorative arts interviewed a painter who had just decorated two wall panels in a local house. He questioned him about the way in which Muslim artisans in Malaysia are inspired by the local flora, and the painter responded:

In the oval at the center of the first panel is the name of the Prophet’s father-in-law and the first Muslim caliph, Abū Bakr. The second oval is blank, because it represents the existence of the one and only God, whose Essence cannot be observed with the human eye. The endless cable pattern of intertwined lines around the ovals expresses the infinite existence of the Omnipotent, who is without beginning or end. All creation emanates from Him, its beginning represented by a bulb or seed and its end by a shoot, a flower, or a bud. The occupant of the house is therefore constantly reminded of the omnipresence of God and of the inevitable destiny of mankind.\(^{19}\)
In presenting itself as the final revelation of the Judeo-Christian-Islamic tradition, the Quran recounts the stories of prophets from Adam to Muhammad, encapsulating much of the sacred history that precedes it. According to the Quran, prophets have been sent at different times to all human collectivities with revelations in different tongues, but their message was one: lā ilāha illa’Llāh—there is no god but God. From this perspective, the history of humanity is a history of forgetting and being reminded again and again of this eternal truth. Hence the trials, triumphs, defeats, and rebellions confronted by the prophets of old are not told with a view to historicity in the modern sense. Rather, the history related in the Quran tells the story of the epic struggle between truth and falsehood or good and evil that takes place among peoples and within each individual’s soul. From a Quranic perspective, the principles that govern the cosmos also determine the reality of the human microcosm, and just as the Will of God has shaped the destiny of humanity, so too does it shape the life of every individual human being.

Presenting itself as the culmination of all revelation, the Quran expands upon the theme of religious continuity more extensively than previous revelations. The unity of revelation as such is implicit throughout the Quran, but many verses make it explicit. In one, Jesus tells his disciples, [I come] confirming that which was before me, the Torah, and to make lawful unto you part of that which was forbidden unto you (3:50). In this vein, the Quran presents itself as a Book sent down after Moses, confirming what came before it, guiding to the truth and to a straight road (46:30). From a Quranic perspective, every prophet has confirmed what the previous prophets brought, which is first and foremost an essential message of Divine Unity (tawḥīd); thus the Prophet is told, And We sent no messenger before thee, save that We revealed unto him, “Verily, there is no god but I; so worship Me!” (21:25). Other prophets are also presented as saying to their communities, O my people! Worship God! You have no god other than Him (7:59, 65, 73, 85). Since every prophet is believed to have been sent with this same essential message, the Quran commands Muslims to believe in all of them:

> Say, “We believe in God, and in that which was sent down unto us, and in that which was sent down unto Abraham, Ishmael, Isaac, Jacob, and the Tribes, and in what Moses and Jesus were given, and in what the prophets were given from their Lord. We make no distinction among any of them, and unto Him we submit.” (2:136; cf. 3:84)

Each phase of the Abrahamic tradition, and implicit other religious traditions, can thus be seen as the continuation of a single stream of revelation beginning with Adam and ending with the Prophet Muhammad. The forms of the message change, since God has sent no messenger, save in the language of his people, that he might make clear unto them (14:4). But the content remains the same, for the Word of thy Lord is fulfilled in truth and justice. None alters His Words (6:115; cf. 6:34, 10:64, 18:27). Accordingly, the Quran declares of itself:

> Truly it is a revelation of the Lord of the worlds, brought down by the Trustworthy Spirit upon thine (Muhammad’s) heart—that thou mayest be among the warners—in a clear, Arabic tongue. It is indeed in the scriptures (zubur) of those of old. (26:192–96)

Another passage reads, Truly this (message) is in the scriptures of old, the scriptures of Abraham and Moses (87:18–19).

Confirming the underlying unity to which such verses allude, the Prophet Muhammad is reported to have said, “The prophets are half brothers; their mothers differ, and their religion (dīn) is one.” Thus, like David, Jesus, and other prophets before them, the Prophet Muhammad was not sent to destroy previous religions, but to reaffirm their essential content. From this perspective, each revelation is a formal manifestation of an eternal formless truth. The variegated religious forms do not contravene the validity and efficacy of one another, but are part of a test that human beings confront in this world, a test emphasized in 5:48:
For each among you We have appointed a law and a way. And had God willed, He would have made you one community, but [He willed otherwise], that He might try you in that which He has given you. So vie with one another in good deeds. Unto God shall be your return all together, and He will inform you of that wherein you differ. (emphasis added)

From a Quranic perspective, there are thus different ways of revering and worshipping God for different human communities. God has not revealed one law, but many laws, and to each law corresponds a particular path that is based upon the performance of rites particular to that form of worship:

For every community We have appointed a rite they are to perform; so let them not argue with thee over the matter. And call to thy Lord. Truly thou art following a straight guidance. And if they dispute with thee, say, “God knows best what you do. God will judge between you on the Day of Resurrection concerning that wherein you used to differ.” (22:67–69)

Other verses reiterate that the Quran confirms previous revelations and even religions (e.g., 2:97; 3:3; 10:37; 35:31; 46:30).5

The notion that previous scriptures have been abrogated in the sense of being nullified or excessively distorted to such an extent that their message no longer reflects the particularity of the original teachings, as some Muslims maintain,6 would seem to be contradicted by verses such as 5:43: And how is it that they come to thee for judgment, when they have the Torah, wherein is God’s Judgment? and 5:68: Say, “O People of the Book! You stand on naught till you observe the Torah and the Gospel, and that which has been sent down unto you from your Lord.” In this same vein, 5:47 says of Christians: Let the people of the Gospel judge by that which God has sent down therein. It would be contradictory for the Quran to speak of the efficacy of judging by the Torah and the Gospel if it were to also maintain that these scriptures have been abrogated or excessively distorted. It would also make little sense to say that the religions in which these scriptures are applicable are defunct, or were defunct at the time the Quran was revealed, for it is the methodologies developed within the religions that would provide their followers with the ability to judge in accord with them. If previous religions were abrogated by the revelation of the Quran, it would be implausible to tell the Prophet Muhammad to seek their counsel when it says, Ask the people of the Reminder, if you know not (16:43; cf. 21:7).⁷

Modes of prayer derived from their scriptures would also be of little benefit and would have little or no soteriological efficacy, a position that would stand in direct contrast to 48:29, which likens the prayers of Jews and Christians to those of Muslims:

\[
\text{Muhammad is the Messenger of God. Those who are with him are harsh against the disbelievers, merciful to one another. You see them bowing, prostrating, seeking bounty from God and contentment; their mark upon their faces is from the effect of prostration. That is their likeness in the Torah. And their likeness in the Gospel is a sapling that puts forth its shoot and strengthens it, such that it grows stout and rises firmly upon its stalk, impressing the sowers, that through them He may enrage the disbelievers. God has promised forgiveness and a great reward to those among them who believe and perform righteous deeds.}

Religious Form

According to the Quran, every religion entails prayer, fasting, and almsgiving, among other obligations, though the specific forms differ. The Quranic understanding of such differences in creed and practice is stated in 49:13:

\[
O \text{ mankind! Truly We created you from a male and a female, and We made you peoples and tribes that you may come to know one another. Surely the most noble of you before God are the most reverent of you.}
\]

That the most noble are the most reverent emphasizes the preeminent importance of reverence or taqwā, an all-encompassing awareness of the Divine Reality, rather than the simple fact of following a particular creed or forms of practice.

This does not mean that people are free to invent new creeds, laws, and ways. Rather, it indicates that God has revealed many ways and many religions for humanity. The fact that other people have been given different creeds and rites for remembering and worshipping God thus provides a means by which one can look beyond outward differences and value people for what the Quran considers to be most important—the degree of their reverence and piety toward God. In this vein the Quran chastises those who equate outward deeds with faith itself: Do you consider giving drink to the pilgrims and maintaining the Sacred Mosque to be like those who believe in God and the Last Day and strive in God’s way? (9:19). Such hypocrisy implies a grave lack of discernment and is a mark of failing the test to which allusion is made in 5:48.

Like the Bible, many verses of the Quran condemn those who fail to adhere to the teachings of previous prophets. But these concern those who falsify religion by submitting it to human desires, not those who follow religion by submitting their desires to God. Therefore, those who continue to submit to the ways ordained by former prophets are praised:

> Truly those who believe, and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabeans—whosoever believes in God and the Last Day and works righteousness shall have their reward with their Lord. No fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve. (2:62; cf. 5:69)

The broad applicability of this verse is confirmed by Muḥammad ibn Jaʿrīr al-Ṭabarī (d. 310/923), the dean of Quranic commentators, who writes: “As regards the bestowal of reward for virtuous action with faith, God has not singled out some of His creatures as opposed to others.” He then relates the view of others that “those who believe among this community [i.e., Muslims], and those who are Christians, Jews, and Sabeans—those among the Jews, Christians, and Sabeans who believe in God and the Last Day—they shall have their reward with their Lord. No fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve.” The Quran thus says of those who follow the previous revelations:

> Among the People of the Book is an upright community who recite God’s signs in the watches of the night, while they prostrate. They believe in God and the Last Day, enjoin right and forbid wrong, and hasten unto good deeds. And they are among the righteous. Whatsoever good they do, they will not be denied it. (3:113–15)
The Covenant

As in the Bible, the Quranic view of human history is one of people being called time and again to observe a covenant with God. The Quran honors the covenant made by God with previous religious communities, though each is seen as but one manifestation of a pre-eternal covenant that God made with all of humanity when they were still in Adam’s loins: And when thy Lord took from the Children of Adam, from their loins, their progeny and made them bear witness concerning themselves, “Am I not your Lord?” they said, “Yea, we bear witness” (7:172). Though reminiscent of God’s Promise to the Israelites in Exodus, this verse refers to existence before creation, when the spirits of all human beings are said to have been assembled before God. Am I not your Lord? is a rhetorical question whereby God affirms His principal Reality as the Lord of all that is on earth and in Heaven. And the human response is the everlasting affirmation of this covenant. Every covenant made while human beings are on earth is thus a recognition, renewal, and continuation of this pretemporal covenant. From this perspective, the history of religion is a multifaceted series of temporal reassertions of a single pretemporal covenant.

The next verses reveal that God has reminded human beings of this pretemporal covenant through the various prophets, so that no human beings can claim that they are not responsible for observing it:

Lest you should say on the Day of Resurrection, “Truly of this we were heedless,” or lest you should say, “[It is] only that our fathers ascribed partners unto God aforetime, and we were their progeny after them. Wilt Thou destroy us for that which the falsifiers have done?” (7:172–73)

Seen in this light, all of humanity bears the imprint of the pretemporal covenant within. The functions of revelation and prophecy are to reawaken the awareness of this imprint and remind all people that they must observe the covenant with God. Hence every human collectivity has been sent a reminder: We indeed sent a messenger unto every community (16:36). This is reinforced by 10:47: For every community there is a messenger, and when their messenger comes, judgment shall be rendered between them with justice, and they will not be wronged. The Quran mentions a handful of these messengers by name, yet also alludes to the existence of others:
Verily We have revealed unto thee, as We revealed unto Noah and the prophets after him, and as We revealed unto Abraham and Ishmael and Isaac and Jacob and the Tribes, and Jesus and Job and Jonah and Aaron and Solomon, and unto David We gave the Psalms, and messengers We have recounted unto thee before, and messengers We have not recounted unto thee; and unto Moses God spoke directly, messengers as bearers of glad tidings and as warners, that mankind might have no argument against God after the messengers. And God is Mighty, Wise. (4:163–65)

According to Islamic tradition, the messengers not recounted in the Quran are far more numerous than those recounted; the Prophet Muhammad is reported to have stated that there have been 315 messengers in human history and 124,000 prophets.14

Presented as a continuation of the Abrahamic line of prophecy, the Quran confirms explicitly the covenant that God made with previous communities through the revelations to His messengers. But whereas the New Testament claims to establish a new covenant that supplants the covenant between God and the Israelites, the Quran seeks to reaffirm the essential substance that is at the heart of every covenant. As the Prophet Muhammad is considered to be the Seal of the Prophets (khātam al-nabiyyīn; 33:40), it is believed that he completed the prophetic cycle, but brought nothing concerning tawḥīd that was not brought by the preceding prophets in one form or another. As a verse addressed to the Prophet Muhammad proclaims, Naught has been said unto thee save that which has been said unto the messengers before thee (41:43; see also 26:192–96; 87:18–19, cited above).

This line of prophecy does not begin with Abraham as in the Bible; rather, according to the Quran it is said to begin with Adam, the first of all prophets and the first with whom God made a covenant: And We indeed made a pact with Adam aforetime, but he forgot. And We found no resoluteness in him (20:115). Hence the cyclical drama of receiving, forgetting, breaking, and renewing the covenant, which is a central theme of the Bible, begins in the Quran with the first human being. The whole of the human drama is in fact encapsulated in the life of Adam himself.

The Quran thus gives a different account of Adam’s fall than does the Bible. Here Adam is not tempted through Eve; rather, Adam and Eve are both tempted by Satan, and both are responsible for the fall from the paradisal Garden (7:19–22). Because of their transgression, the progeny of Adam and Eve are banished to the earth: Then Satan made them stumble therefrom, and expelled them from that wherein they were, and We said, “Get you [all] down, each of you an enemy to the other. On the earth a dwelling place and enjoyment shall be yours, for a time” (2:36; cf. 7:24). This descent, each an enemy to the other, represents the consequence of forgetting and breaking the covenant. But unlike in the Biblical account, in the Quran Adam and Eve repent for their sin: They said, “Our Lord! We have wronged ourselves. If Thou dost not forgive us and have mercy upon us, we shall surely be among the losers” (7:23). Then God relents and renews the covenant by offering words of revelation:

Then Adam received words from his Lord, and He relented unto him. Indeed, He is the Relenting, the Merciful. We said, “Get down from it, all of you. If Guidance should come to you from Me, then whosoever follows My Guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve.” (2:37–38)

These words received by Adam mark the beginning of the cycle of revelation, for before falling from grace Adam and Eve were in no need of words to remind them of the pretemporal covenant. But having forgotten, human beings are in need of periodic revelations to remind them of their true nature and help them return to it.

The Primordial Norm

Seen in this light, the underlying substance of the human condition is the Adamic nature before the fall, a nature by virtue of which one is ever aware of the pretemporal covenant with God. In the Quran this nature is referred to as the fiṭrah, the primordial norm. It is to bring human beings back to this primordial norm, this inherent equilibrium, that all religions are fashioned. But over time, human beings lose sight of this reality and read their prejudices and predilections into religion.16 Religions then come to be regarded as absolute in and of themselves rather than as paths to the Absolute. In reference to such devolution the Prophet Muhammad is reported to have said, “Every child is born according to the fiṭrah. Then the parents make the child a Christian, a Jew, or a Zoroastrian.”

This does not mean that all previous religions are deviant in principle. Rather, it implies that insofar as religions that have decayed or been corrupted by human beings are concerned, they no longer serve to bring about the basic equilibrium through submission that all prophets have practiced and taught. According to Muslim belief, all people continue to be born into the fitrah and, when not corrupted, each faith provides the means by which one can live in accord with this fundamental human disposition and thus renew and maintain the pretemporal, primordial covenant. Accordingly, the Quran enjoins:

Set thy face to religion as a ḥanīf, in the primordial nature from God upon which He originated mankind—there is no altering the creation of God; that is the upright religion, but most of mankind know not—turning unto Him. And reverence Him and perform the prayer; and be not among the idolaters. (30:30–31)

Here the word ḥanīf refers to a pure believer who is fully devoted to God in His Oneness and is thus unswayed by the false constructions of belief of those around him. To be a ḥanīf is thus to be a pure monotheist, to have pure unswerving faith and hence to live in conformity with the primordial norm according to which all human beings have been created. One cannot change this underlying nature, because there is no altering the creation of God. To accept this truth and live in accord with one’s fundamental primordial nature is thus considered to be the foundation and substance of true worship.

Reminding human beings that blind adherence to a particular religious form is not the ultimate goal of religious practice, the Quran says, The most noble of you before God are the most reverent of you (49:13). Such nobility, reverence, piety, and devotion are expressed in the quality of submission attributed to the prophet Abraham: And who is better in religion than one who submits his face to God, and is virtuous, and follows the creed of Abraham, as a ḥanīf? (4:125). The Quran thus enjoins, Set thy face toward the religion as a ḥanīf, and be thou not among the idolaters (10:105; cf. 22:31, 30:30), and chastises all who fail to adhere to the way of Abraham: And who shuns the creed of Abraham, but a foolish soul? We chose him in the world and in the Hereafter he shall be among the righteous (2:130).

Abraham was not chosen because he followed a particular creed and practice, but because he submitted himself entirely to God: When his Lord said to him, “Submit!” he said, “I submit to the Lord of the worlds” (2:131). In this way, the fundamental reality of submission cannot be confined to any single form; rather, universal, nonsectarian submission is the sine qua non for observing God’s covenant and preexists the religion that takes the name “submission”—islām. For both Muslims and non-Muslims today, islām is taken as a reference to the reified religion of those who follow Muhammad. But its original Quranic usage refers to the submission of all human beings to God and the attitude of submission that is believed to be inherent in true faith. This universal, presectarian submission is presented throughout the Quran as the quintessence of all religions. In many different verses, the prophets Noah, Abraham, Jacob, Isaac, Ishmael, and Joseph all refer to themselves or are referred to as submitters (muslims) or pray to God to make them true submitters.22

Each prophet observes the universal submission to which the story of Abraham alludes, but he simultaneously brings a specific form of submission with particular laws and rites. Though relative in and of themselves, the forms contain and convey something of the Absolute. Thus, as a reassertion of the pretemporal covenant, each form partakes of the same substance, but as a form it excludes others, for it is the nature of form to exclude other forms. Although most religious authorities deny other religious forms in order to safeguard the sanctity of one form, the Quran opposes the tendency to make one single form of submission—one way of observing the covenant—absolute in and of itself. In this way it safeguards both the Immutable Absolute, which each religion seeks to convey, and the Transcendent Infinite, to which the multiplicity of revelation bears witness. Therefore, the Quran criticizes those who claim Abraham and other prophets for themselves exclusively:

Or say you that Abraham, Ishmael, Isaac, Jacob, and the Tribes were Jews or Christians? Say, “Do you know better, or does God?” And who does greater wrong than one who conceals a testimony he has from God? God is not heedless of what you do. (2:140)

Rather than being described as a Jew or Christian, Abraham is again portrayed as a ḥanīf:
O People of the Book! Why do you dispute concerning Abraham, as neither the Torah nor the Gospel was sent down until after him? Do you not understand? Behold! You are the very same who dispute concerning that of which you have knowledge; so why do you dispute concerning that of which you have no knowledge? God knows, and you know not. Abraham was neither Jew nor Christian, but rather was a ḥanīf, a submitter (Muslim), and he was not one of the idolaters. (3:65–67, emphasis added)

At first blush, such verses may appear to reject Judaism and Christianity in favor of Islam, but these and many similar verses can also be read as an affirmation of all forms of submission—that is, of all revealed religions. The Quran never declares that the covenant as observed by previous religious communities has been abrogated or rendered obsolete. Rather, it reaffirms the covenant of those who came before, enjoins all people to follow the way that precedes sectarian associations—the way of Abraham: Say, “God has spoken true. So follow the creed of Abraham, a ḥanīf, and he was not of the idolaters” (3:95)—and warns believers not to differentiate between God’s prophets: He has prescribed for you as religion that which He enjoined upon Noah, and that which We revealed unto thee, and that which We enjoined upon Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, that you uphold religion and not become divided therein (42:13).

The Jewish Covenant in the Quran

From a Quranic perspective, nothing could be greater than the fundamental difference between those who observe the covenant with God and those who break it. This essential demarcation is outlined in the following passage:

Is one who knows that what has been sent down unto thee from thy Lord is the truth like one who is blind? Only those who possess intellect reflect, who fulfill the pact with God and break not the covenant, who join what God has commanded be joined, fear their Lord, and dread an evil reckoning, and who are patient, seeking the Face of their Lord, perform the prayer, and spend from that which We have provided them, secretly and openly, and repel evil with good. For them there shall be the reward of the Abode—Gardens of Eden that they shall enter along with those who were righteous from among their fathers, their spouses, and their progeny; and angels shall enter upon them from every gate. “Peace be upon you because you were patient.” How excellent is the Ultimate Abode! And for those who break God’s pact after accepting His covenant, and sever what God has commanded be joined, and work corruption upon the earth, it is they who shall have the curse, and theirs shall be the evil abode. (13:19–25)

According to this passage all religious communities are to be judged by the extent to which they have been able to persist in observing the covenant with God.

Many instances of the word “covenant” in the Quran thus refer to the specific covenant made with the Children of Israel:

And We raised the Mount over them,24 at [the making of] their covenant, and We said to them, “Enter the gate, prostrating,” and We said to them, “Do not transgress the Sabbath.” And We made with them a solemn covenant. (4:154)

God had made a covenant with the Children of Israel, and We raised among them twelve chieftains. And God said, “I am with you!” Surely, if you perform the prayer, and give the alms and believe in My messengers and support them, and lend unto God a goodly loan, I shall surely absolve you of your evil deeds, and shall cause you to enter Gardens watered by flowing streams. But whosoever among you disbelieves thereafter, surely he has strayed from the right way. (5:12)

Like many passages of the Bible, verses such as these call for a return to the covenant that God has made with His “chosen people” and promise that if they keep the covenant, God will keep the covenant: O Children of Israel! Remember My Blessing which I bestowed upon you, and fulfill My covenant, and I shall fulfill your covenant (2:40). Yet such verses also serve as a warning of what will befall those who do not observe the covenant, for there has been no community but that a warner has passed among them (35:24). Approximately one-third of the Quran is in fact a retelling of the challenges faced by previous prophets when they tried to deliver God’s message.\textsuperscript{25} Moses’ epic struggle with Pharaoh and with his own people is the most featured narrative, appearing in at least ten passages and alluded to in many others.\textsuperscript{26}

The basic outline of Moses’ life in the Quran is the same as that of the Bible, with minor variations that reflect other aspects of his prophetic mission.\textsuperscript{27} As in the Bible, this mission begins at the age of forty, when he encounters the burning bush and he and his brother, Aaron, are ordered:

\begin{quote}
“Go, both of you, unto Pharaoh! Truly he has rebelled! Yet speak unto him gently, that haply he may remember or have fear.” They said, “Our Lord! Truly we fear that he will deal hastily with us, or that he will transgress.” He said, “Fear not! Truly I am with ye twain; I hear and I see. So come unto him and say, ‘Truly we are two messengers of your Lord. So send forth with us the Children of Israel and punish them not.’” (20:43–47)
\end{quote}

This initial warning is followed by many afflictions until Pharaoh releases the Israelites, who are acknowledged as the “chosen people” whom God has favored over others (2:47, 122; 45:16). On their journey to the promised land, Moses is called to Mt. Sinai, where he stays for forty days; he returns to find that the people have taken to worshipping the golden calf, thus forsaking all that had been ordained and breaking the covenant with God. Unlike in the Biblical account, however, in the Quran Aaron is not blamed for this transgression. Instead, it is a man referred to as “the Samaritan” (\textit{al-Sāmirī}) who tells the people, \textit{This is your god and the god of Moses, though he has forgotten} (20:88). Moses becomes infuriated and casts down the tablets given to him by God (7:150); he then returns to the mountain and receives a new set of tablets.

Upon reaching the promised land, the Israelites again disobey Moses because they fear its inhabitants:

\begin{quote}
“O my people! Enter the Holy Land, which God has prescribed for you, and do not turn back, or you shall become losers.” They said, “O Moses! In this land are a domineering people. We shall not enter it till they leave it. But if they leave it, we shall enter.” Two men whom God had blessed among those who feared [Him] said, “Enter in upon them by the gate, for once you have entered it, you will be victors. And trust in God, if you are believers.” They said, “O Moses! We shall never enter it, so long as they remain therein. So go forth, thou and thy Lord, and fight! We shall sit here.” (5:21–24)

For their intransigence the Israelites are banished from entering the promised land for forty years: Then verily it shall be forbidden them for forty years, while they shall wander on the earth. So grieve not for the iniquitous people (5:26).

Unlike in the Bible, the fate of Moses after this event is never made known in the Quran. The Israelites are, however, referred to in several verses that illustrate God’s continuing efforts to guide them. Such Quranic accounts reflect the Biblical lament: “They have transgressed laws, violated the statutes, broken the everlasting covenant” (Isaiah 24:5), but also that

He is mindful of His covenant forever, of the word that He commanded, for a thousand generations, the covenant that He made with Abraham, and His sworn Promise to Isaac, which he confirmed to Jacob as a statute, to Israel as an everlasting covenant. (Psalm 105:8–10)

The Christian Covenant in the Quran

The Quranic passages cited above reflect those passages from the Bible that speak of the covenant that has been made with previous prophets. Other passages add Jesus and Muhammad to the list of those with whom God has made a covenant: And [remember] when We made with the prophets their covenant, and with thee, and with Noah, Abraham, Moses, and Jesus the son of Mary; We made with them a solemn covenant (33:7). This confirms, as do the Letters of the New Testament, that the new covenant sealed through Jesus’ pact with God is a continuation and universalization of the covenant that had previously been sealed through the pact with Moses and the Children of Israel.

Jesus is referred to in the Quran as a messenger of God and as God’s Word (3:45; 4:171), who is aided by the Holy Spirit (2:87, 253; 5:110). Although he is regarded as the Messiah (al-Masīḥ), he is not referred to as the “Son of God” or as “God incarnate.” Belief in the incarnation of God in Jesus is in fact repudiated in two Quranic verses: They indeed have disbelieved who say, “God is the Messiah, son of Mary” (5:17, 72). The Quran emphasizes that Jesus was not God, but a servant and messenger of God: The Messiah would never disdain to be a servant of God (4:172); The Messiah, son of Mary, was naught but a messenger—messengers have passed away before him. And his mother was truthful. Both of them ate food (5:75).

Despite this emphasis upon his human nature, Jesus is recognized as holding an exalted position in relation to other prophets: Those are the messengers. We have favored some above others. Among them are those to whom God spoke, and some He raised up in ranks. And We gave Jesus son of Mary clear proofs and strengthened him with the Holy Spirit (2:253). The best example of Jesus’ particular distinction among the prophets is the miracle of the virgin birth, to which the Quran attests:

And remember Mary in the Book, when she withdrew from her family to an eastern place. And she veiled herself from them. Then We sent unto her Our Spirit, and it assumed for her the likeness of a perfect man. She said, “I seek refuge from thee in the Compassionate, if you are reverent!” He said, “I am but a messenger of thy Lord, to bestow upon thee a pure boy.” She said, “How shall I have a boy when no man has touched me; nor have I been unchaste?” He said, “Thus shall it be. Thy Lord says, ‘It is easy for Me.’” And [it is thus] that We might make him a sign unto mankind, and a mercy from Us. And it is a matter decreed.” (19:16–21; see also 3:45–47)²⁹

The Prophet Muhammad is said to have confirmed that of all human beings, only Jesus and the Virgin Mary were born without the stain of sin: “There is none born among the offspring of Adam, but that Satan touches it. A child, therefore, cries loudly at the time of its birth because of the touch of Satan, except for Mary and her child.”³⁰

Not only was the birth of Jesus a miracle, but other passages bear witness to a creative life-giving power possessed by Jesus that was not granted to any other prophet:

Truly I have brought you a sign from your Lord. I will create for you out of clay the shape of a bird. Then I will breathe into it, and it will be a bird by God’s leave. And I will heal the blind and the leper and give life to the dead by God’s leave. And I will inform you about what you eat and what you store up in your houses. Truly in that is a sign for you, if you are believers. (3:49; see also 5:110)

Despite these affirmations of Jesus’ Divinely given powers, the concept of the Trinity is criticized in the Quran: And say not “Three.” Refrain! It is better for you. God is only one God; Glory be to Him (4:171). Another verse is more severe, condemning those who claim that God is one of three: They certainly disbelieve, those who say, “Truly God is the third of three,” while there is no god save one God. If they refrain not from what they say, a painful punishment will befall those among them who disbelieved (5:73). This, however, is not a direct condemnation of Christian theology, for trinitarian theology does not make God one of three, but rather speaks of the triune God, Who is both one and three in a manner that transcends human understanding.

And when God said, “O Jesus son of Mary! Didst thou say unto mankind, ‘Take me and my mother as gods apart from God?’” he said, “Glory be to Thee! It is not for me to utter that to which I have no right. Had I said it, Thou wouldst surely have known it. Thou knowest that which is in my self and I know not that which is in Thy Self. Truly it is Thou Who knowest best the things unseen. I said naught to them save that which Thou commanded me: ‘Worship God, my Lord and your Lord.’”

Although there are many correspondences between the stories of Jesus in the Quran and the Gospels, most of the divergences can be understood and even resolved by contextualizing them within the different theological environments in which they arise. It is, however, almost impossible to reconcile the greatest divergence, that between the different accounts of Jesus’ death. Christians maintain that Jesus took on the sins of all humanity and was crucified for their salvation, but the Quran states:

And for their saying, “We slew the Messiah, Jesus son of Mary, the messenger of God”—though they did not slay him, nor did they crucify him, but it appeared so unto them. Those who differ concerning him are in doubt thereof. They have no knowledge of it, but follow only conjecture; they slew him not for certain. But God raised him up unto Himself, and God is Mighty, Wise. (4:157–58, emphasis added)

Most Muslim scholars throughout the centuries up to this day have viewed these verses as a straightforward denial of the crucifixion. They maintain that Jesus was assumed directly into Heaven and that another was crucified in his place. In the exegetical tradition, it is usually suggested that the one who betrayed Jesus was made to appear like him and then made to suffer on the cross. Other exegetes maintain that Jesus was nailed to the cross, but that he only lost consciousness and was then taken down and placed in the tomb.32 There is, however, no direct support for any of these interpretations in the Quran itself or in the sayings of the Prophet Muhammad. One of the most prominent Muslim exegetes, Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210), even states that all of these interpretations “are mutually contradictory and incompatible.”33 The crucifixion is thus one aspect of Jesus’ mission regarding which Muslims and Christians may not be able to find common ground. Nonetheless, both agree that God raised him up unto Himself (4:158), and that those who follow Jesus are favored by God over those who do not, as God said, O Jesus, I shall take thee and raise thee unto Me, and purify thee of those who disbelieved, and place those who followed thee above those who disbelieved, until the Day of Resurrection (3:55).

The fundamental difference between the Islamic and Christian understandings of Jesus is that Islam follows the Quran in always seeking to reaffirm the transcendence of the Divine by focusing upon Jesus’ humanity, whereas traditional Christian theology presupposes his divinity, while confirming his humanity. This derives from the different nature of each religious tradition. Islam focuses upon the Absolute, Who is one in and of Himself, beyond all else, while Christianity emphasizes the manifestation of the Absolute in Jesus.

These different emphases are reflected in the different religious, historical, and sociological circumstances under which Jesus and the Prophet Muhammad appeared. Jesus came to a mostly Jewish community that was already well versed in the teachings of Abrahamic monotheism and alert to the dangers of idolatry. The Prophet Muhammad arose within a community still under the influence of polytheism and idol worship. The community to which Jesus preached was accused of forgetting the true meaning and purpose of scripture and focusing upon the minutiae of the law instead of the spirit. The community to which the Prophet Muhammad preached was accused of forgetting completely that there was even such a thing as revelation.

Each message thus emphasized different aspects of the Divine Word, while implicitly comprising the whole. The message of the New Testament focuses upon the Presence of the Divine in the person of Jesus. The message that the Prophet Muhammad delivered focuses upon the perennial truth of the Divine Word in the Quran and in all previous revelations. It thus relegates all prophets to a secondary function in relation to the Divine Word Itself through which all scriptures are revealed.

The idea that each revelation is determined by God for the human group destined to receive it is mentioned in 14:4: We have sent no messenger, save in the language of his people, that he might make clear unto them. From this perspective, each revelation necessarily contains in principle the whole of God’s Wisdom, for it is the Divine Word as such. But each revelation also emphasizes different aspects of that Word in accordance with the needs of the human collectivity to which it is sent. Jesus is thus seen as the Word of God Itself (4:171), though he is still a messenger.

Unlike the Gospels and the Letters, the Quran does not declare that the covenant through Jesus supplants the covenant with Abraham or the one with the Children of Israel. The Quran does, however, apply to Christians the Biblical and New Testament condemnations of those who break God’s covenant: And with those who say, “We are Christians,” We made a covenant. Then they forgot a part of that whereof they were reminded (5:14). In this way, the Quran presents itself as part of the unbroken chain of Abrahamic scriptures in which God renews the covenant, only to have it broken by human beings and forgotten time and again. Then, through mercy and love, He relents unto humanity, providing another reminder of the eternal covenant and a new means for observing it. The Quranic covenant is thus a continuation of sacred history presented as both a reaffirmation of the one pretemporal covenant and an extension of the covenant(s) that God made through the Torah and the Gospels. As the Quran states:

Truly God has purchased from the believers their souls and their wealth in exchange for the Garden being theirs. They fight in the way of God, slaying and being slain. [It is] a promise binding upon Him in the Torah, the Gospel, and the Quran. And who is truer to His pact than God? So rejoice in the bargain which you have made. That indeed is the great triumph. (9:111)

The Quran does not reaffirm the covenant because previous religions are deemed invalid, but because those who followed them have forgotten part of their religion:

Then for their breaking of their covenant, We cursed them and hardened their hearts. They distort the meaning of the word, and have forgotten a part of that whereof they were reminded. Thou wilt not cease to discover their treachery, from all save a few of them. So pardon them, and forbear. Truly God loves the virtuous. (5:13)

The Quranic account does not provide the details of the covenant, as found in the Hebrew scriptures and the Gospels. It focuses instead upon the principle of the covenant and how previous communities have forgotten a part of that whereof they were reminded. Indeed, this tendency to neglect a portion of what God has revealed is the drama of religion played out in all of the Abrahamic scriptures. As with the Hebrew prophets, the criticisms the Quran makes of previous religious communities are made with a view to restoring the covenant with individual human beings and with humanity at large. Therefore, the Quran never condemns other revealed religions as such.

When speaking of the deviations committed by previous communities, it even reminds us that a few remain who continue to practice with reverence and piety. It thus promises: As for those who cling to the Book and perform the prayer—surely We neglect not the reward of the workers of righteousness (7:170). Nonetheless, Those who break God’s pact after accepting His covenant, and sever what God has commanded be joined, and work corruption upon the earth, it is they who are the losers (2:27). Thus the Quran implores: Sell not the pact of God for a paltry price. Surely that which is with God is better for you, if you but knew (16:95). Taking this a step further, the Quran even proposes that the reward of the righteous who hold fast to the Book of God is not limited to Muslims alone:

Truly those who believe, and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabeans—whosoever believes in God and the Last Day and works righteousness shall have their reward with their Lord. No fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve.35 (2:62)

Betraying the Covenant

Exchanging or selling God’s covenant, verses, or guidance for a small a price is criticized in several Quranic passages. It connotes a profound lack of discernment that leads one to seek the vain pleasures of this world over and above the joys of the world to come:

Those who sell God’s pact and their oaths for a paltry price, they shall have no share in the Hereafter and God will not speak to them; nor will He look at them on the Day of Resurrection; nor will He purify them. And theirs shall be a painful punishment. (3:77)

Selling the covenant for a small price is thus akin to breaking the covenant and is among the chief transgressions said to have been committed by previous religious communities. The Quran maintains that this is the process that many among all peoples have followed and even implies that many of those to whom the Quran is presented will also confront it:

We did indeed send down to you clear signs, and only the iniquitous disbelieve in them. Is it not that, whenever they make a covenant, a group of them cast it aside? Indeed, most of them do not believe. And when there came to them a messenger from God, confirming that which is with them, a group of those who have been given the Book cast the Book of God behind their backs, as if they know not. (2:99–101)

Such verses indicate that although the outer dictates of the religion may remain, the principles and spiritual guidance they convey may be forgotten. People of different faiths will then fight about the forms, because they have forgotten their inner meanings. But the Quran maintains that a few will, nonetheless, remain truly faithful:

\[
\text{And [remember] when We made a covenant with the Children of Israel, “Worship none but God; be virtuous toward parents, kinsfolk, orphans, and the indigent; and speak to people in a goodly way; and perform the prayer and give the alms.” Then you turned away, save a few of you, swerving aside. (2:83, emphasis added)}

The New Form of the One Covenant

Having established the continuation of the covenant through the history of prophecy, even though it was repeatedly broken and forgotten, the Quran then speaks of the covenant God has made with the followers of Muhammad. As one of the last verses to be revealed states: And remember God’s Blessing upon you, and His covenant by which He bound you, when you said, “We hear and we obey.” And reverence God. Surely God knows what lies within breasts (5:7). Reminiscent of Quranic verses addressed to the Children of Israel, this verse follows an explanation of the manner in which Muslims are to purify themselves for prayer. This alludes to the fact that the specific form of prayer revealed through Muhammad is the means by which Muslims are to observe the covenant, as did Jews through the Temple sacrifice and as did Christians through the sacraments.

The basic practices of Islam, the “five pillars” as they are known—testifying to the Oneness of God, prayer, charity, fasting, and pilgrimage—can thus be seen as means by which human beings return to their primordial nature, the fitrah, where they are ever cognizant of the covenant with God. When observed with sincerity, the rites of Islam, like those of Judaism and Christianity, serve to reintegrate and reorient the dispersed elements of one’s human nature. The rhythm of life thus comes to be fashioned upon the norms that God has ordained for humanity, rather than upon the aberrations that human beings have created for themselves. One is then able to live a life based upon what one has been reminded of through revelation, rather than forgetting a portion of what all humanity has been reminded of and thus forsaking the covenant.
As particular modes of observance, every religion embodies the fullness of the primordial covenant, the religion of the fitrah, which was the religion of Abraham—true devotion and universal submission (islām). But as the covenant is pretemporal, it is in essence not of this world and therefore cannot be confined to one particular manifestation—to one single religion. For this reason, the Quran emphasizes the eternal principles and fundamental practices that transcend the particularity of each covenant in order to reaffirm what it maintains to be the pure essence of all covenants—full submission to God.
Islamic ethical norms and the Islamic view of human rights and social justice are topics deeply misunderstood in the contemporary world. This is due, first, to the fact that discussions of these issues are scattered throughout the Quran, and a full understanding of the Quranic perspective can only be gained by considering the various Quranic statements on this topic as a whole and in relation to one another. Second, the Quran dictates clear rules and laws concerning certain social issues, but it establishes only ethical guidelines and principles of a more general nature regarding others. The impact, or at least the ideal impact, of these more general ethical principles on the character and functioning of Islamic society is often overlooked. Third, Quranic social norms are sometimes assumed to be adequately reflected in the current laws, customs, and practices found in widely differing Islamic countries; this is not always the case, and such an assumption sometimes tends to obscure the perspective of the Quran in its purest form on these issues. Finally and most important, Islamic ethics and social norms are often judged in relation to modern Western notions of ethics and human rights, which in recent centuries have been dominated philosophically by secular and individualistic perspectives and have come, in the last century, to be seen in the West as synonymous with “universal” ethical norms or “universal” standards of human rights. Although Islamic ethical norms have much in common with those of Christianity and other traditional cultures, they also differ profoundly in certain key aspects from the secular formulation of these norms in the contemporary West.

General Quranic Principles Governing Islamic Social Ethics

One can identify five interrelated principles governing Quranic social ethics: The first is the significance of the religious community, or ummah. The Quran envisions the ummah as a collective of individual believers and has nothing explicit to say about the governance of the community or who has the right to authority over it. Although the Quran enjoins believers to obey those in authority among them (4:59), it never specifies the criteria for such authority or the mechanisms by which such an authority should be chosen and exercise power. These matters are discussed to some extent in the Hadīth literature. The Quran does, however, encourage believers to determine their affairs by consultation among themselves (42:38) and even directs the Prophet Muhammad to consult with his followers in certain matters (shāwirhum fī’l-amr; 3:159). Thus, the Quranic conception of the ummah is primarily that of a collective of believing individuals who have moral obligations to the community as a whole and to each of its members as well as to themselves. The good of the whole and the good of the individual are not seen as competing interests that need to be opposed to each other, but as mutually reinforcing concerns. The Quran explicitly states that all believing men and women are protectors (awliyāʾ) of one another (9:71) and thus bear substantial moral responsibility toward fellow believers. Importantly, according to 9:71, both men and women share in this moral responsibility toward fellow believers and the ummah.

Each individual has the duty to uphold the moral standards of the community, and the community has the collective responsibility to enforce these standards. Ideally, the moral health of individuals contributes to the moral health of society, while the moral integrity of society encourages and provides fertile ground for the proper moral and spiritual development of each of its members. This principle can be derived from the Quran’s charge to both individuals and the collective community that they enjoin right and forbid wrong (3:104, 110; 9:71). It is also apparent in the harsh punishments the Quran ordains for crimes considered to be particularly damaging to the spiritual integrity of the community as a whole, such as theft, which undermines respect for property and disregards Divinely ordained means of establishing economic justice (see 5:38), and flagrant sexual offenses that are openly witnessed and thereby undermine the sanctity of the marital bond and the family (see 4:15–16, 25; 24:2–3). That public and corporal punishments are ordained not for private “sins,” but for crimes that represent serious violations of community trust and integrity indicates the graver threat that such public crimes are considered to pose to the moral and physical well-being of the community as a whole.

The second important principle of Quranic social ethics is justice. Concern for the just treatment of all members of society and even other creatures—an emphasis on justice toward those often disadvantaged in society, such as women, orphans, and slaves—is a recurrent theme of Quranic social and ethical statements. The administration of justice in the earthly realm rests largely upon truthful human testimony, which is the duty of each believer before God. The Quran enjoins believers:

\textit{O you who believe! Be steadfast maintainers of justice, witnesses for God, though it be against yourselves, or your parents and kinsfolk, and whether it be someone rich or poor, for God is nearer unto both. So follow not your caprice, that you may act justly. If you distort or turn away, truly God is Aware of whatsoever you do.} (4:135)

The need for truthful testimony must override all personal concerns, including those for oneself and one’s family, something that seems to stand in contradiction to the right of individuals in the United States, for example, to refuse to testify against themselves or their spouses to avoid self-incrimination. In the Quran, the administration of justice in society outweighs the right to self-protection. Both concealing testimony (2:283) and bearing false witness are considered serious sins, and the Quran specifies the harsh punishment of eighty lashes for all false or unsubstantiated accusations of sexual misconduct made against women in particular (24:4–5). In establishing this strong sanction, the Quran is concerned with several matters: (1) avoiding malicious and thoughtless slander that creates suspicion and weakens family and social trust; (2) limiting frivolous and/or disturbing public accusations by allowing only those that are supported by substantial evidence; and (3) protecting those members of society, namely women, who might be most unjustly vulnerable to such slander.\textsuperscript{2}

Administering justice and upholding moral standards are fundamental obligations for the community, but so too is the maintenance of social harmony and peaceful relations among its members—the third important principle of Islamic social ethics. The Quranic concern with maintaining harmonious relations within the community and settling disputes as quickly and amicably as possible can be seen in a number of Quranic prescriptions. For example, married couples who are unable to resolve their disputes are encouraged to involve their respective family members in the attempt to reconcile their differences and avoid divorce (4:35); a man wishing to divorce his wife should attempt reconciliation twice, with periods of separation in between, before finalizing the divorce (2:226–29); and should a divorce occur, the couple is encouraged to separate with mutual respect and without hostility (2:231).

Similarly, the Quran recommends that when a dispute over some matter arises between believers, the community should attempt to reconcile the two parties. If the dispute devolves into violence, the community is urged to repel the aggressive party through force, but only until that party concedes, at which point efforts at reconciliation are to begin anew (49:9). Elsewhere the Quran encourages those entitled to compensation for injury or loss to forgo the payments, in the interest of avoiding bitterness and resentment among various parties of believers and encouraging good and amicable relations, even in difficult situations. The importance of maintaining social harmony is reflected in Quranic passages that enjoin believers to repel evil by that which is better (23:96) as well as to resist engaging in ignorant or vain conversation and to respond to it merely with the greeting of Peace (25:63).

The fourth principle that undergirds Quranic social ethics is its notion of essential human equality before God and His laws, meaning that all human beings have the same opportunity to realize their moral and spiritual potential. The Quran is quite clear that those distinctions often given so much weight in human society—race, gender, wealth, social class—are meaningless with regard to a person’s spiritual worth and that it is only the latter that God takes into account. Some human beings will inevitably actualize more of their spiritual and intellectual potential than others, and the Quran states that those who have made substantial sacrifices for their faith (4:95; 9:20) as well as those who have achieved high levels of religious devotion or knowledge (39:9; 9:109) enjoy a higher standing than those who have not. But the Quran makes it clear that outward or superficial human differences, such as those of race or ethnicity, are the result of Divine Providence (49:13) and not a basis of nobility or superiority. All strictly religious responsibilities and opportunities—such as the possibility of achieving spiritual excellence or attaining Paradise—are identical across social boundaries and for both men and women; one passage goes to great lengths to emphasize this latter point:

For submitting men and submitting women, believing men and believing women, devout men and devout women, truthful men and truthful women, patient men and patient women, humble men and humble women, charitable men and charitable women, men who fast and women who fast, men who guard their private parts and women who guard [their private parts], men who remember God often and women who remember [God often], God has prepared forgiveness and a great reward. (33:35)

Differences in social or economic standing are also meaningless from the religious point of view in God’s Judgment, and the Quran is careful to enunciate the duty believers have toward all human life. The Quran chastises the Prophet Muhammad himself for being so concerned about persuading the rich and powerful Makkans of the truth of his message that he disregarded a poor, old blind man seeking his guidance (80:1–12). Orphans, who held relatively low status in pre-Islamic Makkan society, are presented in the Quran as individuals with rights that must be protected, and the Quran stresses the duty Muslims have toward the care and proper treatment of orphans. It is one’s status as a believer and as a person of piety that alone determines true worth. For example, the Quran enjoins Muslim men who cannot afford to take a free, believing woman as a wife to take a believing slave woman instead, insisting that the latter is a far better choice than a free woman who is a disbeliever. Moreover, should a man take a believing slave woman as a wife, he must marry her according to all the rights and obligations incumbent upon marriage to any free woman, including seeking the permission of her family and giving her her proper bridewealth, since she is a believer like himself (4:25).

The fifth principle of Islamic social ethics is the balancing of rights and responsibilities. Contemporary Western thought assumes the rights of all individuals to be identical and is primarily concerned with establishing and defending individual rights without an equal or corresponding concern for individual responsibilities; the Quranic perspective takes both into consideration. In Islam, the fulfillment of individual responsibilities can be said to precede and determine individual rights, insofar as rights and responsibilities are ideally proportionate to one another and, moreover, responsibilities come before rights. For example, the Quran stipulates, as mentioned above, that truthful witness is the responsibility of each believer toward the community and before God. Should an individual fail to live up to this responsibility by giving false testimony, he or she forfeits the right to offer testimony in the future (24:4–5).

Although everyone is equal before God insofar as they are held to the same moral and spiritual standards according to the Quran, differences in the fulfillment of individual responsibilities as well as differences in the nature of individual responsibilities as determined by social and economic position, age, and gender affect the nature and extent of one’s rights in society.

The clearest example of this principle is in the case of marital rights and duties. Although men and women are spiritually equal before God, they do not bear identical social responsibilities or enjoy identical rights in marriage. Since the Quran and Islamic Law assert that a man is solely financially liable for his wife, children, and indeed his extended family, he is considered to bear a greater share of responsibility in the marriage and family affairs generally. Thus his rights over his family and his wife are understood to be proportionally greater than those his wife enjoys over him, although they are in no way absolute. Rather, the Quran makes it clear that women have rights over their husbands as their husbands do over them, but that the rights of the husband are a degree over them (2:228). Since the wife’s duties are considered to be less burdensome—being legally limited to providing sexual relations for the husband, although it is also understood that she will also care for any children born to the couple, and some schools of law also include managing the home among her responsibilities—her rights, for example, to divorce, are proportionally less extensive, but never denied altogether.

Although the rights and responsibilities of men and women are not quantitatively equal, they are considered to be complementary. Thus there are some things both husbands and wives can expect or demand from one another—fidelity, intimacy, children, and the preservation of one another’s honor, for example—but they each also enjoy certain unilateral rights in relation to the other. The wife has the religious and legal right to demand of her husband adequate financial support for herself and her children—a right he does not have in relation to her, even if her own wealth exceeds his own; the husband may obtain a unilateral divorce without cause (although this is legally discouraged)\(^5\)—a right that she does not enjoy in relation to him.\(^6\)

The Family

The family constitutes the basis of social life in Islam, as it does in most traditional cultures. The basic social rights and obligations of individuals are defined according to their roles and positions within the family. Although Muslims are enjoined to care for and protect all members of the believing community to the extent they are able, they owe a special and primary duty to members of their family. Charitable donations, for example, should go first to one’s family members and then to other needy persons in society. Within the family, both parents enjoy special and equal rights to kindness and respect from their children. The duty to care for one’s parents and to treat them well is repeated in multiple places throughout the Quran. In several instances, kindness toward parents is presented as a duty second in importance only to loyalty and obedience to God. One passage, for example, states:

Thy Lord decrees that you worship none but Him, and be virtuous to parents. Whether one or both of them reaches old age, say not to them “Uff!” nor chide them, but speak unto them a noble word. Lower unto them the wing of humility out of mercy and say, “My Lord! Have mercy upon them, as they raised me when I was small.” (17:23–24)

The proper attitude toward parents, then, is gentleness, respect, humility, and mercy. It should also be noted that although Islamic society, like most traditional societies, envisions male leadership in family and society as normative (though not absolute), the Quran never privileges fathers over mothers with regard to the respect and devotion due them from their children. For example, in 4:11, the Quran explicitly awards an equal share of inheritance to the mother and the father of a deceased—which is an exception to the general rule whereby men inherit twice as much as women of equal standing (e.g., sons inherit twice as much as daughters, brothers twice as much as sisters, etc.). The two-to-one ratio in these latter cases is considered justified from the Islamic point of view by the fact that men bear extensive financial responsibilities toward their wives, children, and female family members (daughters, sisters, etc.) that they must meet with these additional assets. But in the case of parents, the Quran stipulates the significant responsibilities both mothers and fathers bear toward their children (2:233), and they are accordingly awarded an equal share of the inheritance from them. In fact, although kindness and respect are the proper attitude toward both parents equally, the debt one owes to one’s mother is sometimes singled out for particular emphasis:

*And We have enjoined man to be virtuous unto his parents. His mother carried him in travail and bore him in travail, and his gestation and weaning is thirty months, such that when he reaches maturity and reaches forty years he says, “My Lord inspire me to give thanks for Thy Blessing with which Thou hast blessed me and hast blessed my parents, and that I may work righteousness such that it pleases Thee; and make righteous my progeny for me. Truly I turn in repentance unto Thee, and truly I am among those who submit.” (46:15)\(^{11}\)

However, the duty to obey one’s parents is not absolute. One has no duty to obey disbelieving parents who command or attempt to influence their children toward disbelief (29:8; 31:15), and some verses warn against taking disbelieving relatives as protectors (9:23) or even seeking forgiveness for them, for which the prophet Abraham’s total dissociation from his idolatrous father is given as an example (9:113–14). Elsewhere, however, a certain degree of cordiality toward even idolatrous parents is recommended; the Quran instructs believers to consort with them in the world in a kindly manner (31:15).

The Quran also speaks of the responsibility that both parents have toward their children. Islamic Law permits the practice of family planning when it is a mutual decision between husband and wife, but the Quran asserts that both fathers and mothers must be open to accepting the children that result from their union. The Quran asserts repeatedly that parents do not possess the right of life or death over their children—something that was apparently assumed in pre-Islamic Arabian contexts. Parents are told not to kill their children for fear of poverty for God will provide (6:151; 17:31) and are warned that doing so constitutes a grave sin (17:31). Although female infanticide was reportedly widespread in pre-Islamic Makkah and in Arabia generally, the Quran asserts the inalienable rights of even the smallest of children when it reports that on the Last Day, the female infant buried alive is asked for what sin she was slain (81:8–9). No human life is meaningless or allowed to be obliterated; no unjust taking of human life, no matter how small or seemingly insignificant, will go without account. The Quran emphasizes the responsibility that parents have toward their children and discourages seeing them as property about which they may boast (57:20).\(^{12}\) It, moreover, asserts the separate but equivalent burden both parents share for the care of their children:

And let mothers nurse their children two full years, for such as desire to complete the suckling. It falls on the father to provide for them and clothe them honorably. No soul is tasked beyond its capacity. Let no mother be harmed on account of her child, nor father on account of his child. And the like shall fall upon the heir. If the couple desire to wean, by their mutual consent and consultation, there is no blame upon them. And if you wish to have your children wet-nursed, there is no blame upon you if you pay honorably that which you give. And reverence God, and know that God sees whatsoever you do. (2:233)

Perhaps because they share the responsibility of providing for their children, the Quran here enjoins mutual consultation between husband and wife regarding the care and feeding of their offspring. However, we should note that the duty to one’s children, like the duty to one’s parents, does not outweigh spiritual obligations and does not entail the right to religious compulsion. The Quran suggests that parents faced with disbelieving children have little option but to pray for God’s intervention in the matter and to continue to urge their children to believe in God and His Promise (46:17). Even Noah, in the Quranic account, was unable to save his disbelieving son or compel him onto the ark; he had to watch helplessly as he drowned with the others (11:42–45).

Marriage

Since the family is the foundation of Islamic society, marriage is the foundation of family life. In Islam, marriage is considered the appropriate and natural state for adult men and women, and intentional and voluntary celibacy is not endorsed as a desirable spiritual or social practice (24:32), even if it is not explicitly forbidden. Indeed, the goal of many Quranic provisions regarding marriage often appears to be ensuring the greatest number of marriage opportunities for both Muslim men and Muslim women. For example, the Quranic provision for polygamy (4:3) is often viewed as a means of ensuring that it is possible for all women to marry, even in social situations where the number of women exceeds that of men. This would have been especially important in earlier times, when women were largely dependent upon men for their protection and material provision, and when the number of marriageable men was regularly reduced due to the dangers of warfare and itinerant mercantile activity. Moreover, the Quran does not forbid or in any way discourage remarriage for men and women after divorce or the death of a spouse, thereby affirming the desirability of the marital state whenever possible and increasing the marriage prospects for both genders.

Marriage is considered the desirable state for all adult believers, because it serves as a reflection of the duality and complementarity inherent in all of the created universe. The Quran states that God created all things in pairs (16:72; 43:12; 51:49) and that for each being God has made a “mate” or “spouse” (zawj) only God is One. In 16:72, marriage and children are said to be among the “good things” God has bestowed on humanity. Elsewhere reference is made to spouses as a source of comfort and rest for one another (7:189; 25:74), and in 30:21 affection and mercy are ordained between married couples. In a beautiful passage, the Quran suggests that husband and wife should serve as mutual protectors and comforters of one another when it says to men of their wives, They are a garment for you, and you are a garment for them (2:187). In addition to the symbolic nature of the marital union and the psychological and physical comforts it ideally provides, the institution of marriage is also a foundational element of the Islamic social order and serves the good of the community as a whole. As such, marriage is a matter of public and not only private concern, and, from the point of view of the Quran and Islamic Law, its legal basis takes the form of a social contract between the man and the woman that entails the complementary, but not quantitatively equal or identical rights and responsibilities discussed previously.

As noted above, the Quran endorses what today might be called a “patriarchal” social order, at least insofar as it affirms the normative nature of male authority over the family and especially the marital unit. Although such a characterization needs to be qualified, since men certainly do not enjoy absolute, complete, or unconditional rights in relation to their wives or children, a Quranic basis for male authority in the family is the passage:

Men are the upholders and maintainers of women by virtue of that in which God has favored some of them above others and by virtue of their spending from their wealth. Therefore the righteous women are devoutly obedient, guarding in [their husbands’] absence what God has guarded. As for those from whom you fear discord and animosity, admonish them, then leave them in their beds, then strike them. Then if they obey you, seek not a way against them. Truly God is Exalted, Great. (4:34)
This verse has been one of the most controversial verses for contemporary non-Muslim thinkers—and a particularly difficult one for some modern Muslims. It appears to endorse a man’s authority over his wife and to establish his right to her obedience—ideas incompatible with modern Western notions of gender equality. Perhaps most controversially, the verse grants men the right, in certain circumstances, to physically discipline their wives, which is considered by many today to be an unacceptable violation of a woman’s human rights and dignity. Although many contemporary Muslim thinkers have attempted to reinterpret this verse in ways more acceptable to modern conceptions of women’s rights, the fact remains that the verse is clearly at odds with contemporary Western views of appropriate spousal relations in marriage. That being said, it is worth stepping back to take a careful look at the verse and consider its full implications, for doing so sheds much light on other aspects of Quranic social ethics and the underlying principles involved in Islamic marriage.

In the first line, this passage establishes a man’s right to authority on the basis of his financial support of his wife. In other words, his position in the family is conditioned upon the fulfillment of his unique financial responsibility in the marriage, in keeping with the principle of balancing social rights and responsibilities. In fact, one contemporary Muslim expert on Islamic Law has posed the question of where the balance of domestic authority lies in cases where a husband is not the sole provider in the family, a question brought to the fore by considering the principle of balancing rights and responsibilities in light of modern realities.

In considering the second line of the passage, which discusses the wife’s obedience, we should note that it describes righteous women as devoutly obedient (qānitāt), rather than unconditionally obedient, and that it enjoins wives to guard in their husband’s absence what God has guarded. This suggests that the wife’s duty of obedience and loyalty is something for which she is responsible before God; it must be done with religious and spiritual principles in mind and is not an unthinking and slavish obedience to her husband. It is clear in the Quran that, just as children are not obligated to obey their parents when they bid them to religious error, so too are wives not obligated to render obedience to their husbands that would contradict obedience to God. By way of Quranic example, we might cite the case of the wife of Pharaoh, who, though married to one of religious history’s most evil figures, nevertheless takes in the infant Moses, thwarting her husband’s intention to kill him (28:8–9), and in doing so becomes, according to a well-known hadith, one of the greatest spiritual women
Finally, with regard to the third line of the verse, a woman who shows profound discord and animosity (nushūz) toward her husband may be sanctioned by her husband in three ascending degrees: he may verbally correct her; he may refuse her his company; and, finally, he may strike her. As offensive as this may seem to Western ears, in light of the West's criminalization of all physical forms of domestic violence, the Quran's intentions in this assertion should be fully examined. In addressing this issue, the Quran is reflecting the historical realities of human society by assuming the proclivity of men (in particular) to use physical force in response to anger and seeking to limit and reduce its manifestation as much as possible, even while legitimating it in certain circumstances. According to this Quranic passage, a man facing the disloyalty of his wife must restrain his anger and follow a procedure for changing her behavior through means other than physical force. Only if these means are unsuccessful is the Quran understood to grant him the warrant to strike her.

One must also consider the kind of “striking” that is intended here. Many see striking one’s wife in any form or degree as unacceptable, but it is important to remember that Islamic Law, following the clear dictates of the Prophet, forbids a husband to strike his wife in the face or with any degree of force that would “leave a mark,” let alone leave her truly injured. Such behavior constitutes a woman’s grounds for legal divorce from her husband and may in some cases entitle her to restitution. We can say, then, that the “striking” permitted here is not impulsive hitting in response to anger, nor is it a “beating” or any form of injurious action against the wife. Even the earliest traditional Islamic commentators read this passage as a limit rather than a license, unanimously stating that this striking must be done without violence or intensity and without leaving any kind of mark. Furthermore, some contemporary Muslim scholars and authorities have argued that the Arabic word usually translated “hit” or “strike” should be interpreted differently and that it perhaps means simply to go away from one’s wife.

If the Quran lays out what some would identify as a “patriarchal” model for marriage, it also takes significant steps—almost unheard of in its time—to alleviate some of patriarchy’s common abuses and to ameliorate the position of women in the family and society. For example, although Islam allowed polygamy, already a widespread practice in pre-Islamic Arabia and the ancient world in general, it imposed new limits on its exercise. In the first place, it is worth noting that the one passage of the Quran that endorses polygamy does so explicitly as a means of alleviating the potential abuse of orphan girls:

\begin{quote}
Give orphans their property, and exchange not the bad for the good, nor consume their property with your own. Truly that would be a great sin. If you fear that you will not deal fairly with the orphans, then marry such women as seem good to you, two, three, or four; but if you fear that you will not deal justly, then only one, or those whom your right hands possess. Thus it is more likely that you will not commit injustice. (4:2–3)
\end{quote}

It is clear that the Quran’s explicit and primary concern here is not the gratification of male desires or providing a solution other than divorce for men already married to an incapacitated or infertile wife (reasons cited elsewhere as practical justifications for polygamy), but rather the just treatment of orphan women and girls in particular. Even after citing this reason, the passage goes on to state that, should a man feel he may be “unable to deal justly” with more than one wife, he should remain monogamous, for that is “more likely to prevent” injustice. It is thus the principles of justice and concern for the weaker members of society (here, orphan girls) that are explicitly cited in this verse as the rationale for the Quranic endorsement of polygamy. Both the limit of four placed upon the number of wives a man could marry and the injunction to treat them equally (a principle that became actionable under Islamic Law) represent important restrictions and conditions placed upon the practice as it had previously been known.

Perhaps the most revolutionary social principle introduced by the Quran was the notion of women’s right to property—that is, their right, upon legal maturity, to own and to dispose of property independently of either their husbands or their male relatives. The Quran establishes women’s right to property through the institutions of both marital dowry and inheritance. The Quran specifies in numerous places that a man must pay his wife a mandatory bridal gift upon the contraction of their marriage and that this must be a free gift that cannot be alienated from her against her will (4:4); nor can it be taken from her after a divorce or after she has been widowed, except in cases where she has criminally violated her marital obligations through adultery (4:19). The passage continues:

\begin{quote}
If you desire to take one wife in place of another, even if you have Given to one of them a great sum, take back nothing from it. Would you take it by way of calumny and manifest sin? And how can you take it back, when you have lain with one another and they have made with you a solemn covenant? (4:20–21)

Even in cases where a marriage is called off before a contract has been established, the Quran enjoins men to provide something for the women they had intended to marry (2:236). The dowry therefore functions in the Quranic context quite differently than it does in other religious cultures, such as the Hindu and the medieval Christian, in which it was the woman’s family who had to pay a dowry to the groom on behalf of their daughter. Some have dismissed the Islamic institution of the dowry as a “bride price,” with the demeaning suggestion that women themselves are “purchased,” but it is clear that the dowry was meant to function as an important economic protection for a woman in the event of either widowhood or divorce—circumstances to which and in which women were more vulnerable than men. Not only might the dowry, if large enough, provide the woman with an independent source of wealth—the Quran indicates that she may leverage this wealth as a means of securing a divorce from her husband, should he be otherwise unwilling to grant her one (2:229; 4:128).

The second fundamental way in which the Quran establishes a woman’s right to property is through the inheritance laws set out clearly in Sūrah 4 of the Quran. The idea that women necessarily inherit from their deceased relatives, along with men—even if they inherit half the share of male relatives who enjoy an equal degree of relationship to the deceased—was radical. One passage of the Quran suggests that in the pre-Islamic Arabian context, women were themselves sometimes “inherited,” rather than being heirs themselves (4:19). If this were so, it would be similar to “levirate” marriage practiced historically in other tribal or clan-based cultures, including that of the ancient Israelites, whereby a woman’s brother-in-law would “inherit” the wife of his deceased brother as a means of retaining the woman, her reproductive capacity, and perhaps also her wealth, within her deceased husband’s extended family. The Quran, however, forbids explicitly the practice of “inheriting women against their will” and makes it unlawful for a man or for the heirs of a deceased man to hinder his wife from remarrying after she is divorced or widowed in an effort to prevent the wealth she possesses through dowry or inheritance from becoming separated from her husband’s extended family (4:19).²³

In all of the Quranic stipulations about family and marital relations, it is clear that the Quran is concerned about upholding the traditionally hierarchical, but reciprocal, relationships of rights and responsibilities between parents and children and between husbands and wives, but also prohibiting unjust abuses of those relationships of authority and attempting to curtail the hardships that those relationships sometimes entail—especially for those most vulnerable, such as women and young children. Although it lays upon men both greater responsibilities and greater rights in certain aspects of family life, the Quran does not permit either the absolute control of a father over his child or that of a husband over his wife, as earlier, pre-Islamic forms of patriarchy found in Arabia and many other cultures had done, and insists repeatedly that relations between family members must be carried out with the utmost respect and concern for all members.

Economic Justice

When we move outside the family unit to examine the Quranic teachings on social relations among the ummah at large, we see that chief among its ethical concerns is the principle of economic justice. The Quran does not mandate economic equality or the forced division of wealth equally among all—the existence of rich and poor within society is presented as a matter of Divine Providence (16:71), and the respect for individual property and mercantile activity is found throughout the Quran—but it does ordain economic justice. The Quran is concerned that all members of society be provided for and granted justice regardless of their socioeconomic status, that there be a distribution of wealth throughout society via various religious taxes and forms of charity, and that the wealth that is obtained in varying degrees by individuals be earned through legitimate and fair rather than predatory or exploitative means.

The provision for the poorer and weaker members of society is one of the central themes of the earliest verses of the Quran—the verses that Muhammad received in Makkah. In these verses, caring for orphans, widows, and the needy is established as a religious obligation for which all Muslims are responsible before God; the neglect of this obligation is considered a prideful sin that will have harsh consequences on the Day of Judgment.²⁴ Numerous Quranic verses establish the zakāḥ, or alms, as a mandatory form of charity incumbent on each believer as one of the pillars of religious practice—in fact, it is second only to prayer as one of the most important ritual acts Muslims must perform.25

The word zakāh comes from a root in Arabic that means both “to purify” and “to increase.” Islamic Law considers the payment of zakāh to “purify” one’s wealth as a whole, thereby rendering the balance legitimate for the expenditure and enjoyment of its owner. In addition to the mandatory zakāh, voluntary charity in a variety of forms is continuously enjoined in the Quran, which repeatedly encourages believers to spend in the way of God the good things they have been given (see, e.g., 2:265; 3:134).26 It is not simply the act of charity, but also the intention and attitude toward charity that determines its spiritual merit. Believers are encouraged to give for the sake of God, rather than to be seen of men (2:265; 4:38; 76:8–10), and to give of the good things that they hold dear (3:92). The Quran criticizes those who give begrudgingly or regard their charitable donations as a loss (9:98; see also 9:53–54).

Orphans are a matter of particular concern for the Quran, and caring for orphans is presented as an important mode of charity. The Quran instructs believers to make use of their own wealth to provide for the orphans in their care, while holding in trust and not pilfering whatever inheritance the orphaned children may possess.27 Furthermore, the Quran stipulates that Muhammad’s (and, later, the Islamic government’s) share of all gains acquired in warfare should go in part to providing for the needy members of society (8:41)—thereby making provision for the poor an obligation upon the Islamic state as an institution as well as upon each individual believer.

The Quran is also insistent upon the virtuous management and use of wealth. As in so many things, believers are instructed to handle their wealth with moderation, neither hoarding it greedily and anxiously, nor squandering it with prodigality.28 Wealth spent wisely and virtuously for charity and the good of others is described as bringing one true “profit”29 in this world and the next; it is the commerce that will never perish (35:29) and a source of spiritual growth (92:17–21).30

In addition to the “spiritual investment” of wealth in the form of charity, the Quran also endorses the use of wealth in worldly commerce, but insists repeatedly on the maintenance of fair trade practices. Muslim merchants are instructed to be scrupulous in their “weights and measurements” (26:181–83; 55:7–9; 83:1–3), so that no injustice is done to any buyer or seller, and to write down and enlist witnesses to all financial contracts and agreements (2:282–83).
in order to prevent both fraudulent activity and bad relations between business associates. Believers are warned against consuming the wealth of others “wrongfully” or using wealth for fraudulent purposes (4:29), such as bribery (2:188).

Perhaps most important, the Quran forbids the practice of usury, that is, the predatory taking of interest by individuals on loans without risk of loss, which in effect makes the wealthy members of society wealthier on account of their wealth and the poor poorer on account of their poverty. The Quran rejects out of hand those who would argue that usury is a legitimate means of acquiring wealth (2:275–76). It is charitable spending (zakāh), not usury, that brings true profit (30:38–39). Muslims are encouraged to lend their money freely to those in need, granting them ample time to repay the debt or else forgiving it as a means of charity (2:278–80). By prohibiting predatory economic practices, especially usury, the Quran ensures that although rich and poor will always exist in society, the economic divide between the two never becomes excessive and unbreachable. At the same time, the mandatory alms it ordains and the voluntary charity it strongly encourages are meant to ensure that wealth circulates within the community and that no one is left without some provision.

The Quran also provides for the redistribution of wealth through the regulation of inheritance and provides detailed and explicit instructions about the proper disposal of wealth upon death. As noted above, the Quran mandates that both men and women related to the deceased be included among the heirs, and that the amounts received be both proportional to their relationship to the deceased and proportionally equal among those enjoying an equal degree of kinship. Parents, spouses, children, and in some cases siblings all receive a stipulated share, and Muslims may not favor in matters of inheritance any particular relative, child, or sibling over others (4:11–12). Aside from preventing potentially bitter disputes among heirs, the system of inheritance laid out in the Quran also serves the function of dividing an individual’s amassed wealth—which in some cases might be considerable—into many smaller shares, thereby preventing the excessive accumulation of wealth in a few hands over many generations, a frequent result of the alternate system of primogeniture.

From a spiritual rather than a purely social perspective, the fact that a deceased Muslim’s wealth must be disposed of according to Divine mandate, rather than only according to the will of the deceased, reinforces the notion that all wealth belongs to God, as emphasized in 47:38: God is the Rich, and you are the poor. By submitting one’s wealth to Divinely mandated laws of inheritance, one acknowledges, in effect, that God merely “takes back” the wealth He has granted an individual in life and redistributes it according to His Will—for as the Quran states in multiple places, all possession (mulk) belongs ultimately to God,\textsuperscript{35} and so to Him all things rightfully return (57:5).

Proper Social Behavior

As a community of believers, the ummah is enjoined by the Quran to engage in and promote a range of behaviors designed to reflect and facilitate the moral and spiritual integrity of its members as well as the harmony of the community as a whole. We have already mentioned the Quranic instruction to “enjoin right and forbid wrong” and the Quranic exhortation to respectful behavior and peacemaking among the believers. There are, moreover, other general behaviors ordained or encouraged by the Quran that should be mentioned as contributing to these larger goals.

MODESTY

One stipulation concerns modesty of behavior and dress. As noted above, the integrity of family life and the sanctity of marriage are essential to the Quranic conception of the believing and righteous society. Sexual relations and even sexual temptation outside the boundaries of legitimate marriage or domestic arrangements are considered destabilizing to society and dangerous to the morality of individuals. For this reason, the Quran requires modest behavior and dress for both men and women in their encounters with those outside their immediate family, although the requirements for women are more detailed and extensive:

Tell the believing men to lower their eyes and guard their private parts. That is purer for them. Surely God is Aware of whatsoever they do. And tell the believing women to lower their eyes and to guard their private parts, and to not display their adornment except that which is visible thereof. And let them draw their kerchiefs over their breasts, and not display their adornment except to their husbands, or their fathers, or their husbands’ fathers, or their sons, or their husbands’ sons, or their brothers, or their brothers’ sons, or their sisters’ sons, or their women, or those whom their right hands possess, or male attendants free of desire, or children who are innocent of the private areas of women. Nor let them stamp their feet such that the ornaments they conceal become known. (24:30–31)

Both men and women are told to lower their eyes to avoid breaching the modesty of others, on the one hand, and to guard their private parts to preserve their own modesty, on the other. Although the requirements of modesty for women involve more explicit restrictions, the description of female modesty provided here is broad enough to have permitted a variety of interpretations of appropriate female dress in different geographical and climatic regions and cultural zones as well as over time. In another passage, believing women are told to draw their cloaks over themselves. Thus is it likelier that they will be known and not be disturbed (33:59). Here the particular concern of the Quran in commanding modest dress for women is their own protection, comfort, and freedom from unwanted male attention. At the same time, adornment within the confines of modesty is not prohibited for Muslims and is indeed presented as one of the blessings of God to humanity (7:26). Yet the Quran reminds its readers that the metaphorical garment of pious behavior is the best adornment and that in dress, as in all things (25:67), they should be neither overly ascetic nor excessive and wasteful (7:31–32).

TEMPERANCE

As is well known, the Quran also bans the consumption of alcoholic beverages and gambling from Islamic social life. Although an early verse of the Quran extols the drink made from the date palm and the vine as a goodly provision from God (16:67), the Quran gradually, over the course of its revelation, eliminated the drinking of wine (and Muslims understand this to mean all intoxicating substances) from the lives of believers. Muslims are advised that they must not engage in prayer while they are intoxicated (4:43)—an injunction that would by itself significantly limit alcohol consumption, considering that prayer is performed five times a day. A later verse (2:219) states that although both wine and gambling may bring people some benefits, their sin is greater than their benefit. Finally, both the drinking of wine and gambling are identified as a means of defilement of Satan’s doing designed to sow enmity and hatred among the believers and to turn them away from the remembrance of God, and from prayer (5:90–91); so they must be avoided completely. Thus the final and absolute prohibition on drinking and gambling is enjoined for the dual purpose of maintaining harmony within the community and promoting the spiritual development of individual believers.38

ETIQUETTE OF SPEECH AND SOCIAL INTERACTION

As a final point, we should note that although direct Quranic mandates concerning social and family life, economic practices, dress, and other issues often receive the most attention, the Quran has influenced basic conceptions of ethics and social behavior in ways that are more subtle, but certainly just as profound, if not more so. If one visits an Islamic country, one may be struck by the frequency with which the Name of God and an articulated recognition of His Presence can be heard—not only in mosques and religious gatherings, but in the marketplace, on the street, in informal social gatherings, and in everyday language. Quranic phrases such as al-ḥamdu li’Llāh (“Thanks be to God”), mā shā’ā’Llāh (“As God has willed”), and in shā’ā’Llāh (“If God wills”—which acknowledge God’s Volition in past, present, and future occurrences, respectively—are heard repeatedly in every form of social interaction. The Quran praises those who, upon learning of a death or disaster, say, innā li’Llāh wainnā ilayhi rājiʿūn (Truly we are God’s, and unto Him we return, 2:156); this formula, which provides both comfort and spiritual awareness in the face of life’s most painful circumstances, is widely used throughout all segments of Islamic society. The frequent and sometimes casual repetition of these phrases in Islamic society may seem merely conventional in some cases, but they nonetheless reflect a collective sense of God’s constant Presence—not just in prayer, but in everyday settings.

In addition to recognizing God’s Presence and Volition in daily life, Muslims are also encouraged to speak and behave in ways that acknowledge the spiritual and human dignity of others. For example, the greeting Peace be upon you (6:54) is recommended among believers, and they are told that whenever they are offered a greeting, they should respond with a greeting that is better (4:86)—that is, one that expresses even more respect or goodwill than the one they had been given.39 They are instructed in multiple places not only to guard their own privacy, but to respect that of others (2:189; 24:27–29, 58–59; 33:53), to behave humbly (25:63; 31:17–19; 58:11), to speak softly and with modesty (31:19), to abstain from all vain talk (23:3; 25:72), and to avoid, specifically, defamation, insult, suspicion, gossip, and “secret” talk with ill intent (49:11–12; 58:9–10). All of these behaviors described above fall into a category Muslims usually refer to as adab (proper comportment and manners in relation to others). They constitute an essential part of Islamic social ethics and can be summarized in the general notion that Muslims are required to preserve both their own honor and dignity and those of fellow believers and in fact others in general.

Conclusion

As we have aimed to demonstrate, all social ethics, rights, and responsibilities mandated or recommended in the Quran can be related to the five general principles laid out at the beginning of this essay: the significance of the religious community, the concern for justice, the maintenance of social harmony, human equality before God, and the balancing of rights and responsibilities. Although many Westerners may disagree with either these founding principles or their application in specific Quranic injunctions, it is important to understand Islamic social ethics in the context of the Quran’s own spiritual perspective and with an appreciation for the larger spiritual and moral goals that are the Quran’s primary concern. In the Quran, and therefore in Islamic ethics generally, society does not exist merely to serve the individual or as a necessary evil needed to provide for human survival in a harsh and dangerous world. Rather, Islamic society is viewed as a “community of believers” who not only aid and support one another in spiritual growth, but who should also reflect and remind the believers of the paradisal community of saved souls described in the Quran—a community near to God, among which one hears only greetings of peace and gentle conversation (19:62), and where the delights and comforts of the paradisal Garden are enjoyed with a constant awareness of their spiritual source.
Beginning with the persecution of the early Muslim community by the idolatrous Quraysh, leading to exile in Abyssinia for some Muslims and followed by the emigration (hijrah) of many Muslims along with the Prophet from Makkah to Madinah, the subsequent military encounters with the Quraysh and their allies, and the final conquest of Arabia, the Prophet Muhammad encountered circumstances demanding that, in addition to his function as teacher and guide, he fulfill the role of military commander and head of state. From almost the very beginning of the Prophet’s career, Muslims had to come to terms with the question of the use of force, whether they were its victims or its agents, and as a comprehensive legal tradition, Islamic Law could not have remained silent on the question of war and peace.

When discussing this subject, the use of the term jihād deserves special attention from the outset, as it has become deformed and misunderstood in much contemporary discourse. Linguistically jihād means “struggle,” “striving,” or “exertion,” though it is commonly and incorrectly translated “holy war” (a term originating in the Western tradition in the context of intra-Christian conflicts); in Arabic “holy war” would be equivalent to the term al-ḥarb al-muqaddas, which does not exist in classical Arabic. In the Islamic intellectual tradition, jihād means any struggle “in the way of God,” that is, in order to obey His Commands or accomplish His Will, which includes but is not limited to the just use of force.

Even though in the Quran and Ḥadīth jihād is an idea comprising both the spiritual and the material, the inward and outward domains (often referred to as the “Greater Jihād” and the “Lesser Jihād,” respectively), in works of Islamic Law the word jihād as a technical term came to be understood as a reference to the taking up of arms “in the way of God,” though governed by strict rules that have counterparts in the Western concept of “just war.” That is to say, there is a distinction to be made between the word jihād as it is used in the Quran and the same term in the later legal tradition, much the same way the word fiqh and its cognates in the Quran refer to “understanding” in a general sense, but as technical terms came to refer later to law and jurisprudence. It is thus not infrequent that a chapter in a classical text on the virtues of taking up arms in the way of God will have the word jihād as part of its title, but jihād is also frequently used in Sufi texts to refer to the struggle in the spiritual life against one’s lower desires.

Like many important terms, jihād is equivocal; that is, its connotations can change depending on context: a jihād against one’s persecutors is not the same as a jihād against one’s passions. In fact, jihād has entered common English usage in a way almost indistinguishable from the word “crusade,” a term of purely Western origin with a similarly diverse history and a similar capacity to be misunderstood and misapplied. Muslims in an Islamic context could have used the word jihād and expected their audience to understand its constituent elements, whether these were the laws governing fighting an external threat or the spiritual techniques used to purify the soul and bring it closer to God. However, the simple use of jihād as a way of describing what Muslims believe about conquest, conversion, and violence is worse than meaningless in an intellectual and cultural environment in which specifics regarding such questions need to be spelled out with the utmost precision and care, rather than masked under catchall terms that are useful only in a context where their meaning is well known and generally agreed upon.

To understand the Quran’s use of jihād, it is necessary to recall that for many years, during the period in which the Prophet preached in his hometown of Makkah, Muslims were forbidden to respond with force to the persecution, suppression, embargoes, and even deaths that they endured. Yet even during this period Muslims were commanded by the Quran to “strive” (jihād): So obey not the disbelievers, but strive against them by means of it with a great striving (25:52); Then indeed thy Lord, for those who emigrated after being oppressed, then strove and were patient, surely thy Lord thereafter is Forgiving, Merciful (16:110). The Prophet himself also taught the virtues of nonviolent forms of struggle, saying, “The best struggle (jihād) is to speak the truth before a tyrannical ruler.”¹ To a group returning from a battle he said, “You have returned from the lesser struggle (jihād) to the greater struggle,”² which most Muslims have understood to mean returning from physical fighting to resume struggling to gain perfection on the spiritual path. He also said, “Shall I tell you of your best deed, the most pleasing to your King, the loftiest in your ranks, better than the giving of gold and silver, and better than meeting your enemy in battle, beheading him whilst he beheads you? The remembrance of God.”

The Use of Force

After the emigration from Makkah to Madinah, Muslims were given permission to engage in battle against those who threatened the nascent Islamic community, and most jurists consider the first verses allowing the taking up of arms to be the following:

Truly God defends those who believe. Truly God loves not any ungrateful traitor. Permission is granted to those who are fought, because they have been wronged—and truly God is able to help them—who were expelled from their homes without right, only for saying, “Our Lord is God.” Were it not for God’s repelling people, some by means of others, monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, wherein God’s Name is mentioned much, would have been destroyed. And God will surely help those who help Him—truly God is Strong, Mighty—who, were We to establish them upon the earth, would perform the prayer, give the alms, and enjoin right and forbid wrong. And unto God is the end of all affairs. (22:38–41)

Three points are of special significance in connection with this passage. First, the purpose of force (repelling some by means of others) is ultimately the maintenance of religion (the remembrance of God’s Name in houses of worship). Second, this protection is not limited to Muslims, but extends to churches, synagogues, and monasteries, meaning that God acts to preserve authentic religion as such. Third, the use of force by Muslims is framed as a defensive action in response to wrongs committed offensively against them.

Among the key Quranic verses pertaining to war and physical conflict are 2:190–94, 216–17, 244, 256; 3:116–56; 4:75; 5:13; 8:5, 38–39, 61; 9:1–15, 29, 111; 10:109; 22:39–40, 52; 42:40; 47:4; 60:8–9, though there are others. These verses merit careful reading in full and in their proper context, and readers are encouraged to explore the commentary in this volume on these passages. They outline the conditions under which Muslims may engage in battle and the reasons for which they are allowed to fight: because they have been wronged and expelled from their homes (22:39–40); because they have been persecuted, which is seen as graver than slaying, and threatened in order to make them renounce their religion (2:217). Under these conditions, they are commanded to fight and even kill their enemies, and yet if they desist, then there is no enmity save against the wrongdoers (2:193) and what is past will be forgiven them (8:38). Moreover, it is important to remember that the relevant passages regarding the use of force are not limited to those that describe fighting or contain specific commands and prohibitions regarding war and conflict. The moral landscape of the Quran is unambiguously against religious persecution and military aggression and in favor of justice and forgiveness as well as restraint, and one cannot consider the rules and justifications for the use of force without consideration of the Quran’s general view of other religions and its overall social teachings.

Coercion in Matters of Religion

In order to understand whether and how the use of force can be applied in religious matters, one can begin by examining verses that outline the scope of the Prophet’s mission, such as 42:48: And if they turn away, We sent thee not as a keeper over them. Naught is incumbent upon thee, save the proclamation. Similar verses include 88:21–23; 13:40; and 5:92. Some of these passages are Madinan, which means that they were revealed after permission was given to the Muslim community by God to struggle with and confront the enemy through force of arms when necessary. Another such verse is, There is no coercion in religion. Sound judgment has become clear from error (2:256). This verse was directed at Muslims who wanted to convert their children from Judaism or Christianity to Islam or, according to another interpretation, at those who sought pardon for their children who continued to live among a Jewish tribe that was exiled for planning to assassinate the Prophet. According to the first interpretation, one cannot be coerced into becoming a Muslim, and according to the second, one cannot be coerced into remaining non-Muslim, meaning that those children of Muslims who chose to remain with the enemies of Muslims did so of their own free will.

These passages are in a seeming tension with a hadīth of the Prophet stating, “I have been commanded to fight the people until they bear witness that there is no god but God and Muhammad is God’s Messenger, perform the prayer, and pay the alms. When they have done this, their blood and property are safe from me, except by the right of Islam and their reckoning with God.” This hadīth raises questions regarding those to whom the word “people” in the hadīth refers, why they are to be fought, and whether it means that Islam should be spread by force.

The vast majority of the scholars of Quranic exegesis and Islamic Law have always held that the command to preach peacefully and to never coerce anyone in their choice of religion—a message found throughout the Quran—was never changed and continued to hold sway through the end of the Prophet’s life and after and still holds true today. For the majority of traditional scholars, the maximum possible scope for “the people” in the aforementioned hadīth is limited to those with whom the Prophet was engaged in conflict at the time, meaning that “the people” does not refer to all people everywhere but was limited strictly to the pagan Arabs who had been his unrelenting enemies and persecutors. Also, the verb “to fight” (qātala) in Arabic implies that one is in mutual contention with someone, not in a mode of aggression.

Questions also arise in connection with the so-called Sword Verse, 9:5: When the sacred months have passed, slay the idolaters wheresoever you find them, capture them, besiege them, and lie in wait for them at every place of ambush.
But if they repent, and perform the prayer and give the alms, then let them go their way. Truly God is Forgiving, Merciful. The following verse reads: And if any of the idolaters seek asylum with thee, grant him asylum until he hears the Word of God. Then convey him to his place of safety. That is because they are a people who know not (9:6). This second verse commands Muslims to receive idolaters if they seek asylum, to preach the truth to them, and then to let them go safely. It sets no condition that they repent and accept Islam. Some have posited, without much support in the principles of exegesis, that the second verse is abrogated by the first, meaning that the legally binding nature of 9:5 overturns that of 9:6. However, a straightforward reading shows that becoming Muslims is not a condition for the asylum seekers’ safe return. Rather, these two verses present not one, but two possibilities for non-Muslims to escape armed conflict with the Muslim community: the first is to accept Islam, as mentioned in the first verse, and the second is to seek asylum with Muslims, as mentioned in the second verse. Moreover, as mentioned in connection with some of the verses cited earlier, this passage was interpreted traditionally as pertaining only to Arabia and not to the whole world.

The invocation of “abrogation” as it concerns passages relating to the use of force is a persistent issue in Quranic commentary. Some jurists tend to uphold the opinion that verses permissive of conflict “abrogate” or cancel the binding force of those verses that discourage or limit it, in extreme cases (as in 9:5) holding that a verse abrogates the one immediately following it in the text. Because of the consequential nature of verses related to the use of force, it is worth remembering that in almost all cases abrogation is a contested matter. Most jurists accept that abrogation exists in the Quran, but there is a wide range of opinion as to its scope and application (see 2:106c).

Treaties and Treaty Peoples

Treaties are an important dimension of Islamic Law as they pertain to war and peace. From the time he took political power in Madinah until his death, the Prophet entered into treaties with several tribes on the Arabian Peninsula, among them Jewish tribes such as Banū Qurayẓah and also the polytheistic Quraysh. Among the key verses dealing with treaties are 8:56–61 and 9:7–16, beginning with 9:7: If they remain true to you, remain true to them. Truly God loves the reverent. Observing established treaties with non-Muslim polytheists meant that the Muslim community was willing, and indeed commanded, to live in a state of peace with its neighbors regardless of their religion. When Muslims were commanded to fight those who broke their treaties, the reason inviting retaliation was the resulting threat to the Islamic community and not the identity of the treaty breakers.

Moreover, the Quran does not allow Muslims to wage war on those who pose no threat at all: Had God willed, He could have given them authority over you, and then surely they would have fought you. So if they withdraw from you, and do not fight you, and offer peace, God allows you no way against them (4:90); and, If they incline toward peace, incline thou toward it, and trust in God (8:61). In some cases, such as the surprise attack at Khaybar and the campaigns of Muʿṭah and Tabūk, the Prophet and his Companions set out in an offensive posture, attacking first. However, these were not instances of aggression, but what modern international law might call preemptive (not “preventive”) self-defense. In the case of Khaybar, the Prophet was taking action against a tribe that was secretly plotting to attack the Muslims. In the case of Muʿṭah, an emissary of the Prophet was killed by tribes to the north who were under the protection of the Byzantines, and in the campaign of Tabūk the Muslims took to the field based on information that the Byzantines were planning attacks of their own.

Indeed, the Arabic saying, “When the Byzantines are not campaigned against, they campaign,” describes the state of much of the world before the UN Charter, the Nuremberg Principles, and the Geneva Conventions, and in many cases after these agreements as well. Maintaining security was often a matter of active defense to maintain boundaries, and in the absence of an explicit treaty one group could not expect to be left alone if it left others to prepare to attack. Borders were not established facts of international agreement, but rather were usually determined by how much territory one group could effectively defend. Conquest as such was not seen as an international crime (indeed, there was no such concept in premodern history), and until the last century war was seen as a legitimate instrument of national policy.

In their wake Muslim armies left large portions of the lands they conquered predominantly non-Muslim for decades or even centuries, as we see in the cases of Syria and Persia, since the expansion of Islamic rule did not require the expansion of the Muslim population. Indeed, on occasion Christians fought alongside Muslims during the early conquests, and Jews fought alongside Muslims in Andalusia. Moreover, most of the Islamic world was never conquered at all, but became Muslim through the example of saintly figures, preaching, or simple contact with pious Muslim merchants. Had Muslims desired to convert populations by force or expel them, the Christian and Jewish communities that have historically lived in the Islamic world and continue to do so until the present day would not exist. A better example of “religious” conquest would be the Christian conquest of southern Spain in 1492, after which not a single active mosque or Muslim community was allowed to exist in Spain until the latter part of the fourteenth/twentieth century.

In Islamic Law, the People of the Book (usually Jews and Christians, but in practice also Zoroastrians, Hindus, and others) who live under the political rule of Muslims are called ahl al-dhimma, literally “people of treaty.” Broadly speaking, there are two ways in which a given people may be considered dhimmīs, or “treaty people.” In one case, dhimmīs live among the Muslim population and share the same streets, markets, and neighborhoods. In the second case, dhimmīs live in a separate area and run most of their own affairs. Naturally there are variations that lie between these two categories, but these are the two general types. Crucial to understanding these arrangements is the fact that a treaty people were not just a religious community, but constituted a political and legal unit in relation to the Muslim community.
In the first case, dhimmīs live under the laws and within the framework provided by the Islamic state, but with complete autonomy with regard to their religious and cultural matters such as education and family law. The protected people are not required to contribute to the military protection of the state, but are subject instead to an “indemnity,” or a tax specific to them, most commonly known as the jizyah, but it has other names as well (dhimmīs do not pay the Islamic alms, or zakāh, which is required of Muslims). This common arrangement lasted in many parts of the Islamic world, particularly in the Ottoman Empire, until the fourteenth/twentieth century. Historically other rules were imposed on the treaty peoples, such as a prohibition against missionary activity and limits on the construction of new houses of worship.

In the second case, the dhimmī state agrees to exist in peace with the Islamic state and not help or support any enemy of Islam. Examples of this include the Prophet’s arrangement with the people of Bahrain, who were Zoroastrians, and with the Christians of Najran. Under such an arrangement, the people remain completely autonomous and run their own affairs. They remain under the protection of the Islamic state, with no responsibility to provide active protection in return. The Islamic state has no right to any of their wealth or property except for the jizyah, or “indemnity.” These kinds of agreements were commonplace during the early conquests and even later in Islamic history.

The verse that institutes the jizyah is 9:29: Fight those who believe not in God and in the Last Day, and who do not forbid what God and His Messenger have forbidden, and who follow not the Religion of Truth among those who were given the Book, till they pay the jizyah with a willing hand, being humbled. The phrase being humbled (wa-hum ṣāghirūn), which can also mean “in a state of humility or lowness,” has been interpreted and applied in more than one way; some take it to mean simply “as the minor or subject party,” and others restrict the reference to those from whom Muslims had experienced prior hostility and enmity. Indeed, some commentators note that this verse does not seem to describe all People of the Book, though most jurists have interpreted it to apply to the People of the Book generally when they enter into a treaty relationship with a Muslim state. In Islamic history some rulers have enforced a kind of humiliation to accompany the paying of the jizyah by the dhimmī communities, but in doing so they have generally gone against the most established Islamic precedent and legal opinion. Neither the Prophet nor the early Caliphs humiliated dhimmīs during the payment of the jizyah; sometimes they allowed it to be called “charity” and always required that it be collected with gentleness.
Modern observers looking at the institutions of dhimmah and jizyah often interpret them through the prism of familiar concepts of citizenship and civil society, but since a religious community in Islamic Law delineated historically a political community as well (as it did in the Ottoman Empire, for example), the historical virtues and abuses of such institutions are more properly judged according to an idea of multiple religio-political communities occupying the same geographic space. Although dhimmīs paid an indemnity (jizyah), they were not required to serve in the armed forces, and although there were limits placed on their ability to expand and preach to those outside their communities, they were granted significant autonomy to run their own affairs. The rules on the treatment of Jews and Christians (which extended in practice to other religions as well) are often seen as placing a limit on some of their rights, but it should be recalled that, in establishing a maximum, Islamic Law also established a minimum. Whatever transactional limitations the treaty peoples experienced, embracing Islam under threat of force was rare in Islamic history and has no warrant in the Quran with the exception of the pagan Arabs of the Prophet’s time, who, in the view of most jurists, were not given the option of becoming a treaty people.

The Conduct of War

Islamic Law, basing itself on the Quran and Ḥadīth, devotes considerable attention to the conduct of war. Its principles are based upon such texts as 2:190: And fight in the way of God against those who fight against you, but do not transgress. Truly God loves not the transgressors; and a ḥadīth in which the Prophet said, “Do not kill weak old men, small children, or women.” The canonical books of Ḥadīth record that when the Prophet dispatched his armies, he would command them to fight in the way of God, but not to act brutally, kill children, women, or old men, mutilate the dead, or mutilate animals. Many similar injunctions were given by the early Caliphs and were expanded upon in the formation of classical Islamic Law. Beyond the sparing of noncombatants, Muslims were explicitly ordered not to cut down fruit-bearing trees, kill animals except for the purposes of sustenance, harm monks and hermits, or go beyond certain bounds even in the case of combatants (mutilation, etc.). These commands, which also extend to the rights of animals and plants and the protection of the natural environment, are part of a binding law, not merely a theory of just war. Muslims are just as obliged to obey these prohibitions, in all conditions, as they are to refrain from wine and adultery.

Limits of Conquest

Having surveyed questions regarding the legitimate use of force and its bearing on religious identity, we might consider the question of whether the Quran sanctions the use of force by Muslims against non-Muslims who pose no active, imminent, or even likely threat with the goal of asserting sovereignty over them. That is to say, does the Quran enjoin Muslims to attempt to gain political control over non-Muslims even while allowing them to remain non-Muslim as ahl ad-dhimma, or “people of treaty,” and does it do so for no other reason than that they are non-Muslim? As described above, the Quran always frames the use of force in terms of moral principles, whether it be a response to expulsion, religious persecution, or threat of attack, not to mention basic self-defense. Why, then, did Muslims take control of territory beyond the Arabian Peninsula? Why should Muslims have set out to conquer more lands at all? A straightforward argument could be made in support of fighting to conquer Makkah, the town from which the Muslims had been forced to emigrate, and one could also justify the taking of the territory of other tribes who had previously allied with the Quraysh and consistently displayed hostility toward the Muslim community. But did the early Muslim community have the moral authority to conquer the remainder of Arabia? Byzantium? Persia?

The decades after the death of the Prophet were a tumultuous time, and on questions related to war and politics it is difficult to speak of a consensus in the Muslim community. However, there was an explicit sense among at least some in the early community that, when they fought, they were fighting not for hegemony and conquest for their own sake or to make the world’s population Muslim, but for the survival of the religion itself. During one of the early civil wars, ʿAbd Allāh ibn ʿUmar, the son of the second Caliph, was asked why he was not fighting, and he said, “Son of my brother, Islam is built upon five things: belief in God and His Messenger, the five prayers, the fast of Ramadan, giving the alms, and performing the ḥajj.” His interlocutor then quoted to him 49:9: If two parties among the believers fall to fighting, make peace between them. And if one of them aggresses against the other, fight those who aggress until they return to God’s Command. And if they return, make peace between them with justice and act equitably. Truly God loves the just. ʿAbd Allāh ibn ʿUmar responded, “We did that during the time of the Prophet, when Islam was trifling, when a man would be tried regarding his religion, and they would either kill him or torture him. But then Islam became great, and there was no trial (fitnah).”

Though uttered in a specific context, this statement conditions the use of force on the prospect of the survival of the religion and the threat of extreme religious persecution to the point of forced conversion. The precariousness of the Muslims’ situation in the early days is alluded to in such verses as 8:26: And remember when you were few, deemed weak in the land, fearing that the people would snatch you away. Then He sheltered you, and strengthened you with His help, and provided you with good things, that haply you may give thanks. The Quran also tells the believers not to be concerned about the fact that their enemies are free to come and go in the land (3:196; 40:4), while they are weak and live in a state of fear, because the final fate for disbelievers is Hell.

One could argue that to the Companions it was not at all obvious that Islam as a religion could survive if they did not take an active role in establishing a political, military, and cultural environment robust and resilient enough to protect it; in those early times the first generation pushed the borders of the Islamic political entity for fear that the spiritual message of Islam would not last long in the world if they did not do so. They did not live on an island. Despite the somewhat persistent notion that the Arabs lived in a land that was a backwater ignored by the civilizations around it, Arabia, or at least the Ḥijāz, was very much connected to the rest of the ancient world, and the early Muslim community often felt the concrete threat of the Byzantines and Persians, through their Ghassanid and Lakhmid allies to the north, for example. (Recall the maxim mentioned earlier, “When the Byzantines are not campaigned against, they campaign.”) In one incident a prominent opponent of the Prophet is recorded as having conspired with the Byzantines and as part of his plot built a mosque or place of prayer in Madinah known as the “mosque of harm,” spoken of in 9:107: And as for those who established a mosque for harm and disbelief, and to divide the believers, and to be an outpost for those who made war on God and His Messenger before, they will surely swear, “We desire only what is best.” But God bears witness that truly they are liars.

But does Islamic Law treat the entire world as hostile until conquered? The often invoked delineation between the “Abode of Islam” (dār al-islām) and the “Abode of War” (dār al-barb), a terminology not found in the Quran or Ḥadīth, is a relic of a period of history when empires or kingdoms could go to war at any time in the absence of a treaty. This is precisely what “Abode of War” meant: an area that had not signed a treaty and hence was a potential aggressor. However, the Abode of War and the Abode of Islam, even in the context of this taxonomy in classical Islamic Law, were never a simple bifurcation, since there were also the “Abode of Treaty” or the “Abode of Safety” (dār al-ṣulḥ or dār al-amn), referring to lands with whom a treaty or pact existed, and other designations to describe the political status of a territory.

Although contemporary observers can and should judge the morality of the use of force by premodern caliphs, kings, and emperors, we cannot use in that judgment the standards under which most of us were born. In 1928 the Kellogg-Briand pact was the first major systematic attempt in an international context to renounce war as an instrument of national policy. Previously, what protected states against each other were military deterrence and treaties. Over the course of the fourteenth/twentieth century, the Nuremberg Principles, the Charter of the United Nations, and the Geneva Conventions laid the foundation for current international law, which, needless to say, is not always followed by nations in the world even today. These agreements constitute binding treaties between the signatories. They make military aggression between states illegal and, among other things, forbid the acquisition of territory by war, define war crimes during the conduct of war, and govern the treatment of prisoners, civilians, and combatants. In a certain sense the international system renders the default status of the entire world the Abode of Treaty.

Although it is true that some authorities throughout Islam’s long history have interpreted the Islamic law of war as giving Muslims unqualified permission to conquer and expand into territory controlled by non-Muslims or in extreme cases to bring the entire world under their dominion, this has remained a minority view. The complex history of the first generation of Muslim conquest can be interpreted more plausibly as a stage in the history of Islam when the future existence of the religion was far from certain and when expansion meant survival.

Indeed, it is worth considering whether the Companions of the Prophet had any particular taste for conquest for its own sake. The Quran seems to suggest in 2:216 that they did not: \textit{Fighting has been prescribed for you, though it is hateful to you. But it may be that you hate a thing though it be good for you, and it may be that you love a thing though it be evil for you.} Some commentators note the war-weariness of many Companions and their desire to return to a peaceful life in the homes from which they had been expelled, understanding the Quran to promise in 24:55 that fighting will come to an end: God has promised those among you who believe and perform righteous deeds that He will surely make them vicegerents upon the earth, as He caused those before them to be vicegerents, and that He will establish for them their religion, which He has approved for them, and that He will surely change them from a state of fear to security.

The foregoing remarks have been focused upon the first generation of Muslims, whose example Muslims consider normative, but even in that generation matters are complicated by the intra-Muslim conflict that began with the Wars of Repudiation (riddah), in which many tribes of Arabia tried to secede from central rule in Madinah, as well as by the later assassination of the third Caliph, ʿUthmān, and the ensuing civil wars. If, for the sake of simplicity, we focus on the reigns of the first two Caliphs, Abū Bakr and ʿUmar, we note that these were not men who employed force for the sake of glory in this world, but were humble and self-effaced. Abū Bakr walked out on foot with an army, to the embarrassment of a younger general. ʿUmar famously walked into Jerusalem, because it was his servant’s time to ride. Nor were they zealots whose asceticism was a mask for fanaticism. Abū Bakr set down strict rules for fighting. ʿUmar, for all his legendary brusqueness, took control of Jerusalem with proverbial gallantry and chivalry. They were often quite ambivalent about their conquests and the exercise of power. For example, far from being delighted at acquiring the wealth of the Persians, ʿUmar was quite dismayed at what it might do to the souls of his soldiers. Focusing on Abū Bakr and ʿUmar is useful not because the motivations of the first two Caliphs were different from those of the third and fourth, but because it allows us to see the issue unclouded by the theological and political issues that arose after them as a consequence of the civil wars sparked initially by the assassination of ʿUthmān.

Those who are fair-minded about Islamic history must be ready to acknowledge, at least in principle, that in particular historical situations the drive to expand Islamic rule was not completely justifiable according to the moral structure outlined in the Quran, but was at least partially the result of ordinary caprice, or hawā, to use Quranic terminology. It is true that throughout Islam’s history large parts of the Islamic world became Muslim at the hands of saintly figures, but some territory was also conquered by tyrants and rulers who could be accurately described using the words of the queen of Sheba in 27:34: *Verily kings, when they enter a town, corrupt it, and make the most honorable of its people the most abased. Such a mixed history is something the Islamic world has in common with every other major civilization. Accepting this view enables contemporary observers to interpret the actions of the early community based upon the ethical principles laid out in the Quran and the Hadith and provides a framework by which to judge properly whether to celebrate or condemn the conduct of later Muslims when they resorted to force or military action.

Finally, any impulse toward world domination and the imposition of unitary rule by one religion, Muslim or otherwise, over all people should surely be tempered by such unequivocal verses as 5:48:

And We have sent down unto thee the Book in truth, confirming the Book that came before it, and as a protector over it. So judge between them in accordance with that which God has sent down, and follow not their caprices away from the truth that has come unto thee. For each among you We have appointed a law and a way. And had God willed, He would have made you one community, but [He willed otherwise], that He might try you in that which He has given you. So vie with one another in good deeds. Unto God shall be your return all together, and He will inform you of that wherein you differ.

In more than one place the Quran assumes the existence of multiple religious communities and even describes the Muslim community’s role in relation to them, addressing Muslims in 2:143: Thus did We make you a middle community, that you may be witnesses for mankind and that the Messenger may be a witness for you (cf. 22:78). This verse and those that mention that God could have made humanity one community (e.g., 5:48) do not call upon Muslims to realize dominance or even to strive for the spread of Islam among all peoples. This principle was acknowledged by many jurists who described most or all of the verses in the Quran pertaining to the use of force as applying to those enemies whom the Muslims were facing during the time of the revelation, although they also provide guidelines for conduct in other situations to come later in history. Sometimes classical commentators dismissed openly the idea that the Quran intended for the world to be conquered by Islam, if only because such an event had not in fact taken place and the existence of such a stated or predicted goal in the Quran would thus have been theologically problematic.
Remembering the Tradition

Though the Quran is the first source for Islamic Law, and hence for any law of war, it has always been understood in light of its overall teachings on right and wrong as well as the life and teachings of the Prophet (the Sunnah) and the scholarly tradition since then. Our contemporary situation has highlighted the importance of having recourse to the insights provided by the learned tradition of Muslim jurists and theologians as well as the danger of reading parts of the legal teachings of the Quran without regard for the whole law itself, although in some important cases Muslim jurists themselves have not always agreed on the application of the Quran to matters of war and some have arguably gone beyond what the plain sense of the text allows. Moreover, today some extremist critics and proponents of Islam have often removed and continue to remove verses of the Quran from their context and have dismissed (through ignorance or misdirection) over a thousand years of legal doctrine and interpretation.

In regulating war, Islamic Law does not espouse belligerence, any more than regulating sexuality encourages licentiousness. Yet Islam’s ideal of peace does not make it pacifist, and thus a proper understanding depends on avoiding the extremes of viewing Islam as an inherently warlike religion or of trying to portray it as a quietist one. Rather, its ideal is the establishment of harmony based on justice to the extent possible. The Islamic rules of war and peace have been followed throughout Islamic history with varying degrees of success, and in a minority of cases were openly violated, but anecdotal evidence of such cases should not distract from the Quranic sources and principles codified later in the legal tradition and followed in most instances in Islamic history.

Many Muslim jurists have conceived the fundamental objectives of Islamic Law to be the maintenance and protection of life, religion, mind, lineage or dignity, and property, and they view these five as indispensable rights that individuals need in order to live within a just society. As part of Islamic Law, the rules governing the use of force are directed toward those very same principles and are constrained by them. These principles prohibit Muslims from becoming brutal aggressors, without leaving them defenseless in the face of danger or attack, thus preserving and protecting these fundamental rights, and are predicated upon the striving for justice, the protection of innocents, and the acceptance of other religions. This is the least, and the most, that can be expected from any law when it comes to war.
DEATH, DYING, AND THE AFTERLIFE IN THE QURAN

Hamza Yusuf

In his magnum opus, Revival of the Religious Sciences, Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (d. 505/1111) begins the chapter on death with the following passage:

Praise be to God, who with death did break the necks of tyrants, shattering with it the backs of Persia’s kings, cutting short the aspirations of the Caesars, whose hearts were long averse to recalling death, until the true promise came to them and cast them into the pit. From the loftiest of palaces to the deepest of graves, they passed, and from the light of the cradle into the sepulcher’s gloom. From dallying with maidens and boys into sustaining insects and worms, they passed; from reveling in food and drink into wallowing in the earth; from the friendliness of company into the forlornness of solitude; and from the soft couch into the woeful perdition. See if they had found any strength and protection from death, or taken against it a barrier and refuge. See Dost thou perceive even one of them, or hear from them a murmur? [19:98].

From the earliest days of Islam, following the example of the Prophet, Muslims have made the remembrance of death a foundational spiritual practice. The impermanence of the world is a recurring theme in the Quran. Hardly a page can be found that does not contain references to the “fleeting life of this world” or “this world and the Hereafter” or a reminder of the day that would make children gray-haired (73:17). Without death, it is questionable whether we would have any need for religion at all. At a fundamental level, religion’s greatest claim is making sense of the reality of death, which relentlessly impinges on our living consciousness.

One of the most singular aspects of the pre-Islamic Arabia in which the Quran was revealed is the fact that the Arabs of the day, notwithstanding a small number of Christian Arabs and an even smaller number of primordial monotheists known as ḥanīfs, did not believe in an Afterlife, although they followed their own form of religion. Death was the end of the road for them, and “immortality” lay in the praises of poets, not in the reality of the Afterlife promised by the prophets. The Quran describes the pre-Islamic Arabs’ nihilistic attitude toward life and death: They say, “There is naught but our life in this world. We die and we live, and none destroys us save time.” But they have no knowledge thereof. They do naught but conjecture (45:24).

In the Quran, the Arabs’ denial of the resurrection of the dead is addressed and refuted in several simple yet engaging metaphors. It declares repeatedly that all things in this world have been made in pairs, of which the duality of life and death is a central one, highlighted in sundry verses. Coupled with life and death is the other essential pairing of this world (dunya) with the Afterlife (ākhirah), a pairing whose sign, the Quran declares, should be discerned alongside Heaven and earth, both of which are commonly repeated motifs in the scripture. Given that all things in this world are created in paired opposites, it would follow that this world also has its opposite, which is the next world. Furthermore, as this world is temporal, its opposite is logically speaking eternal.

Another important Quranic motif is the evolving process of life itself. Gray hairs, which begin to emerge at the spiritually significant age of forty, are referred to as a warner (nadhīr), exegetes say; they should cause those who have lived long enough to see them to be reminded of death. As for those who do not heed the warning, after death

They will cry out therein, “Our Lord! Remove us, that we may work righteousness other than that which we used to do.” “Did We not give you long life, enough for whosoever would reflect to reflect therein? And the warner came unto you, so taste [the punishment]! And the wrongdoers shall have no helpers.” (35:37)

The imagery of gray hairs is borrowed by the poet Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muhammad ibn Saʿīd al-Būṣīrī (d. 695/1294) in his poem in praise of the Prophet, The Cloak (al-Burdah):

This self of mine that commands me to evil
Has blindly ignored the warnings of gray hairs and the approach of old age.
Nor has it prepared a banquet of beautiful deeds for this unexpected guest
Who’s alighted on my head, shamelessly refusing to leave.
Had I known, I would have shown him no honor—
I would have covered over his obvious secret with black dye!²

The importance of the age of forty, when the trajectory of life begins its descent toward death, is accentuated in the Prophet Muhammad’s life. He began to receive the revelation of the Quran at the age of forty, a turning point from the old age of youth to the youth of old age. As the Prophet approached forty, he began meditating in the cave at Ḥirā’, and when he was forty, the Archangel Gabriel revealed himself to the Prophet for the first time. “Recite!” was the Archangel’s command. In this initial revelation we are reminded, Nay, truly man is rebellious in that he considers himself beyond need. Truly unto thy Lord is the return (96:6–8). Human dependence on and need for God are central to the Quran’s message, and they become most obvious when we meditate on our inability to ward off old age and death. Devout Muslims are encouraged to read every day Sūrah 56, entitled “The Event,” one of the myriad Quranic names for the Day of Judgment. This sūrah provides a profound meditation on death, the categories of people in the Afterlife and their states, and reflections on the signs of the Resurrection that are evident in everyday events of this world. The sūrah challenges those who do not believe in the Resurrection: Why, then, when it (the person’s last breath) reaches the throat, while you are then looking on—and We are nearer to him than you, though you see not—why, then, if you are unconstrained, do you not return it, if you are truthful? (56:83–87)

The Quranic theme of human beings’ return to God includes the instruction to repent before death in order to avoid the calamities of an unrepentant life. The signs (āyāt) to be read come from the Lord, and among the greatest of them is death. A sign, however, signifies something that requires interpretation. It has no meaning in and of itself, but indicates meanings that transcend the sign itself.
What is this sign from God that the Quran calls death? What is its meaning?
Why does its aroma suffuse the entire Book? The Quran states: They have taken gods apart from Him, who . . . have no power over death, or life, or resurrection (25:3); Say, “Then ward off death from yourselves, if you are truthful” (3:168); and Wheresoever you may be, death will overtake you, though you should be in towers raised high (4:78). These and other verses remind us that we are powerless in the pervasive presence of death, which takes us back to our Lord and has the power even in this earthly life to awaken our higher senses to our real calling, which is to know and worship our Lord and to prepare for meeting Him on that day that is the only tomorrow that matters ultimately.

An unidentified voice from Pharaoh’s inner circle summarizes this message when he warns Pharaoh and his council:

O my people! Follow me; I shall guide you unto the way of rectitude. O my people! The life of this world is but fleeting enjoyment, whereas the Hereafter is truly the Abode of Permanence. Whosoever commits an evil deed will not be requited, save with the like thereof; but whosoever, whether male or female, performs a righteous deed and is a believer shall enter the Garden wherein they will be provided for without reckoning. (40:38–40)

This summary of the message of the Quran reminds us that worldly life is fleeting, but our decisions here will have either negative or positive repercussions in another world. Since that other world is a permanent one, wisdom counsels belief and good actions.

“Death” and Its Various Usages in the Quran

A classic methodology employed by the great Quranic exegetes was to examine key Arabic words in the Quran, identifying themes and exploring the semantic webs of meanings embedded within them. The derivative nature of Arabic words facilitates this approach, as most can be reduced to three-letter roots from which the various possible meanings are derived. In addition to this method, traditional exegetes also explored the contextual meanings of terms as they shifted throughout the book.

Al-Rāghib al-Īsfahānī (d. 502/1108) clarifies the different usages of the term “death” in the Quran as follows:

The types of death are consistent with the types of life. The first relates to the power of regeneration that exists in plants, animals, and human beings and is referred to in Sūrat al-Rūm, “The Byzantines": He revives the earth after its death (30:19). The second is the condition of being insensate and is intended in Mary’s plea, Would that I had died before this (19:23). The third is the loss of the faculty of intelligence, which is the state of ignorance, reflected in the verse, He who was dead, and to whom We give life, making for him a light by which to walk among mankind (6:122). The fourth type is a state of depression where life becomes unbearable, as is meant in the verse, Death shall come upon him from every side; yet he will not die (14:17). The fifth is death that means sleep, as it is said in a proverb, “Sleep is the light death, and death is the heavy sleep.” This meaning is indicated in the verses He it is Who takes your souls by night (6:60) and God takes souls at the moment of their death, and those that die not during their sleep (39:42).

REGENERATION AFTER DEATH

The first type of death has to do with growth and the power of regeneration after death. The Quran conveys the idea of life as growth and death as decay, decline, and desiccation. Many verses use the image of the dead earth brought back to life as an analogy for the Resurrection. In Sūrah 22, al-Ḥajj, two analogies for the Resurrection are given. The first is embryological, and the second is agricultural. The surāh begins with a reminder of the end of time and its inevitability as well as the tremendous terror of a day that will cause every pregnant woman to miscarry (22:2). Then follows a challenge:

*O mankind! If you are in doubt concerning the Resurrection, [remember] We created you from dust, then from a drop, then from a blood clot, then from a lump of flesh, formed and unformed, that We may make clear for you. And We cause what We will to remain in the wombs for a term appointed. Then We bring you forth as an infant, then that you may reach maturity. And some are taken in death, and some are consigned to the most abject life, so that after having known they may know nothing. And thou seest the earth desiccated, but when We send down water upon it, it stirs and swells and produces every delightful kind.* (22:5)
The human embryonic stages are highlighted in this verse, reminding us that we came from mere dust and are created out of lifeless matter. This fact itself should be proof that the Resurrection is possible, given that the One who created us once can surely do so again.

The second analogy the Quran provides was more accessible to the desert Arabs at the time of the Prophet Muhammad, for the dramatic and lifeless topography of the desert revealed to them sudden regeneration each year:

And thou seest the earth desiccated, but when We send down water upon it, it stirs and swells and produces every delightful kind. That is because God is the Truth, and because He gives life to the dead, and because He is Powerful over all things, and because the Hour is coming, in which there is no doubt, and because God will resurrect whosoever is in the graves. (22:5–7)

SENTIENT DEATH

The second type of death is the death of feeling or the empathic life of the human heart. Many verses in the Quran berate the hard-hearted, who exhibit no compassion, and refer to the disbelievers as unaware and unfeeling. The Quran makes reference in several verses to the need for “spiritual growth” through purification (tazkiyah): Indeed, he prospers who purifies it (his soul). And indeed he fails who obscures it (91:9–10). This spiritual growth is along a path of states and stations that is mapped out in the Quran. Thus, death becomes a metaphor for the death of the lower soul and its possible restoration to life and growth in a more perfect state.

INTELLECTUAL DEATH

The third type is the death of intelligence understood in its traditional sense. The Quran categorizes some people as deaf, dumb, blind, and with hardened heart (the heart is the seat of intelligence)—in other words, intellectually insensate. In other verses, this state is likened to a type of death: Is he who was dead, and to whom We give life, making for him a light by which to walk among mankind, like unto one who is in darkness from which he does not emerge? (6:122). This morbidity of the spirit resulting from lack of guidance can be reversed through a type of spiritual resurrection as illustrated in 6:122. Yet another metaphor for the heart’s revival with spiritual truths is that of rain, which gives life to the earth after a prolonged drought:

Has not the time come for those who believe that their hearts be humbled to the remembrance of God and the truth that has come down, and to be not like those who were given the Book aforetime? But the span of time was too long for them, such that their hearts hardened and many of them are iniquitous. Know that God revives the earth after its death. We have indeed made the signs clear for you, that haply you may understand. (57:16–17)

Many ḥāḍīth also refer to the spiritual death of the heart that prevents it from functioning as the seat of intelligence, so that it requires spiritual therapy in order to be revived. Spiritual death is, however, also seen in a pristine light and associated with the gaining of a new spiritual life. The Prophet in fact recommended to his followers, “Die before you die.”⁶ The death in this recommendation is called death chosen by free will (al-mawt al-ikhtiyārī); it is contrasted with the forced death (al-mawt al-ijbārī) that all beings experience at the end of their earthly life and over which they have no control.

DESPAIR AND PSYCHOLOGICAL DEATH
The fourth type of death takes the form of despair and psychological misery in which life is experienced as devoid of meaning and even pleasure. This state was well known in pre-Islamic Arabian poetry, as seen in the following verse by Ibn al-Raʿlā:

The only real dead person is one who is depressed,
Plagued with grief, without hope.⁷

This fourth type of death also relates to the state of one who is in the Fire, who neither dies therein nor lives (87:13). The Quran warns that worldly preoccupation distracts us from the inevitability of death and results in spiritual sloth. This type of spiritual death is akin to the Catholic deadly sin of acedia. The Quran says:

O you who believe! Let neither your property nor your children divert you from the remembrance of God. And whosoever does so, it is they who are the losers. And spend of that which We have provided you before death comes upon one of you and he says, “My Lord, wouldst that Thou grant me reprieve until a term nigh, that I may give charity and be among the righteous!” Yet God will not grant any soul reprieve when its term has come. And God is Aware of whatsoever you do. (63:9–11)

In this vein, the Prophet is reported to have said, “Those who make all of their aspirations of this world one aspiration [that of the next world], God will take care of all of their other aspirations.”

DEATH AS SLEEP

Finally, the fifth type of death mentioned by al-Rāghib al-Iṣfahānī is related to sleep. The Quran says: He it is Who takes your souls by night. . . . Then by day He resurrects you (6:60); and God takes souls at the moment of their death, and those that die not during their sleep. He withholds those for whom He has decreed death, and sends forth the others till a term appointed (39:42). One of the signs relating sleep to death in these verses is the inevitability of both; in both cases we are powerless to exercise our will. The “gentle tyrant” of sleep that overpowers us is like death. At night, sleep conquers even the most powerful, leaving them lifeless—a daily reminder of death’s inevitable overpowering presence, to which all must succumb. Sleep is regarded as a little death, and death, when compared to the reality of earthly life, can be considered a great sleep.

Likewise, each awakening is a reminder of our inevitable resurrection. As the Prophet has said, “Man is asleep, and when he dies he awakens.” In sleep, we find ourselves in the world of dreams, often of expanded time and fantastic experiences, only to awake to the reality of our earthly lives. The Prophet’s prayer upon waking was, “Praise be to the One who brought me back to life after causing me to die, and to God is the Resurrection.” And the Resurrection is experienced as an awakening for people in their graves: And the trumpet will be blown. Then, behold, they will rush forth from their graves unto their Lord. They will say, “Oh, woe unto us! Who has raised us from our place of sleep?” “This is that which the Compassionate did promise; and the message bearers spoke true” (36:51–52).

Meditating upon sleep as a reminder of one’s mortality and equating it with the sleeplike state we enter into when in the grave, which culminates in the awakening of the Resurrection, is a Prophetic practice to which many Muslims adhere to this day. The many types of reminders of death found in the Quran as outlined by al-Rāghib al-Iṣfahānī are meant to motivate us to actively prepare, mentally and spiritually, for the attainment of a promised abode, for a life of unlimited grace and enjoyment, rather than the threatening abode of indescribable terror and pain.

After Death

Human beings are created in stages, the Quran states, and continue their lives through a series of movements that lead inevitably to one of two abodes: the Garden or the Fire. Death, like birth, is but one in a series of stages leading to our final destination. The exit from this lower and temporal world occurs through death, which is the cessation of what we experience as biological life. The Quran states: Every soul shall taste death, and you will indeed be paid your reward in full on the Day of Resurrection. And whosoever is distanced from the Fire and made to enter the Garden has certainly triumphed. And the life of this world is naught but the enjoyment of delusion (3:185).

Several Quranic verses remind us that the next life is indeed the real life. For example, The life of this world is naught but diversion and play. And surely the Abode of the Hereafter is life indeed, if they but knew (29:64). Furthermore, disdain is expressed for those who prefer this life to the next, who seek the perishable over the permanent. The Quran views this preference for the temporary over the everlasting as a delusional state that will quickly dissolve into remorse as the reality of death overwhelms us upon its occurrence: Vying for increase distracts you, till you visit the graves (102:1–2). In addition, You were indeed heedless of this (the Afterlife). Now We have removed from you your cover; so today your sight is piercing (50:22; this verse refers to the awakening to which the Prophet referred in the ḥadīth cited above).

The Quran also indicates that immense spiritual unveilings occur at death. For those who have squandered their lives without the requisite preparation, there is great remorse. Everyone experiences a profound spiritual awakening upon death, but for the heedless in this world it results in nothing but remorse, which, then, is of no avail. Several verses indicate also that if such people were allowed to go back, they would return to a life of worldly pleasures.
ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, the Prophet’s cousin and the fourth Caliph, is also associated with the Prophetic saying, “People are asleep, and when they die, they awaken.” This initial awakening occurs at the moment a person is visited by the Angel of Death, who is known as ʿIzrāʾīl (Azrael). The Prophet explained that ʿIzrāʾīl seizes all souls in another dimension of reality; this enables him to be in all the various appointed earthly times in his own celestial time, which is experienced here as the time of death of a particular person. The Quran states, The angel of death, who has been entrusted with you, will take you (tawaffā); then unto your Lord shall you be returned (32:11). The word used in this verse, tawaffā, is another word for “to cause to die”; the more common term is yumīt, from which the Divine Name al-Mumīt (“the Causer of Death”) is derived. The root of the verb tawaffā is wafā, which means “to fulfill, to remain faithful, to repay a debt, to recompense.” In this particular verse, tawaffā means “to receive or take to oneself,” as in “God receives the soul of one who dies.” In other words, God causes us to die and then receives us in order to recompense us for our actions on earth.

As the Quran explains, people experience the moment of their individual death differently in accordance with how they lived. For believers who have led good lives, the transition from life to death is one of ease and repose. The traditional Christian saying, “He who lives well dies well,” has its exact Arabic equivalent: man ʿāsha saʿidan māta saʿidan. According to Islamic teachings, at the moment of death, angels address the believers, Fear not, nor grieve, and rejoice in the Garden that you have been promised (41:30). As for the disbelievers, the angels begin pouncing on them. The Quran states, And if only thou couldst see when the angels take those who disbelieve, striking their faces and their backs, and [saying], “Taste the punishment of the burning!” (8:50; cf. 6:93).

The wrongdoers will plead to be given a second chance, as the Quran says, till, when death comes to one of them, he says, “My Lord! Return me, that haply I may work righteousness with regard to that which I left.” Nay, but these are [mere] words that he speaks. And behind them is a barrier till the Day they are resurrected (23:99–100).

The Intermediate State Between Death and Resurrection (Barzakh)

The period after death until the Day of Judgment is known as the barzakh, or intermediate state, although, according to some scholars, in Islamic eschatology it could also refer to a state similar to the Christian concept of purgatory. The barzakh involves the experience of waking up completely as if from a deep sleep. During this period, a spiritual awakening occurs with an experience of heightened consciousness. Immense remorse for the squandered opportunity is experienced at this stage by those who did not make the necessary preparation. The duration of the barzakh is not known. The Quran states that it will seem like it was a day or an hour of a day (46:35). The deceased’s experience of time is radically altered. As the Quran says, And on the Day when the Hour is come, the guilty will swear that they had tarried naught but an hour; thus were they perverted. And those who have been given knowledge and belief will say, “Indeed, you tarried in God’s Book until the Day of Resurrection; and this is the Day of Resurrection! But you knew not (30:55–56).

The righteous will find the barzakh a pleasant experience: a sense of relief will set in as they grow aware of release from the trials of the previous world and the prospect of the delights of the next. According to others, the barzakh is the state in which those who must be purified further find themselves and where they remain until they are fully purified and made worthy of entering Paradise.

The waiting period in the barzakh is akin to what is taught in Catholicism concerning limbo, as those needing further purification during this time can benefit from the prayers said and deeds done by the living in their name. This of course does not preclude praying for the dead whom one considers to be not in the barzakh, but in Paradise. Actions that Muslims have traditionally performed for the dead include: praying and seeking forgiveness, making a pilgrimage on their behalf; giving charity on their behalf; and reciting the Quran and gifting their own reward.

Although some dispute the merit and efficacy of these practices, Abu’l-Walid Muḥammad ibn Rushd (d. 595/1198), like many others, argues that when a difference of opinion occurs concerning the Mercy of God, one should side with the vastness of God’s Mercy; hence, he sees no real debate regarding the merit of these actions. The Quran says, And those who came after them say, “Our Lord! Forgive us and our brothers who preceded us in faith, and place no rancor in our hearts toward those who believe” (59:10). The angels also ask forgiveness for the righteous, while they are alive as well as after they die: The angels hymn the praise of their Lord and seek forgiveness for those on earth (42:5). Funeral prayers are also considered a source of intercession by the living for the dead. The great polymath Yaḥyā ibn Sharaf al-Nawawī (d. 676/1278) says in his Remembrances (al-Adhkār), “It is encouraged for the visitor of a graveyard to recite the Quran, remember God, and pray for the people in the graves, as well as for the rest of the dead, and for all the Muslims.”

This period in the grave is the first of the “stages of the Afterlife” (manāzil al-ākhirah). The Prophet is reported to have said, “The grave is the first of the stages of the next life. If one passes through it safely, then what follows is easier than it. However, if one fails at this first stage, what follows is more severe than it.” The Quran states: And he has set forth for Us a parable and forgotten his own creation, saying, “Who revives these bones, decayed as they are?” Say, “He will revive them Who brought them forth the first time, and He knows every creation” (36:78–79).

The Questioning in the Grave (Suʾāl al-Qabr)

The initial phase of the barzakh is the questioning in the grave. After the deceased is laid to rest in the grave and the burial is complete, two angels, Munkar and Nakīr, visit the deceased and ask that person a series of questions. Some ḥādīth indicate that those who lay the deceased to rest in the grave should recite the proper answers to the deceased; this is known as talqīn and is often practiced in Muslim burials. The basis of the angels’ questioning is explained in the Quran: God makes firm those who believe with firm speech in the life of this world and in the Hereafter (14:27). Exegetes say that the firm speech (qawl thābit) refers to the correct responses the deceased provides to the angels’ questions.

Those with the correct responses to the questioning in the grave are protected from the terror of the barzakh (faẓaʿ al-barzakh), which precedes the greatest terror (al-faẓaʿ al-akbar), which is mentioned in 21:103: The greatest terror shall not grieve them, and the angels shall receive them. “This is your Day, which you were promised.” Each person is asked the questions appropriate to his or her respective community. The Prophet’s community includes those who believed in him and his message as well as those who were called to believe in him. The following ḥadīth describes what happens to the deceased upon burial:

Surely when a servant is placed in his grave and his friends depart, even as he hears their sandals striking the earth, two angels appear and sit him up and then ask him, “What do you say about this man?”
meaning Muhammad. As for the believer, he says, “I testify that he is the servant of God and His messenger.” It is said, “Look at your place in Hell; it has been changed to a place in Paradise,” and he looks upon both. Then his grave is made an expanse of seventy cubits, and it is filled with green foliage until the Day of Resurrection. As for the disbeliever, or the hypocrite, he is asked what he said about this man [Muhammad], and he will reply, “I do not know. I simply said what the people said.” The angels say, “You do not know! Nor did you follow.” And they begin to pound him with iron hammers between his ears, and he screams a scream heard by everyone around except spirits and human beings. His grave becomes so constricted that his ribs burst.\(^\text{18}\)

The End of Time

The end of time is also known as al-sāʾah, which is perhaps best glossed as “the Moment” or “the Hour.” Al-Rāghib al-İṣfahānī says three “last hours” occur: the moment of one’s death, which is called the lesser hour (al-sāʾah al-ṣughrā); the end of a generation, which occurs when an entire generation of people die (e.g., the generation of World War I); and the actual Hour when this world is terminated and the eschaton is initiated. This period is preceded by signs, one of which is the coming of the Prophet Muhammad, who said, “I was sent in the presence of the Final Hour.”\(^\text{19}\) The Quran states, Do they await taught but that the Hour should come upon them suddenly? Yet its portents have already come. Then when it has come upon them, what will their remembrance do for them? (47:18). Many verses warn of this apocalyptic apotheosis.\(^\text{20}\)

The signs of the end of the world are numerous and extensively described in the Ḥadīth and to a lesser extent in the Quran. Among them are the splitting of the moon (54:1), which Muslims believe to be a miracle performed by the Prophet when challenged by the Quraysh; a clear smoke (dukhān) that arises over people (see 44:10–11c); and a beast who emerges from the earth (27:82), although al-Rāghib al-İṣfahānī does not consider it necessarily an animal. The period preceding the greater signs is one of immense disequilibrium, widespread corruption and oppression, and the inversion of the natural order. The Prophet also predicted that Arabs would vie with one another in constructing tall buildings and that some of Makkah’s mountains would be removed and the height of its buildings would surpass that of the surrounding mountains; religion would wane and commerce would wax; materialism would be rampant and human life considered of little value, with rioting and bloodshed to such a degree that “the killer will not know why he is killing, and the one killed why he is being killed.” Religion would continue to decline until it was almost entirely forgotten.

The trumpet blast initiating the Resurrection occurs once the earth is filled with atheists, and no one remains who utters the Name of God. What the Quran calls the Great Calamity (79:34) kills those remaining and arouses the dead from their graves. Then the Resurrection begins: And the trumpet will be blown, whereupon whosoever is in the heavens and on the earth will swoon, save those whom God wills. Then it will be blown again, and, behold, they will be standing, beholding (39:68). With the first blast, the general destruction occurs, and with the second, the bodily resurrection takes place, in which human beings are re-created with immortal bodies. The trumpet blast causes a shock so great that those already in the barzakh lose consciousness, and immediate death occurs for those remaining on earth.

Accompanying the first blast are several apocalyptic signs, such as the destruction of mountains (20:105–8; 69:13–14; 70:9), great earthquakes that cause the oceans to boil over, and events mentioned in this terrifying description:

> O mankind! Reverence your Lord. Truly the quaking of the Hour is a tremendous thing. On the day you see it, every nursing woman will forget what she nurses, and every pregnant woman will deliver her burden, and you will see mankind drunk, though drunk they will not be. Rather, the Punishment of God is severe. (22:1–2; see also 36:48–50)

The influential commentator Ismā‘īl ibn ʿUmar ibn Kathīr (d. 774/1373) says, “The first blast is that of the terror (faza‘). While people are in their marketplaces buying and selling, God commands the angel Isrāfīl, or Seraphiel, to blast the trumpet, which is heard throughout the earth. Humanity is then led to an earthly gathering place (maḥšar), followed by the swoon (ṣa‘q), whereby they all perish.”

The heavens and the earth are weighted down with the presence of the Hour
(7:187), when the entire universe is rolled back into its initial “singularity”: The whole earth shall be but a handful to Him on the Day of Resurrection, and the heavens will be enfolded in His right Hand (39:67). After an undefined period of time, at a second blast, people are raised out of their graves in an awakening akin to waking up from sleep and are compelled toward the great plain of gathering for the next phase, Judgment: A day when the trumpet is blown and you come forth in throngs, and the sky is opened as if it were gates (78:18–19). The blasts can symbolize the “destruction of forms by pure sound or transcendence, or again, the separation of forms and their contents.”

Many verses deal with these events, which follow the sequence of a blast (nafkh; see 18:99; 20:102–4), the initial awaking from the grave (baʿth and nushūr), and finally the Gathering (ḥashr). Muḥammad ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (d. 310/923) says, “Each nation will gather behind its respective prophet,” on the Day We shall call every people by their leader (17:71).

The Resurrection (Baʿth and Nashr)

Because the Arabs denied the resurrection of the dead, the Quran contains several verses highlighting its reasonableness and inevitability. The embryological and ecological “proofs” that were mentioned earlier can be found throughout the Quran. *Sūrah*s 22 and 51 in particular draw attention to dead earth revived by rain as a clear sign for the resurrection of the dead. Other examples from the Quran include: So observe the vestiges of God’s Mercy, how He revives the earth after its death. Truly that is the Reviver of the dead, and He is Powerful over all things (30:50); And God is He Who sends the winds, then they cause clouds to rise. Then We drive them to a land that is dead, and thereby revive the earth after its death. Thus shall be the Resurrection! (35:9).

As further proof of the Resurrection, the Quran cites how easy it is for God to accomplish any creative act, as in 17:51: Then they will say, “Who will bring us back?” Say, “He Who originated you the first time” (see also 2:148; 36:78–79; 56:47–50). Sūrah 56, al-Wāqiʿah, provides a litany of examples of God’s Power in order to establish God’s Ability to resurrect the dead. The Quran also responds to the atheists and naturalists who deny the Resurrection by declaring that they are only following their conjecture: the disbelievers say, There is naught but our first death, and we shall not be resurrected (44:35). In this same vein, 64:7 states: Those who disbelieve claim that they will not be resurrected. Say, “Yea! By my Lord! Surely you shall be resurrected. Then you shall be informed of that which you did; and that is easy for God.” Having created human beings the first time, God should surely find it, by our own reckoning, as easy to do the second time: He it is Who originates creation, then brings it back, and that is most easy for Him. Unto Him belongs the loftiest description in the heavens and on the earth, and He is the Mighty, the Wise (30:27).

Sūrah 50, Qāf, deals mostly with eschatological realities:

And listen on the Day when the caller calls from near at hand, on the Day when they hear the Cry of Truth; that is the Day of coming forth. . . . That Day the earth is split asunder from about them—as they hasten forth. That is a gathering easy for Us. We know best that which they say. Thine is not to compel them. So remind, by means of the Quran, those who fear My Threat. (50:41–42, 44–45)

In another sūrah, human beings are described as locusts: So turn away from them (the disbelievers) on the Day wherein the caller will call unto a terrible thing. With their eyes humbled they emerge from the graves as if they were scattered locusts, scrambling toward the caller. The disbelievers say, “This is a calamitous day.” (54:6–8)

Several verses describe this day as extremely difficult for the disbelievers (see, e.g., 74:8–10). Those who had denied it have immense regret, pleading for a second chance. Those who were expecting it are described as having no fear or grief. At this stage, there is no kinship between them (23:101), and on that Day a man will flee from his brother, and his mother and his father, and his spouse and his children (80:34–36).

According to the Prophet, the Resurrection occurs on Friday; thus Muslims are encouraged to prepare every Friday for this event with extra acts of devotion, and religious scholars recommend that the Friday sermon be peppered with reminders of death and the Resurrection. The Prophet stated that the animal kingdom is particularly sensitive to the coming of the eschaton, and in fact we see that animals display agitation just prior to any natural disaster, such as an earthquake. Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Qurṭubī (d. 671/1272) writes:

Once resurrected from their graves, all of humanity is not in one situation; nor will everyone stand together. They differ just as they differed in the worldly abode. There are five stations: the first is the Resurrection itself; the second is the movement and gathering for Judgment; the third is the Reckoning; the fourth is the movement to the place of recompense; and finally, the fifth is taking up residence in one of the two final abodes.

The “return” (maʿād) refers to the restoration of humanity’s place in the Divine Presence that preceded earthly existence. The Quran describes the pretemporal covenant in these terms:

And when thy Lord took from the Children of Adam, from their loins, their progeny and made them bear witness concerning themselves, “Am I not your Lord?” they said, “Yea, we bear witness”—lest you should say on the Day of Resurrection, “Truly of this we were heedless.” (7:172)

If a true messenger delivers the “reminder” to a community or, as in the case of the Prophet Muhammad, to all of humanity, the covenantal bond, both primordial and binding, should be enough to jar the preexistent memory of the original covenant that all of Adam’s progeny made with God.

The Gathering (al-Hashr)

The next stage of the Afterlife following the Resurrection is known as the Gathering. All the souls are driven without personal volition to what is known as the Plain of the Gathering (arḍ al-mahšar), which differs from the places of earthly gathering at the end of time. For atheists, this event is humiliating: We shall gather them on the Day of Resurrection upon their faces—blind, dumb, and deaf (17:97). For the righteous, it will be preceded by angels comforting them and reminding them that this is what they were promised. All the souls will find themselves directed to this vast gathering place and assembled with their kindred spirits, the good with the good and the bad with the bad, on that Day.

Once on the Plain of the Gathering, great fear and trepidation will grip most people. The Prophet has said that people will be up to their necks in sweat. The period of waiting here is described as unbearable; for many it is experienced as eons of time. Righteous Muslims will be able to drink from the cistern of the Prophet, and other prophets will have cisterns for their righteous followers. Because of different narrations, some scholars argue this will take place before people are called to cross a traverse (ṣirāt) into Paradise, and some say it will come after it. Still others argue that two cisterns, both called al-Kawthar, exist, one before the Gathering and the other after the traverse. The one who drinks from it will never suffer thirst. In his commentary “The Radiant Pearl” (al-Kharīdat al-bahiyyah), Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad al-Dardīr (d. 1201/1786) states:

The cistern of the Prophet has reached the level of factual reports given the number of traditions. In the two sound collections (al-Ṣaḥīḥ) of ḥadīth [al-Bukhārī and Muslim] the Prophet said, “My cistern is the length and breadth of a month’s journey. Its angles are equidistant. Its water is whiter than milk. Its odor is that of musk. Its cups are more numerous than the stars. Whoever drinks from it will never thirst.”

The Prophet said that he will know his people from the glow of their lustrations that were performed for their prayers in this world. In other words, the Prophet’s eye can discern what people have done in this world, and those who have been righteous will get to drink from the Prophet’s cistern.

At this point, the next phase ensues, that of the Great Intercession.

The Great Intercession (Shafā‘at al-Kubrā or al-Maṣām al-Maḥmūd)

The Prophet Muhammad was given by God the highest station, known as “the praiseworthy station,” alluded to in the verse It may be that thy Lord will resurrect thee in a praiseworthy station (17:79). This exalted station is reserved for him for the Day of Judgment, when all of humanity is gathered, naked, desolate, and filled with awe before the Divine Majesty. The Prophet said that, at this point, human beings will seek out Adam, the father of humanity, to intercede on their behalf. He will excuse himself and send them to Noah, who will also decline and send them on to another prophet. This process will continue with the other prophets, each of whom will excuse himself from interceding on their behalf. Finally, humanity will arrive at the last messenger, the Prophet Muhammad, who will accept the task and proceed to intercede with God on behalf of humanity. The prolonged period of waiting will end with his intercession, and the proceedings of the Reckoning will begin. This event occurs, if reckoned in earthly time, after an immense amount of time elapses, described as akin to fifty thousand years (70:4).

The Day of Reckoning (Yawm al-Ḥisāb)

The Day of Reckoning, or Day of Judgment, is mentioned in the opening sūrah of the Quran: Master of the Day of Judgment (1:4). The Quran refers to the Day of Judgment by several names. The most common of these is the Day of Resurrection, or more literally “the Day of Standing” (yawm al-qiyāmah). For example, the Quran says, Do you, then, believe in part of the Book and disbelieve in part? And what is the recompense of those who do so but disgrace in the life of this world? And on the Day of Resurrection they shall be consigned to the most terrible punishment (2:85).

Other names used to describe this day include the Day of Division (37:21; 44:40; 77:13–14, 38; 78:17), the Day of Regret (19:39), the Day of Victory (32:29), the Day of coming forth (50:42), the Day of Mutual Calling (40:32), the Day of the Meeting (40:15), the Day of the Imminent Event (40:18), as well as a calamitous day (76:10), a weighty day (76:27), a tremendous day (19:37), a Day in which there is no doubt (3:25), a day wherein there shall be neither bargaining nor befriending (14:31), a Day of Reckoning (38:16, 26, 53; 40:27; cf. 14:41); the Day of the Moment Known (15:38; 38:81); and the Day of the Threat (50:20). It is also called the Last Day (twenty-six places).

The Quran and Hadīth describe this time of reckoning as a terrible scene of suffering due to the sins of individuals, and these descriptions are likely to have indirectly inspired Dante’s visions of the Inferno. In fact, Islamic eschatology and the Ascension (miʿrāj) of the Prophet served as a source of inspiration for the whole of the Divine Comedy. According to traditional Islamic sources, arrogant people are resurrected no larger than ants and are stepped on by other people. Those who earn interest and lenders of usurious loans are resurrected as if they were mad; the Quran says, Those who devour usury shall not rise except as he whom Satan has deranged by his touch rises. That is because they say, “Buying and selling are simply like usury,” though God has permitted buying and selling and forbidden usury (2:275).

Those who refused to pay alms (zakāh) or were miserly when asked by those in need have the weight of their wealth tied around their necks on the Day of Judgment: And let not those who are miserly with what God has given them from His Bounty suppose that it is good for them; rather, it is evil for them. On the Day of Resurrection they will be collared by that with which they were miserly (3:180). Embezzlers and hoarders of public wealth are weighted down with what they stole, breaking their backs (6:31). The Quran says, And whosoever defrauds will bring what he obtained by fraud on the Day of Resurrection. Then every soul shall be paid what it has earned in full, and they shall not be wronged (3:161). The Prophet also said that an unjust bigamist who failed to treat his wives with complete equality will come on the Day of Judgment with one-half of his body paralyzed.

Some are raised up blind and ask, “My Lord! Why hast Thou raised me blind, when I used to see?” He will say, “Thus it is. Our signs came unto you, but you forgot them. Even so, this Day shall you be forgotten!” (20:125–26). The inner eye’s blindness here is manifested as the outer eye’s blindness there: Whosoever was blind in this [life] will be blind in the Hereafter, and further astray from the way (17:72). Sinners will be driven to the place of gathering upon their faces (54:48). When the Prophet was asked, “How will they walk on their faces?” he replied, “The One who made them walk on their feet there will make them walk on their faces there.”

In contrast, on that day, those who had performed righteous deeds will find much relief as a result of those deeds, even if those deeds were minute. For example, a just ruler as well as a person who wept alone at night in awe of the Divine are among those granted special shade. The Quran and Ḥadīth also mention certain deeds that lighten the load on that day: And hasten unto forgiveness from your Lord, and for a garden whose breadth is the heavens and the earth—prepared for the reverent, who spend in ease and hardship, and curb their rage, and pardon others—and God loves the virtuous (3:133–34). Conscientious people free slaves, build places of worship, call others to prayer, and perform other good deeds. The Quran pronounces this truth in these terms: So whosoever does a mote’s weight of good shall see it. And whosoever does a mote’s weight of evil shall see it (99:7–8).

THE AMASSING OF HUMANITY FOR INSPECTION OF DEEDS (ʿARD)

At this stage, human beings are presented before their Lord in ranks, and a profound unveiling occurs that enables them to be cognizant of their Lord, though scholars emphasize that this type of witnessing is not within the created dimensions of time and space. It is at this point that God reveals Himself to humanity and declares to those who rejected the Resurrection that this is indeed the Day that His prophets had promised would arrive:

On the Day . . . they shall be arrayed before thy Lord in ranks. “Indeed, you have come unto Us as We created you the first time. Nay, but you claimed that We would never appoint a tryst for you.” And the Book will be set down. Then thou wilt see the guilty fearful of what is in it. And they will say, “Oh, woe unto us! What a book this is! It leaves out nothing, small or great, save that it has taken account thereof.” And they find present [therein] whatsoever they did. And thy Lord wrongs no one. (18:47–49)

Elaborating upon this event, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn ʿUmar al-Awzāʾī (d. 157/774) stated that people would see their lives displayed before them moment by moment.37

THE RECKONING

The next phase involves the actual accounting of deeds and a personal defense of one’s life. The first chapter of the Quran begins, Praise be to God, Lord of the worlds, the Compassionate, the Merciful, Master of the Day of Judgment (1:2–4). The second verse declares God’s lordship, and the fourth, according to the Andalusian exegete Muḥammad ibn Ḥamad ibn Juzayy al-Kalbī (d. 741/1340), summarizes the entire eschaton in describing God as Master (or Sovereign) of the Day of Judgment. The Arabic word for “judgment” or “reckoning” in this context is dīn, which usually means “religion” and is related to the word for “debt.” The Day of dīn can thus be understood as the day when debts fall due. Many verses in the Quran reiterate the accounting that is constantly taking place during our life by God through the angels who record all of our deeds. However, it is not only the angels carrying out this recording. The Quran states that our own body parts and organs are recording our actions and will testify for or against us: On the day their tongues, their hands, and their feet bear witness against them as to that which they used to do (24:24); On that Day We shall seal their mouths. Their hands will speak to Us, and their feet will bear witness to that which they used to earn (36:65); And they will say to their skins, “Why did you bear witness against us?” They will reply, “God, Who makes all things speak, made us speak. He created you the first time, and unto Him shall you be returned” (41:21).

Even the rocks, trees, and animals will have their day in court on that day. Many ḥādīth also indicate that the recording of deeds is a constant process. The Quran says that on that Day people will exclaim, What a book this is! It leaves out nothing, neither small or great (18:49). Sūrah 36, Yā Sīn, recited daily by countless Muslims and especially for the dying and the dead, serves as a cogent meditation on death and contains this reminder:

Thou only warnest whomsoever follows the Reminder and fears the Compassionate unseen. So give such a one glad tidings of forgiveness and a generous reward. Truly We give life to the dead and record that which they have sent forth and that which they have left behind. And We have counted all things in a clear registry. (36:11–12)

Ibn Juzayy al-Kalbī writes that that which they have sent forth refers to the actions that will greet people in the Afterlife and that which they have left behind refers to the good deeds that carry on after their death, such as knowledge or perpetual charity. The registry refers to either what the Quran terms the Preserved Tablet (al-lawḥ al-maḥfūẓ; 85:22) or the scrolls of our deeds also mentioned in several verses (see 17:14; 80:10, 13–16).

The Last Day is mentioned in the Quran as the Day on which some faces shall be radiant, gazing upon their Lord, and some faces shall be scowling, knowing that a spine-crushing calamity will befall them (75:22–25). Due to the terror of the day, people will initially abandon one another and be concerned only with their own reckoning:

On a day when the sky is as molten lead, and the mountains are as carded wool, and no loyal friend shall ask about a loyal friend, [though] they will be made to see them. The guilty would wish to ransom himself from the punishment of that Day at the price of his children, his spouse and his brother, his kin who had sheltered him, and all who are on the earth, that it might save him. (70:8–14)
Actions will be accounted for in a great courtroom setting with God as Judge, with witnesses, and with sentencing and pleas for clemency by the prophets, saints, and martyrs. Even the earth will testify against those who wronged her:

When the earth is shaken with her shaking, and the earth yields up her burdens, and man says, “What ails her?” That Day she shall convey her chronicles; for thy Lord inspired her. That Day mankind shall issue forth upon diverse paths to witness their deeds. So whosoever does a mote’s weight of good shall see it. And whosoever does a mote’s weight of evil shall see it. (99:1–8)

The sūrah about the Day of Judgment entitled “The Undeniable Reality” (al-Ḥāqqah) says: On that Day the Event shall befall, the sky shall be rent asunder; for that Day it shall be frail. And the angels shall be at its sides; that Day eight shall carry the Throne of your Lord above them. That Day you shall be exposed; no secret of yours shall be hidden (69:15–18). This refers to the Reckoning, which is the stage before the determination of humanity’s final abode in either Paradise or Hell. This stage involves a thorough questioning that differs from the first questioning in the grave and involves all aspects of one’s entire life. A well-known ḥadīth details the five central questions asked: “The progeny of Adam will not move along on the Day of Judgment until asked about five things: regarding his life and how he spent it; regarding his youth and how he exhausted it; regarding his wealth and how he earned it; regarding that for which he used his wealth; and regarding his knowledge and whether he acted upon it.”

The Quran also states that individuals are only asked about their own deeds and are neither accountable for others’ nor questioned as members of a collective body, such as a nation or community: That is a community that has passed away. Theirs is what they earned and yours is what you earned, and you will not be questioned about that which they used to do (2:134), since none shall bear the burden of another (6:164; 17:15). However, some people bear responsibility for those who are in their trust, such as children and dependents, and rulers have a responsibility for those they rule, since the Quran enjoins, O you who believe! Shield yourselves and your families from a Fire whose fuel is men and stones (66:6). In this vein, the Prophet said, “God will ask every entrusted person about his trust, whether he guarded it or neglected it. A man will even be asked about the members of his household."

The greatest trust, however, is a person’s heart and the inroads into it, which include his or her thoughts and actions. The Quran declares people’s responsibility for their hearing, sight, and heart: And pursue not that whereof you have no knowledge. Truly hearing, and sight, and the heart—all of these will be called to account (17:36). Guarding the eyes is enjoined in the Quran as purer for them (24:30; see also 33:53). The goal is to maintain the purity of the heart through struggle and vigilance, so that the soul is divested of sins and can arrive on the Day of Judgment in a prepared state, since it is the Day when neither wealth nor children avail, save for him who comes to God with a sound heart (26:88–89).

The tribulations of the world will manifest themselves as great benefits on that day, as they will become sources of freeing people from their sins. Commenting on the ḥadīth, “Surely God will try the believer, but God only gives him tribulation due to his great worth to God,” ʿAbd al-Raʿūf al-Munāwī (d. 1031/1621) writes:

Tribulation has great benefits and Divine Wisdom, some of which only reveal themselves in the Afterlife. Others are discernible here, such as recognizing Lordly might, seeking refuge in our servitude to God, and realizing that none can escape the Divine Decree, that destiny will not be thwarted. The reason is that God has decreed that Paradise is proscribed for anyone who has foulness in his heart. Such a person can only enter Paradise after God purifies him and removes traces of filth because Paradise is the abode of the pure, as in 39:73 when the believers are told, “You are now pure; so enter Paradise for eternity.”

The Prophet has said that people are first taken to account for their acts of devotion, first and foremost ritual prayer. Then they are taken to account for their conduct with and toward others, and in this category the enormities of bloodshed and murder are dealt with first. Despite the seemingly anthropomorphic nature of Quranic descriptions of God on the Day of Judgment, the vast majority of Muslim exegetes and theologians maintain that these are not descriptions that can be understood literally, but rather should be understood as being without modality. Commenting on the line from the widely accepted statement of Islamic creed al-Kharīdat al-bahiyyah, “Required is faith in the Reckoning, the Gathering, and reward and punishment,” al-Dardīr writes:

This means that God will stand His servants at the place of gathering (mahshar) to see their actions, words, deeds, and belief in complete detail. This means that God will speak to them in His eternal Words, with neither letter nor sound. He will remove their veil so that they hear it; it is also possible that it will be with a speech that He creates to indicate to them His eternal, uncreated Speech; it could also mean that the angels speak on God’s behalf, or both.\(^{41}\)

THE LESSER INTERCESSIONS

The second group of intercessions (shaفاʿaʿāt) occurs after the Reckoning. The Prophet said, “My intercession on the Day of Judgment is for the people who committed enormities from my community.”\(^{42}\) The Quran states: They intercede not, save for one with whom He is content. They are wary, for fear of Him (21:28); They have no power of intercession, save the one who has made a pact with the Compassionate (19:87; see also 20:109); And intercession will benefit none with Him, save whomsoever He gives leave (34:23). Some Islamic schools have rejected this intercession based upon other verses that apparently disallow it, such as 2:48, And be mindful of a day when no soul will avail another soul in any way, and no intercession shall be accepted from it, nor ransom taken from it; nor shall they be helped. Most exegetes, however, interpret this verse to mean that intercession will not be accepted before permission is given, during the Reckoning itself (see 2:48c; 2:255c).

Once people are condemned for their actions, the prophets are the first to intercede on behalf of their respective communities; then the righteous saints (ṣiddiqūn) intercede, then the martyrs, then those who were guardians of the Quran through memory and observance of its guidelines, and finally the righteous among the believers. The Prophet intercedes on behalf of his entire community after his great intercession for all of humanity. The Prophet also intercedes on behalf of those condemned, even among the disbelievers, in order that their punishment might be less severe. Finally, he intercedes on behalf of those who committed major sins, asking that they be removed from the Hellfire. The possibility of forgiveness is infinite. The Quran states: Truly God forgives not that any partner be ascribed unto Him, but He forgives what is less than that for whomsoever He will (4:48). Even this declaration applies only to idolatry practiced after a people have received a revelation and the prohibition of idolatry has been made clear: So do not set up equals unto God, knowingly (2:22).

RECEIVING THE SCROLL OF DEEDS (TATAYYUR AL-ṢUḤUF)

After the Reckoning, the receiving of the scroll of deeds occurs and individuals are each given their own book. The books, which contain all human actions, each in an individual scroll, are described as “flying” in a flurry of apparent chaos, until each arrives at its appointed person. The believers receive theirs in their right hand and rejoice, while the hypocrites and disbelievers are given theirs in the left hand from behind their backs (see 69:19–37; 84:6–12). The Quran also refers to the book of deeds as a book inscribed (kitāb marqūm; 83:9) in which all of one’s beliefs, intentions, words, and deeds are recorded, as in 21:94: And whosoever performs righteous deeds and is a believer, there shall be no ingratitude for his endeavor, and surely We shall write [it] down for him. The Prophet said, however, that only good intentions are counted in the book; bad intentions upon which one does not act or that do not reach the level of assertion (ʿazīmah) are not recorded.

People will be gathered for review of their records as communities with their distinctive teachings (but the Reckoning and Judgment fall due upon people as individuals): And thou wilt see every community upon its knees. Every community is called to its book: “Today you will be recompensed for that which you used to do” (45:28). The Quran asserts that several groups are saved if they believed and performed righteous deeds: Truly those who believe, and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabeans—whosoever believes in God and the Last Day and works righteousness shall have their reward with their Lord. No fear shall come upon them; nor shall they grieve (2:62; cf. 5:69).

The Andalusian sage Ibn ʿArabī (d. 638/1240) writes about the verse Be mindful of a trial that will not befall only those among you who do wrong; and know that God is severe in retribution (8:25) as follows:

What punishment is greater than the one that afflicts the deserving and the undeserving, the oppressor and the oppressed, the innocent and the guilty? But such is the nature of the limits of this world, because it is a mixed abode. Its natural evil does not discriminate.
But the next life differs entirely, because it is the abode of discrimination. Hence, the punishments are meted out only to those deserving.\textsuperscript{44}

The Quran deems a “tribulation” (fitnah) that occurs in this world as natural rather than as a punishment, since it befalls both the deserving and the undeserving; however, in the next world, only those deserving of punishment receive it. Hence, the books in which our actions are recorded are done in an entirely discriminatory fashion: no one is wronged or falls victim to the apparently whimsical vicissitudes of natural or general evil that is the lot of this world.

People will be called to read their records and forced to acknowledge that what has been recorded is true: \textit{Read your book! On this Day, your soul suffices as a reckoner against you} (17:14). One of the ninety-nine Names of God is “the Veiler of Wrongs” (al-Sātir). In a beautiful \textit{ḥadīth}, the Prophet says of the Day of Judgment:

\begin{quote}
God will draw near his believing servant and place him in a private chamber and veil him from others. He will then ask him to acknowledge his sins, showing each one to him saying, “Do you remember this? Do you acknowledge this? Do you recall this?” until He forces him to acknowledge them, and the man believes that he will perish from them; God then says, “Just as I veiled them for you in that life, I forgive you for them today”; then he is given the book containing only his good deeds.\textsuperscript{45}
\end{quote}

This is known as the “easy reckoning” in the Quran: \textit{As for one who is given his book in his right hand, he will be reckoned with an easy reckoning} (84:7–8).

\textbf{THE WEIGHING ON THE SCALES (AL-MĪZĀN)}

Once the records of the deeds are distributed among the resurrected, the weighing of actions on the scales takes place: \textit{We shall set the just scales for the Day of Resurrection, and no soul shall be wronged in aught. Even if it be the weight of a mustard seed, We shall bring it. And We suffice as Reckoner} (21:47; see also 7:8; 23:102–3; 101:6–11). Scholars have differed as to the nature of the scales. Muḥammad Saʿīd Ramaḍān al-Būṭī (d. 1434/2013) says:
We must, as the scholars have argued, withhold judgment as to what types of scales are used, their nature and quality. Is it one scale for all of humanity, or several? Such questions have no definitive answer. We believe in the scales as we have been informed by the Majestic and Exalted without tasking our intellects or imaginations with interpretations or metaphorical readings of the verses.\textsuperscript{46}

This interpretation has been the dominant position of traditional schools of theology throughout Islamic history. However, there are verses that describe the weighing of actions, and it is the good deeds that have greater weight, being ten times to seven hundred times heavier than evil deeds. And according to the Prophet, “The weightiest of things in the scales on the Day of Judgment are exalted and beautiful character and morality.”\textsuperscript{47} Nonetheless, the burden of unabsolved sins is felt by those who were heedless of the Reckoning: \textit{Lost indeed are those who deny the meeting with God till, when the Hour comes upon them suddenly, they say, “Alas for us, that we neglected it!” They will bear their burdens upon their backs. Behold! Evil is that which they bear!} (6:31). Ā’\textsuperscript{ishah}, the Prophet’s wife, said:

I asked the Prophet if people would remember their families on the Day of Judgment, and he replied that they would not think of anyone during three stages of that day: at the scales, until they knew whether their deeds were light or weighty; at the distribution of the records, until they knew if they received them with their right or left hand; and at the traverse, when Hell is before them, until they pass over it.\textsuperscript{48}

The Prophet said that people will have recourse on the Day of Judgment to right the wrongs that were perpetrated against them. Even the animals that were abused by their owners or mistreated by other animals will take retribution. Those who slandered others will have their account of good deeds transferred to the accounts of the victims of their slander. The Prophet once said:

“Do you know who the bankrupt one is?” The Companions replied, “For us, he is the one without gold or silver.” To this, the Prophet responded, “Rather, he is the one who comes on the Day of Judgment with many good deeds but because he had slandered so and so and struck so and so, his deeds are taken from him and given to those he wronged until he has none left for himself.”

The settling of scores involves everyone, whether believer or disbeliever. Any part of the earth that was wronged, even a river that was polluted, will testify against the perpetrators of the crimes. The Prophet stated, “Take care of this earth, for she is your mother,” and “No one wrongs her except that he is shackled with seven earths around his neck on the Day of Judgment.” These scores will be settled during the Judgment, but another set of scores among the believers is settled before entering Paradise.

Once the records are given, people’s fates are determined as the judgment is given in each individual case.

The Cistern (al-Ḥawḍ)

After the Judgment, the multitudes proceed on to the traverse or bridge, but before that event, the believers are given a final thirst-quenching drink, after which they will never thirst again. Differences of opinion abound about the Prophet’s cistern. As mentioned, other prophets have cisterns for their communities to relieve them from the thirst of the Day of Judgment, but the Prophet Muhammad was given a special cistern to quench the multitudes from his community. A sūrah of the Quran entitled al-Kawthar (“Abundant Good”) states: Truly We have bestowed abundant good upon thee. So pray to thy Lord and sacrifice. Truly thine enemy shall be the one without posterity (108:1–3). Regarding al-Kawthar, the Prophet said:

It is a river in Paradise my Lord has promised me and it has abundant goodness. It is also a cistern that my community will alight upon on the Day of Judgment. Its cups are the number of stars; but some are kept away, and I will say, “My Lord, he is of my community,” and it will be said to me, “Thou dost not know what he did after thee.”

The last point refers to apostasy and heresy. The cistern is found before the testing of the believers and is an indication that the cistern is both before the traverse and fed by the river al-Kawthar and then again appears after the traverse in Paradise. Al-Būṭī writes:

It is clear that the cistern and al-Kawthar are one and the same. Their source is in Paradise. So what flows from it is called al-Kawthar, and what has collected from it outside of Paradise is called the cistern. The believers, who had not changed their faith or innovated anything before they enter Paradise, alight upon it, and the Messenger of God greets them at the cistern. Moreover, the traditions about the cistern are so numerous they have reached the level of factual, multiply transmitted proof.\textsuperscript{53}

\textit{The Traverse or Bridge (al-Ṣirāt)}

The final stage of the Day of Judgment is crossing the traverse or bridge. Once the books have been assigned and deeds weighed on the scales, each individual’s fate is made known. What remains is the movement to one’s final abode and the possibility of intercession. People move toward what the Prophet described as “a darkened plane” as they approach the traverse, which is described in the \textit{Ḥadīth} as a bridge that spans the ground of gathering (\textit{ard al-mahshar}) and Paradise, while crossing over one of the valleys of Hell.

The traverse is mentioned only in a few Quranic verses, such as 36:65–66: \textit{On that Day We shall seal their mouths. Their hands will speak to Us, and their feet will bear witness to that which they used to earn. And had We willed, We would have blotted out their eyes. Then they would race to the path (the traverse), yet how would they see?} Other verses are understood as allusions to it (e.g., 19:66–73; 36:63). The discussion is, however, much clearer in the \textit{Ḥadīth}, where it is said that it is “finer than a hair and sharper than a sword,”\textsuperscript{54} and people cross it like lightning, the wind, birds flying, or camels trotting, “until finally a man comes who is unable to walk but can barely crawl. On each side of the traverse are suspended metal hooks [in another narration, ‘only God knows the vastness of their dimensions’] that are programmed to snatch people from the traverse. Some will be wounded by them, but pass safely nonetheless. Others are thrown by them violently into the Hellfire.”\textsuperscript{55}

Some exegetes argue that the disbelievers are sent directly from the scales to Hell and that only the believers and hypocrites cross the traverse. The hypocrites are included among the believers at this stage; they see a clear light emanating from the true believers that enables them to find their way to the traverse:

On the Day when the hypocrites, men and women, will say to those who believe, “Wait for us that we may borrow from your light,” it will be said, “Turn back and seek a light!” Thereupon a wall with a gate will be set down between them, the inner side of which contains mercy, and on the outer side of which lies punishment. They will call unto them, “Were we not with you?” They reply, “Indeed! But you tempted yourselves, bided your time, and doubted; and false hopes deluded you till the Command of God came, and the Deluder deluded you concerning God. So this day no ransom shall be taken from you, or from those who disbelieved.” Your refuge shall be the Fire; it shall be your master. What an evil journey’s end! (57:13–15)

Several traditions relate that after the dispersal of peoples’ books of deeds, the hypocrites and believers move from the place of judgment to a dark plane. At this point, the light of the believers’ actions reveals itself; the greater the good deeds, the greater the light. The hypocrites see this light and move toward the believers, begging to borrow from their light. The angels tell them to find their own light. Regarding this matter, the Prophet stated:

God will call humanity by their mothers’ last names on the Day of Judgment in order to veil [anyone who may have been illegitimate]. At the traverse, God will give each believer a light and each hypocrite a light, but when they are on the traverse, the light will be taken from the hypocrites, and they will say [to the believers], “Wait for us and give us your light.” The believers will say, “O God, complete our light,” and no one will remember any other. 56

The Companion ʿAmr ibn al-ʿĀṣ stated that the wall that descends as a barrier between the believers and the hypocrites is the Eastern wall of the al-Aqṣā Mosque compound, known to Jews as the Temple Mount. The Golden Gate and the Door of Mercy are located on this wall. It was at this place that the Prophet saw Hell on his nocturnal Ascension (al-miʿrāj). 57 Some scholars believe that the barrier on the Day of Judgment is literally the Eastern wall, while others say it is a re-creation or an archetype that the wall in this world reflects.

This stage of the Day of Judgment is reserved for believers from all of the respective prophetic traditions. Those who rejected the truth will not cross the traverse, but instead follow their false gods into the abyss of Hell. The idols and human beings taken as gods will lead their followers into Hell, as is said of Pharaoh in 11:98: He shall go before his people on the Day of Resurrection and lead them to the Fire. Evil indeed is the watering place to which they are led! Some exegetes, however, argue that everyone, including the disbelievers, will cross the traverse, a disagreement based upon differing interpretations of there is not one of you, but that he will approach it (19:71).

The Arched Bridge into Paradise (al-Qanṭarah)

Reaching the other side of the traverse, believers will come to an arched bridge separating Hell from Paradise. Before the believers can cross this bridge, they must first resolve conflicts and grudges and ask forgiveness from those they have wronged. Lesser intercessions are also made at this stage for those who did not make it across the traverse. The righteous, martyrs, and those who lived by the Quran are permitted to intercede for the less fortunate. The prophets will intercede for their respective communities and finally God Himself removes those whom He pleases from the Hellfire. The next stage is the Afterlife of eternal bliss or damnation.

Hell and Its Torments

The Quran is replete with descriptions of the terror of the Afterlife and the torments of Hell. Unlike the Torah or even the New Testament, which contain comparatively little detail about the Afterlife, the Quran provides vivid images of the horrors that await ingrates and deniers, as in 32:20–21: And as for those who are iniquitous, their refuge is the Fire. Whenever they desire to go forth therefrom, they are returned unto it, and it is said unto them, “Taste the punishment of the Fire that you used to deny.” And We make them taste the lesser punishment before the greater punishment, that they might turn back (cf. 22:22).

Hell is reflected in the hellish experiences we endure in this world. The temporary torments of this world are reminders of the permanent ones awaiting the unrepentant among us in the next world. The purpose of these reminders is to engender a profound sense of vigilance in this life. The unrelenting evils are warded off with taqwā, often translated “piety,” “duty,” “reverence,” or “conscientiousness,” whose cultivation is a central moral theme in the Quran. Its root meaning is “to ward off evil,” and as employed in the Quran it also indicates fear, respect, and reverence for God. The first injunction in the Quran is, O mankind! Worship your Lord, Who created you, and those who were before you, that haply you may be reverent (2:21), that is, people of taqwā.

In the Quranic ethos, fear of Hell is to be cultivated in conjunction with hope for Paradise. The conscious awareness of God’s possible punishment engenders in this world an awe that can help one to live a morally scrupulous life. But the Quran describes human beings as weak by nature (4:28). This weakness leads to sin, and sin without repentance leads to Hell. Thus, another major theme of the Quran is repentance before death. The Quran hints that, if people simply followed the inclinations of their carnal soul (al-nafs) and refused to submit to God and His Law, Hell would be their natural destiny.

The Prophet stated, “Guard yourselves against the Fire, even with the charity of half a date, and if you do not find even that, then with good words.” The concept that the Inferno is the natural destination of those who do not accept Divine Guidance is rooted in the Quranic understanding of freedom of choice. Human beings are free to choose, but embedded in the Arabic word for choice is “goodness.” Ikhtiyār means “choice,” but also it literally means “to choose good.” To relinquish conscious choice is to capitulate to the instinctive tendencies of the bestial or lower self. Alluding to this fact, the Prophet said, “Hell is surrounded by desirous things and Paradise by things that are disliked.”

Fallen people, cut off from their original and primordial nature, or fiṭrah, will naturally gravitate toward what is harmful, but by exercising choice correctly, they incline to do good and thus pave a path to Paradise. Hence, to exercise freedom by choosing what God has willed for His creatures is to choose Paradise. However, those who reject this choice are seen as ingrates who refuse God’s greatest gift, free will—the ability to choose God freely as opposed to relinquishing that choice and turning one’s back on God. As stated in 2:256: There is no coercion in religion. Sound judgment has become clear from error; and in 18:29: So whosoever will, let him believe, and whosoever will, let him disbelieve.
In other words, if left to our own devices we simply follow the road to Hell, but we must choose to turn back through repentance. The Arabic word for “repentance” is tawbah, which literally means “to turn around.” The prophets are those who have been placed upon our path as warners. They call to us and exclaim: “Stop! Turn around. You are heading the wrong way.” They also give good news concerning the road that leads to God. For many who failed to “turn around” in this world, purgatory and even Hell will be places of purification. This choice to return freely to God by acting as His vicegerents and caretakers in this worldly abode is related to the sacred trust (amānah) that even the mountains refused to bear (see 59:21c).

The experience of Hell is neither one of life, which is essentially enjoyable, nor one of death, which is desirably avoidable in this life yet yearned for in Hell; thus one neither dies therein nor lives (87:13; cf. 20:74). The “physical” sufferings of Hell are the exteriorization of the inner reality of all who deny the blessings of existence by denying the Creator and Sustainer of those blessings. Thus the Quran repeatedly asks, So which of your Lord’s boons do you two deny? (55:13–77 passim)

THE PORTALS OF HELL

Like Paradise, Hell is described as having portals or gates: And verily Hell shall be their tryst, all together. Seven gates it has, and for each gate is appointed a separate portion of them (15:43–44). The Prophet stated, “Surely Hell has seven gates. One of them is reserved for those who draw a sword against my community.”

THE NAMES OF HELL

Hell is called by many names in the Quran. The most common is simply “the Fire” (al-nār), which occurs over a hundred times. The next most common names are Hell (jahannam) and the Hellfire (jaḥīm), occurring seventy-seven and twenty-six times, respectively. Alongside these two terms, five other names are prominent: the blaze (saqar), the flame (laẓā), the furnace (al-ḥuṭamah), the roasting fire (al-saʿīr), and the abyss (al-hāwiyyah). According to al-Ghazzâlî, the seven portals and seven names represent the seven sinful members of the body through which people are led to the fire: the tongue, eyes, mouth, ears, stomach, hands, and feet.
THE SINS OF HELL

Of all the sins, those of the tongue are the most damning. The Prophet replied to a man’s question about whether people would be taken to account for their words, “Does anything cast people into Hell on their faces other than the harvest of their tongues?” The Quran promises Hell for several specific offenses if those sins were not forgiven through the seeking of repentance: breaking God’s covenant (2:83–85), usury and economic exploitation (2:275–76), murder (4:29–30), embezzling the wealth of orphans (4:10), military desertion from a Muslim army (8:15–16), and hoarding wealth (104:2). But of all the sins mentioned, the one unpardonable sin is that of idolatry once knowledge of God’s Unity has been made clear: So do not set up equals unto God, knowingly (2:22); and Truly God forgives not that any partner be ascribed unto Him (4:48). However, the meaning of idolatry is far from simply “worshipping idols.” The sin that is unpardonable is denying God’s Reality, which is essentialized in His absolute Unity and Power. Nothing besides God has ultimate power. He alone is uniquely independent. All else is utterly dependent upon God, and to assert otherwise is to fall into idolatry.

For the mystics, the great idol is the carnal self (al-nafs), which claims to exist independently of the Divine. There is also the idolatry of making “the service greater than God,” which occurs in self-absolutizing religion when people arrogate to themselves the mind of God and force their misguided conclusions on others as if they were gods with the right to choose, for example, who lives and who dies. It is human beings who create idols, and what they manufacture is an unpardonable sin in Islam: Do you worship that which you carve, while God created you and that which you make? (37:95). The qualities of self-absolutizing idolaters are enumerated throughout the Quran as the qualities that lead to Hell: puffed-up pride (istikbār), derision (istihzāʾ), denial (kūfr), ingratitude (kūfrān), cruelty (qaswah), zealotry (ḥamiyyah), ignorant impudence (jahl), vaingloriousness (fakhr), wantonness (baṭar), and envy (ḥasad). The Prophet said, “Can I not tell you the qualities of the people of Hell? The people of Hell are every arrogant, pride-filled, rude, and cruel tyrant.”

THE COMPANIONS OF HELL

The Quran uses the idiom inhabitants of the Fire to identify two groups that are mentioned and a third that exegetes say is implied. The first group comprises the angels assigned as the caretakers (khazanah) of Hell. The second category refers to the disbelievers who are destined for Hell: But those who disbelieve and deny Our signs, it is they who are the inhabitants of the Fire, abiding therein (2:39). Exegetes explain that the third category comprises believers who have committed sins, but are redeemed through God’s Forgiveness and Grace or are granted that honor of redemption through the intercession of one of the prophets or righteous servants.

FOOD AND CLOTHING IN HELL

The descriptions of Hell in the Quran are blood-curdling. The inhabitants drink boiling water and pus. They eat thorny plants and a bitter desert fruit known as zaqqūm, mentioned three times in the Quran (37:62; 44:43–46; 56:52–53). Because the people of Hell have some knowledge of the states of those in Paradise, a dimension of mental anguish is heaped on to their physical suffering. Hell’s denizens beg for food and drink from the people of Paradise, but the only response is God’s decision to punish them (37:50–57).

THE PERPETUITY OF HELL

During the early period of Islam, scholars differed about the duration of Hell. The majority of them argued that Hell is perpetual and an actualized state that never ends. But some groups argued otherwise, citing verses that hinted at an end to Hell’s torment and arguing that this was more consistent with God’s saying, “My Mercy exceeds My Wrath.” Thus the scholars fell into three camps. The first believed that although Hell did not end, its punishments and torments did. Their proof for this was the verse: Truly Hell lies in ambush, a place unto which the rebellious return, to tarry therein for ages (78:21–23). This was the opinion of Aḥmad ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728/1328), Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyyah (d. 751/1350), and Ibn ʿArabī; a similar opinion that the majority of Hell’s denizens are ultimately released also appears to have been held by al-Ghazzālī, as is evident in his Fayṣal al-tafrīqah (Decisive Criterion). The second camp comprised the annihilationists, who argued that Hell is extinguished entirely. Finally, the last group comprised the majority of scholars, who adhered to the notion of perpetual punishment understood literally.

Ibn ʿAbbās and others among the first community and Companions of the Prophet, however, relate statements that, nonetheless, indicate the vast Mercy of God in the Afterlife, such as, “Surely a day will come over Hell when it will be like a field of corn that has dried up after flourishing for a while.” Stronger still is the following sound ḥadīth, “Then God will say, ‘The angels, the prophets, and the faithful have all in their turn interceded for the sinners, and now there remains none to intercede for them except the most Merciful of those who show mercy.’ So, God will then remove a handful of people from the Fire who never worked any good.”

The Quran also states: As for those who are wretched, they shall be in the Fire, wherein there shall be for them groaning and wailing, abiding therein for so long as the heavens and the earth endure, save as thy Lord wills. Surely thy Lord does whatsoever He desires (11:106–7). The following verse then describes Paradise: And as for those who are felicitous, they shall be in the Garden, abiding therein for so long as the heavens and the earth endure, save as thy Lord wills—a gift unfailing (11:108).

WOMEN AND THE HELLFIRE

A common misconception among some Muslims is that the majority of the inhabitants of Hell are women. This arises from an often quoted ḥadīth, “I looked into Hell and saw that the majority of its inhabitants were women.” But another hadīth, almost universally ignored, states, “I entered Paradise and found that the majority of its inhabitants were women.” Muḥammad ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sakhāwī (d. 902/1497) says, “No contradiction exists.” For instance, we could consider the former to refer to its initial inhabitants and the latter to Paradise once people have been purified and prepared for it. It should also be noted that historically women have comprised the majority of the world’s population.

Paradise: Its People and Its Blessings

Ibn ʿAbbās, the cousin of the Prophet and one of the first great exegetes of the Quran, stated, “There is nothing in Paradise related to this world except the names.” In a ḥadīth whose authenticity is widely attested, the Prophet said, “God says, ‘I have prepared for my righteous servants what no eye has seen, no ear has heard, and what never occurred to the heart of anyone,’ or recite if you like, No soul knows what comfort is kept hidden for it as a recompense for that which they used to do [32:17].” Despite the unknowable nature of the Afterlife, ample descriptions are given throughout the Quran that both delight and terrify, but are clearly meant only to approximate our understanding of the ineffable.
When asked, “Of what is Paradise made?” the Prophet replied, using a symbolic language, “Bricks of gold and bricks of silver. Its floor is of pure musk. The stones of Paradise are pearls and rubies. Its earth is saffron. The one who enters it is blessed, never experiences suffering, dwells therein eternally, and knows no death. Clothes do not wear out, and youth never fades.”

The essence of Paradise is mercy, which Islamic spirituality identifies with an inner dimension more apparent in the female nature. In this context it should be recalled that the Arabic word for “womb” is ṭaḥim, which is cognate with and shares the triliteral root of the word for “mercy,” which is ṭaḥmah. Such realities must be taken into consideration in imagining the spiritual role of women and their presence as natural inhabitants of Paradise in the form of houris.

As for the structure of Paradise, it is said in traditions that its gates are eight in number. The Prophet stated, “None of you performs lustrations before prayer, does it well, and then says, ‘I testify that there is but one God and that Muhammad is His servant and messenger’ except that all eight gates of Paradise are opened for him, and he may enter from any one he so chooses.” The Prophet also said, “I will come to the gate of the Garden on the Day of Judgment and request that it be opened. The one charged with it will say, ‘And who are you?’ I will reply, ‘Muhammad.’ He will then say, ‘I was commanded not to open it for anyone before you.’”

The people of Paradise are ranked in degrees. Sūrah 56, al-Wāqiʿah, marks them as the companions of the right and the foremost, while the companions of the left mentioned in this sūrah are those who are deprived of the paradisal state. The foremost are described as _the ones brought nigh, in Gardens of bliss—many from those of old, and few from those of later times—upon embroidered couches, reclining upon them, facing one another. Immortal youths wait upon them with goblets, ewers, and a cup from a flowing spring, wherefrom they suffer neither headache nor stupefaction, and with fruits as they choose, and the meat of birds as they desire, and [there shall be] wide-eyed maidens, the likeness of concealed pearls, as a recompense for that which they used to do. (56:11–24)_

As for those on the right, they are the ones who are given their books in their right hands. The same sūrah describes them as the companions of the right:
And the companions of the right; what of the companions of the right? Among thornless lote trees, clustered plantains, and extended shade, gushing water, and abundant fruit, neither out of reach, nor forbidden, and [upon] raised beds. Truly We brought them into being as a [new] creation, then made for them virgins, amorous peers, for the companions of the right—many from those of old, and many from those of later times. (56:27–40)

As they enter paradisal Gardens, the believers are greeted by angels who say, Enter . . . in peace, secure . . . as brothers, upon couches, facing one another (15:46–47). It is also said that the people of Paradise hear no idle talk therein, nor incitement to sin, save that “Peace! Peace!” is uttered (56:25–26), and that when they reach it, its gates will be opened and its keepers will say unto them, “Peace be upon you; you have done well; so enter it, to abide [therein]” (39:73; cf. 13:22–24).

The age of the people of Paradise is said to be thirty years, considered the prime of life in Arabia. The Prophet stated, “Whoever dies in this world, either young or old, will be restored to the age of thirty in Paradise and will never increase in age; likewise for the denizens of Hell.”77 Echoing Biblical descriptions, the Quran describes the Garden as having rivers of milk, wine, and honey (47:15). Its inhabitants also enjoy what is described as a camphor drink and one of ginger as well (76:5). In addition, wells spring forth when one desires to drink (76:6). Though, according to most authorities, animals of this world will be turned to dust on the Day of Judgment, those that were beloved pets of the righteous in this life will also appear in Paradise to accompany their owners. There are other animals in Paradise as well. In a sound tradition, the Prophet described the horses of Paradise, and a man asked, “Will there be camels?” The Prophet replied, “In Paradise is whatever pleases you and delights your eye.”78 The food of Paradise is described as delicious fruits, such as grapes, pomegranates, bananas, and dates; aromatic herbs; drinks; and various meats, especially the meats of fowl. The body, apparently, will also have a type of metabolism, as it did in this life. The Prophet explained that the inhabitants of Paradise neither urinate nor defecate; instead they perspire a perfumed musk scent.

The descriptions of the sensual delights of Paradise in the Quran and the Ḥadīth have historically caused many non-Muslims much consternation. And although no soul knows what comfort is kept hidden for it as a recompense for that which they used to do (32:17), the descriptions seem to indicate that the delights of this world shall have their counterparts in kind, however different in degree, in the next life. The delights of Paradise are “likened” to the delights of this lower world, however, “because of the interconnection between all possible states of experience; they are ‘unlike’ them because of the incommensurability between different dimensions or levels of reality.” Earthly delights are in fact reflections of paradisal ones.

The wide-eyed maidens, or houris, of Paradise, as mentioned in several verses, are described as untouched and buxom (55:56; 78:33). They are pure companions for the righteous. Some exegetes argue that the houris are the spouses from this world who are purified and whose virginity is restored. Others maintain that they are uniquely created for Paradise. They represent loving-kindness (ʿarub) and are of the same age (38:52; 78:33). Their power is in their purity, and the consummation of that loving-kindness is union in Divine proximity. Ibn ʿArabī writes:

In relation to [the Prophet, women] are as the Universal Nature is to God in which He revealed the forms of the cosmos by directing toward it the Divine Will and Command, which, at the level of elemental forms, is symbolized by copulation. . . . Whoever loves a woman in this way loves with Divine Love, while he whose love for them is limited to natural lust lacks true knowledge of that desire.

The joys of Paradise are archetypes of the joys we experience in the earthly realm, including food, drink, and lovemaking. The joy of sexual union can even be seen as a symbol and earthly manifestation of spiritual union. Al-Ghazzālī states:

Man has been made subject to sexual desire for two beneficial reasons. The first of these is that by knowing its delight he is able to draw an analogy which suggests to him what the delight of the Afterlife must be like, for the delight of the sexual act, were it to last, would be the greatest pleasure of the body, just as the pain of a burn is the body’s greatest agony.
According to the Quran, Therein they shall have whatsoever they will; and with Us there is more (50:35). The “more” mentioned in this verse is the beatific vision. The highest and greatest blessing of Paradise is the vision of the Divine, which scholars of Islam have argued occurs with an eternal, nonspatial, and ineffable eye. In his creed, Abū Ja‘far ʿAḥmad ibn Muḥammad al-Ṭaḥāwī (d. 324/935) writes, “The beatific vision is a reality for the people of Paradise without enclosure or modality, just as the Book of God pronounces, Faces that Day shall be radiant, gazing upon their Lord [75:22–23]. Its explanation is as God knows it to be and as He intended.”

Although the Quran suggests in several verses that people enter Paradise as a result of their actions in this world (see, e.g., 32:17), in reality it is ultimately by the Grace of God. Deeds are necessary, but not sufficient. The Prophet said, “None of you will be saved by his actions.” His Companions asked, “Not even you, O Messenger of God!” He replied, “Not even me, unless God envelops me in His Mercy.” Nonetheless, the place of individuals in Paradise and their experience of the Afterlife is, without contradiction, also of course based upon what they have done and thought in this life. The Quran says:

> Those who believe and perform righteous deeds shall be made to enter Gardens with rivers running below, abiding therein by the Leave of their Lord. Their greeting therein shall be, “Peace!” Hast thou not considered how God sets forth a parable? A good word is as a good tree: its roots firm and its branches in the sky. It brings forth fruit in every season, by the Leave of its Lord. And God sets forth parables for mankind, that haply they may remember. (14:23–25)

This parable immediately follows a description of Paradise for those who were righteous on earth. The parable is of the tree of belief. The actions that strengthen it are firmly rooted in this world. However, its branches and fruits are celestial and are obtained in the next world. The seeds of otherworldly fruits must be planted in this world, but are harvested in the next.

The Prophet said, “Let none of you wish for death due to some harm that has afflicted him. However, if he should feel compelled to do so, then, let him at least say, ‘O God, give me life as long as life is better for me; but grant me death, should death be better for me.’” Although the time of death is not to be hastened, those longing for the Divine welcome its inevitable arrival. The Prophet also said, “Death is the great gift of the believer.” Ibn ʿArabī comments on this second ḥadīth, stating:

Today, death is a great gift to a believer. His bier is a comforting transport because it takes him from this world to a place without trial or tribulation. He is neither a loser nor is he cheated. Whoever hopes for centuries here should be reminded that there you have a meeting with the Divine, and an imperishable cosmos. If a believer knew what really came after death, he would say with every breath, “O my Lord, take me now, take me now.”

The Quran is, from one point of view, a reflection on the impermanence of life and a reminder of a coming eternity that knows no death. The Prophet stated:

On the Day of Resurrection, death will be brought forward in the shape of a piebald ram. Then a caller will declare, “O people of Paradise!” Thereupon they will stretch their necks and look carefully. The caller will say, “Do you know this?” They will respond, “Yes, this is death.” All of them will see it. Then it will be announced again, “O people of Hell!” They will stretch their necks and look carefully. The caller will say, “Do you know this?” They will say, “Yes, this is death.” All of them will see it. Then it will be slaughtered, and the caller will say, “O people of Paradise! Eternity for you and no death; O people of Hell! Eternity for you and no death.” Then the Prophet recited, And warn them of the Day of Regret, when the matter will have been decreed, while they are in a state of heedlessness and believe not (19:39).

APPENDIX A

ḤADĪTH CITATIONS

The following appendix provides supplementary information on the ʾabḥādīth cited, paraphrased, or referred to in the commentary. In many, though not all, cases these ḥadīth reports are to be found in the works of the traditional commentators (e.g., al-Ṭabarī or Ibn Kathīr), upon which the present commentary is largely based. Also included in this appendix are some reports comprising sayings of prominent Companions of the Prophet and other early figures that are narrated in ḥadīth collections.

The collection and classification of ʾabḥādīth according to the reliability of their chain of transmission (isnād) in reporting the words and actions of the Prophet is a major discipline in Islamic studies. The ḥadīth collectors devised numerous categories, including those ʾabḥādīth that were so widely corroborated (mutawātir) as to be without doubt the words or actions of the Prophet, those that were almost certainly falsely attributed to him, and the large range of possibilities in between. It is beyond the scope of this appendix to provide a comprehensive treatment in this respect, although those cases in which scholars have considered a purported saying of the Prophet to be very unreliable or to have been misattributed have been noted.

Moreover, the forensic enterprise of ranking ʾabḥādīth was itself separate from the question of how such texts would then be used as authoritative sources in law, theology, spirituality, history, and commentary. It should be noted that most traditional authors did not limit themselves to the strongest and most reliable ʾabḥādīth in their works, but made use of a wide range of ʾabḥādīth, using different conventions in different areas of study. This is especially true in tafsīr (Quranic commentary), where the aim was to provide a basis for meditating on the multiple levels of meaning embedded in specific verses. In general, even the greatest scholars of Quranic commentary evinced a comparative leniency with regard to the relative soundness of the ʾabḥādīth they cited, though there is considerable variation in the methods and standards employed from one work and author to another, depending on many factors.

As people of great erudition, the authors of major Quranic commentaries had at their disposal dozens of ḥadīth compilations that collectively comprised hundreds of thousands of entries, far beyond the famous collections, such as al-Bukhārī’s, that are household names in the Islamic world. Often these commentators (and learned traditional authors in general) quote a less well known variant or version of a ḥadīth, use only a portion of a ḥadīth, or combine more than one ḥadīth into a single comment. We have not parsed out all aspects of how these texts have been quoted, a task that would have required a separate volume. Rather, our goal is to provide the origins of these abādīth (a process in Islamic intellectual culture called takhrīj, or “extraction”) for students and scholars who are interested in the original sources of these crucial texts.

We have also not attempted to document all sources for a particular ḥadīth and have limited ourselves to citing a sampling of sources, giving priority to the most authoritative. In most cases where a specific report is found in the collections of al-Bukhārī and Muslim, we deemed it unnecessary to cite additional sources. For abādīth found in only one of the above named collections or in neither of them, at least three sources are cited, although there are some instances of exceptionally obscure abādīth. In a few cases, the report in question is cited only in the tafsīr literature and the earliest such citation(s) is indicated.

The number of the commentary in which the ḥadīth or saying appears is in red, followed by an identifying excerpt or short description and the work(s) in which the text (or part of it) can be found. A bibliography of the sources appears at the end of this appendix. Editorial notes about the citations appear in parentheses. Abādīth very similar to or very closely related to the ḥadīth in question appear within brackets.

The # symbol designates the serial number of the ḥadīth in the edition of the work listed in the accompanying bibliography; in cases where there is no serial numbering, the page number or the volume and page number are provided.

BIOGRAPHIES OF COMMENTATORS

AF Abu’l-Futūḥ ḥusayn ibn ʿAlī al-Rāzī (d. 525/1131)
Rawḥ al-jinān wa rūḥ al-janān

A Twelver Shiite commentator and student of the famous exegete al-Zamakhsharī, Abu’l-Futūḥ al-Rāzī composed his commentary in Persian, although he may have written another in Arabic that has not survived. The commentary gives a Persian translation of each Quranic verse or passage, followed by a discussion of various debates and issues surrounding its meaning.

Aj ʿĀlīm ibn ʿAjībah (d. 1224/1809)
al-Bahr al-madīd fi tafsīr al-Qur’ān al-majīd

A twelfth/eighteenth-century Maghribī shaykh of the Darqūwiyyah-Shādhiliyyah Sufi order, Ibn ʿAjībah produced a tafsīr that includes both exoteric and esoteric commentary. His esoteric commentary (ishārah) sometimes quotes earlier Sufi authorities, but it also contains a number of original mystical insights and analyses and is characterized by its consistent method of addressing the multiple levels of meaning in the Quran and its systematic use of Sufi technical vocabulary.

Āl Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ālūsī (d. 1270/1854)
Rūḥ al-maʿānī fi tafsīr al-Qurʾān al-ʿazīm waʾl-sabʿ al-mathānī

A thirteenth/nineteenth-century scholar and scion of a prominent Baghdadi family claiming descent from the Prophet, al-Ālūsī was a muftī as well as an exegete. He encouraged a return to the Quran and Ḥadīth rather than reliance on established schools of Islamic theology and law.

Ās Muhammad al-Ṭāhir ibn ʿĀshūr (d. 1393/1973)
al-Taḥrīr waʾl-tanwīr

A Tunisian scholar of Islamic Law as well as an exegete, Ibn ʿĀshūr is the author of Maqāsid al-shariʿah al-Islāmiyyah, one of the most important recent works to examine the “aims” or “purposes” of the Law as a key to the proper interpretation and application of Shariʿah rulings.

Bđ ʿAbd Allāh ibn ʿUmar ibn Muhammad al-Bayḍāwī (d. ca. 685/1286)
Anwār al-tanzīl wa asrār al-taʿwil

An author of several works on various Islamic sciences, including philosophical theology (kalām), legal theory, and grammar, al-Bayḍāwī is best known for his Quranic commentary, which is heavily based on al-Zamakhsharī’s al-Kashshāf. Bayḍāwī adhered to the Shāfi‘ī school of law and served as judge (qādī) in Shiraz.

Bg Al-Ḥusayn ibn al-Farrāʾ al-Baghawī (d. 516/1122)

Maʿālim al-tanzil

Born and educated in a village near Herat in present-day Afghanistan, al-Baghawī was primarily a Ḥadīth scholar. He composed his Quranic commentary largely on the basis of Ḥadīth from the Prophet Muhammad, and he is also the author of two Ḥadīth collections, Sharḥ al-sunnah and Maṣābīḥ al-sunnah, in which each section of the collection is prefaced by a reference to Quranic verses related to the topic of that section.

Bq Burhān al-Dīn Abu'l-Ḥasan Ibrāhīm al-Biqāʿī (d. 685/1480)

Nazm al-durar fī tanāsub al-āyāt wa'l-suwar

A scholar of both law and exegesis, al-Biqāʿī studied in Egypt before settling in Damascus. His tafsīr is distinctive for its careful attention to the significance of the stylistic arrangement (naẓm) of the Quran, its use of Biblical materials, and its defense of the use of the Bible in tafsīr.

IA Qāṭī Abū Bakr Muhammad ibn ʿAbd Allāh ibn al-ʿArabī (d. 543/1148)

Aḥkām al-Qurʾān

An Andalusian scholar and polymath, Ibn al-ʿArabī (not to be confused with the celebrated Sufi writer Muhyyi’l-Dīn ibn ʿArabī) wrote on various religious sciences and produced works on law, Ḥadīth, history, and Arabic grammar as well as Quranic commentary. He traveled widely, visiting Damascus, Egypt, and Baghdad, where he studied with the famous Sufi theologian Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī.

IH İsmāʿīl Haqqī al-Burūsawī (d. 1137/1725)

Rūḥ al-bayān

A twelfth/eighteenth-century Ottoman Turkish scholar who resided in Istanbul and Bursa, al-Burūsawī (Bursevī in Turkish) was a Sufi shaykh in the prominent Turkish Sufi order, the Jalwatiyyah. His tafsīr contains both exoteric and esoteric commentary and is noteworthy for its use of the Persian poetic tradition.

IJ Abu’l-Faraj ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn ʿAlī ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597/1200)

Zād al-masīr fi ʿilm al-tafsīr

Born in 510/1126, Ibn al-Jawzī was a ḥanbali scholar and prolific author in the fields of law, Ḥadīth, biography, and history. A prominent preacher in Baghdad, for most of his life he enjoyed the official patronage of caliphs and viziers interested in promoting an exoteric Sunni perspective rather than Shiite and some Sufi views. When the political climate changed near the end of his life, he was imprisoned and exiled for a time, but eventually returned to Baghdad.

IK İmād al-Dīn Abu’l-Fidāʾ İsmāʿīl ibn ʿUmar ibn Kathīr (d. 774/1373)

Tafsīr al-Qurʾān al-ʿażīm

Born in Basra near the turn of the eighth/fourteenth century, Ibn Kathīr moved to Damascus at a young age... age and became one of the leading religious scholars in Syria at that time. He was heavily influenced by his Syrian contemporary Ibn Taymiyyah and taught Quranic sciences at the Umayyad mosque in Damascus. A traditionalist as well as an exegete, he sought to rely as fully as possible on the Ḥadīth and to reduce the influence of Biblical material and legends (Isrāʾīliyyāt) on Quranic interpretation. He is also the author of a major universal history entitled al-Bidāyah waʾl-nihāyah.

Iṣ Al-Rāghib al-Īṣafānī (d. 502/1108)
Mufradāt alfāẓ al-Qurʾān

Born in Isfahan, al-Rāghib apparently remained in the city for the whole of his life and career. The Mufradāt is not set up as a standard tafsīr; instead, it discusses the semantic range and significance of various Quranic terms, arranged alphabetically by the Arabic root they are derived from, in their Quranic context(s). In addition to the Mufradāt, al-Rāghib reportedly composed other works on Quranic exegesis, although these survive only in fragments or as citations in later works. He is also the author of numerous works on literary, philosophical, and ethical themes.

Iṣ Abū Muhammad Ḥabīb ibn Ṭālib al-Īṣafānī (d. 541/1147)
al-Muharrar al-wajīz fī ṭafsīr al-kitāb al-ʿazīz

An Andalusian exegete from Seville, Ibn Ṭālib also served as a religious judge (qāḍī) in Granada. His commentary pays close attention to issues of Arabic grammar and pronunciation of the Quranic verses as well as to their content and meaning. Some reports give him a slightly later death date of 546/1152.

Jālāl al-Dīn al-Maḥallī (d. 864/1459) and Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505)
Tafsīr al-Jalālayn

Jalāl al-Dīn al-Maḥallī was a Cairene scholar of both law and exegesis. Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī was his student, and one of the most prolific authors of all time in various Islamic sciences, including Islamic Law, Ḥadīth, and the Quranic sciences. Al-Suyūṭī taught Shāfiʿī law and was a highly regarded muftī in Mamluk, Egypt. In addition to completing the Tafsīr al-Jalālayn, which was begun by his teacher al-Maḥallī, he is also the author of al-itqān fi ʿulūm al-Qurʾān, an influential work treating various aspects of the Quranic sciences, and al-Durr al-manthūr fiʾl-ṭafsīr biʾl-maʿthūr, a Quranic commentary based exclusively on the sayings of the Prophet and the first generations of Muslims.

Kā Ḥabīb al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī (d. 736/1336)
Taʿwil al-Qurʾān al-karīm, known by many as Tafsīr Ibn ʿArabī

A third-generation student of the outstanding Andalusian mystic and metaphysician Ibn ʿArabī, al-Kāshānī is the author of a number of important works in the field of philosophical Sufism. His Quranic commentary is rich with metaphysical and symbolic interpretations and clearly shows the influence of the school of Ibn ʿArabī. The work was first published under the name of Ibn ʿArabī and is commonly, but mistakenly, attributed to him.

Kā Muḥammad Muḥṣin al-Fayḍ al-Kāshānī (d. 1091/1680)
Tafsīr al-ṣāfī

Born in Qumm, a center of Twelver Shiite tradition and learning, al-Kāshānī moved to the city of Isfahan, where he studied with the foremost Safavid-era philosopher Mullā Ṣadrā. Al-Fayḍ al-Kāshānī was an Akhbarī Shiite scholar whose work is characterized by a reliance on the transmitted traditions of the Twelver Shiite Imams as well as a mystical and gnostic Shiite approach to Quranic interpretation.

Kl Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad ibn Juzayy al-Kalbī (d. 741/1340)
al-Tashīl li-ʿulūm al-tanzīl

An Andalusian man of letters and polymath, Ibn Juzayy was the author of several important works. In addition to his Quranic commentary, he also wrote a comparative legal work on the Sunni schools of Islamic Law entitled Qawānīn al-fiqhiyyah and a Sufi treatise called Taṣfiyat al-qulūb.

M Abū Maṣūr Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Māturīdī (d. 333/944)
Taʾwilāt ahl al-sunnah

A prominent theologian and founder of a major school of Sunni theology, al-Māturīdī took an approach to theological issues balanced between reason and scripture and adopted positions that often lay between Ashʿarism (the other major school of Sunni theology) and Muʿtazilism. He was born in Samarqand in modern-day Uzbekistan in the mid-third/ninth century. His Quranic commentary was reportedly compiled by his students.

Ms  şadr al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī, known as Mullā Şadrā (d. 1050/1640)
Tafsīr al-Qurʾān al-karīm

The most prominent representative of the Safavid-era Shiite school of philosophy known as the School of Isfahan, Mullā Şadrā produced works that synthesized many of the earlier schools of Islamic philosophy, metaphysics, and mysticism. His philosophical works are profoundly rooted in the Quran, as evidenced in his frequent Quranic references and allusions. He also wrote many separate treatises on the Quran and its interpretation, assembled together and entitled Tafsīr al-Qurʾān al-karīm.

Mu Muqātil ibn Sulaymān (d. 150/767)
Tafsīr Muqātil ibn Sulaymān

A transmitter of ḥadīth and one of the earliest Quranic commentators whose work still survives, Ibn Sulaymān was originally from Balkh in present-day Afghanistan; he lived and taught in Baghdad and Basra, where he died. He is said to have held Zaydi and Murjiʿi views on matters of law and theology. His commentary reveals a particular interest in the narrative elements of the Quran concerning Biblical figures, and he frequently elaborates on these narratives using material he attributes to Jewish and Christian sources.

Mw ʿAlī ibn Muḥammad al-Māwardī (d. 450/1058)
al-Nukat waʾl-ʿuyūn fī tafsīr al-Qurʾān

A Shāfiʿī jurist and prominent legal judge (qāḍī), al-Māwardī was born in Basra in 364/974, but lived most of his life in Baghdad, where he enjoyed the favor of Abbasid caliphs eager to revive Sunni ideals in a political environment dominated by the Shiite Buyid dynasty. In addition to his tafsīr, he is the author of many works, including an important book on Islamic politics and governance, al-Abkām al-sulṭāniyyah.

My Rashīd al-Dīn Maybudī (d. ca. 520/1126)
Kashf al-asrār waʿuddat al-abrār
Rashīd al-Dīn Maybudī was a Persian Sufi exegete. His large tafsīr, written primarily in Persian, provides a literal Persian translation followed by an exoteric commentary and then an esoteric or mystical interpretation.

ʿAbd Allāh ibn Aḥmad al-Nasafī (d. 710/1310)

Madārik al-tanzīl wa ḥaqāʾiq al-taʾwil

A Hanāfī scholar of Islamic Law and theology as well as a Quranic exegete, al-Nasafī hailed from Soghdiana in Central Asia. He traveled throughout Iran and Iraq, residing for some time in Kerman in southeastern Iran and visiting Baghdad before dying in Khuzistan in southern Iran.

Niẓām al-Dīn al-Nīsābūrī (or al-Nayshābūrī; d. 728/1328)

Tafsīr gharāʾib al-Qurʾān wa rağhāʾib al-furqān

A polymath from the city of Nayshapur in northeastern Iran, al-Nīsābūrī was a scholar of theology, philosophy, and science—particularly astronomy—as well as a Quranic exegete. His tafsīr, which was deeply influenced by the commentary of Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, reflects his concern with theology, Sufism, and philosophy. Al-Nīsābūrī takes a distinctly mystical approach in his interpretation of the text, and he was one of the first to incorporate seriously the natural sciences into his commentary.

Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Qurṭubī (d. 671/1272)

al-Jāmiʿ li-aḥkām al-Qurʾān

An Andalusian scholar who eventually settled in Egypt, al-Qurṭubī was a prominent Mālikī legal scholar, a scholar of Ḥadīth, and a Quranic commentator. As the title of his tafsīr suggests, the work pays particular attention to the implications of Quranic verses for matters of Islamic Law in relation to both jurisprudential theory (uṣūl) and specific legal rulings (furūʿ), although it is not limited to these areas and should be considered one of the great encyclopedic commentaries. The tafsīr includes a good number of aḥādīth in its interpretation of verses and does not make extensive use of Biblical material or legendary reports.

ʿAlī ibn Ibrāhīm al-Qummī (d. 328/939)

Tafsīr al-Qurʾān

Al-Qummī was a Twelver Shiite traditionalist and scholar who flourished in the mid-fourth/tenth century. Originally from Kufa, he moved with his father, also a well-known Twelver Shiite scholar, to the Shiite scholarly center of Qumm in central Iran. Al-Qummī’s tafsīr is the only extant work attributed to him and presents distinctly Shiite interpretations of most of the verses it treats.

Abu’l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (d. 465/1072)

Laṣāʾif al-ıshārāt

Born in 376/986 in Nayshapur, al-Qushayrī was a Sufi commentator famous for his book about Sufism al-Risālah (The Treatise). He adhered to the Ashʿarite school of theology and the Şāfiʿī legal school prominent in Nayshapur during his lifetime. He was a disciple of the Sufi master Abū ʿAlī al-Daqqāq and studied with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī, also the author of a major Sufi commentary. Like the works of other Sufi authors of his time, al-Qushayrī’s commentary aims to present Sufi interpretations as complementing, rather than challenging, the exoteric Sunni Islamic perspective.
R Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 606/1210)
al-Tafsīr al-kabīr, also known by the title Mafātīḥ al-ghayb

Born in 543/1149 in Rayy (today a suburb of modern-day Tehran), al-Rāzī was a prolific author in the fields of philosophy and theology in addition to Quranic exegesis. His magnum opus is his encyclopedic commentary on the Quran. Al-Rāzī favored the Ashʿarite school of theology, although he was critical of some of its positions, and spent much of his career debating the views of Muʿtazilites. After some travels to Khurasan and Central Asia, he eventually settled in Herat in present-day Afghanistan. His extensive training in philosophy and theology is evident in his Quranic commentary. Al-Rāzī is noteworthy among medieval Quranic commentators both for his discussion of not only the language and content of the verses, but also their order and stylistic arrangement in the text, and for his lengthy treatment of theological and philosophical questions in the context of Quranic commentary.

Rb Rūzbihān al-Baqlī al-Shīrāzī (d. 606/1209)
ʿArāʾis al-bayān fī ḥaqāʾiq al-Qurʿān

A Sufi commentator and religious scholar from Shiraz, Rūzbihān al-Baqlī was known for his commentary on the ecstatic sayings of the Sufis, his treatment of Divine Love, and his vivid spiritual visions, which are chronicled in his spiritual autobiography entitled Kashf al-asrār. Al-Baqlī’s Quranic commentary is also rich with spiritual allusions and symbolic interpretations.

Sa Naṣr ibn Muḥammad al-Samarqandi (d. 373/983)
Bahr al-ʿulūm

Abū’l-Layth al-Samarqandi, as he is most commonly known, was a prominent Ḥanafi jurist and author of works on ethics and asceticism whom some consider an important figure in the early development of the Māturīdī school of theology. His Quranic commentary was especially popular among the Ottomans, who translated it repeatedly into Turkish in the ninth/fifteenth century.

Sh Muḥammad ibn ʿAlī al-Shawkānī (d. 1250–55/1834–39)
Fatḥ al-qadīr

Al-Shawkānī was a thirteenth/nineteenth-century religious scholar and legal authority in Ṣanʿāʾ, Yemen. Raised in a Zaydī Shiite family, he later embraced and championed Sunnism, arguing for a return to the original textual sources of Islam, the Quran, and the Ḥadīth.

ST Sahl ibn ʿAbd Allāh al-Tustarī (d. 283/896)
Taḥṣīr al-Qurʿān al-ʿaẓīm

Born in 203/818 in Tustar in Khuzistan in southeastern Iran, al-Tustarī was a mystic and Sufi guide. His commentary, perhaps the earliest extant collection of Sufi exegesis, recognizes both an outward/exoteric and inward/esoteric meaning for Quranic verses, although the commentary was compiled from his teachings by his disciples and is not complete. Some of his commentary also survives in reports attributed to him in the commentary of the Sufi author al-Sulamī.

Su ʿAbd al-Rahmān al-Sulamī (d. 412/1021)
Ḥaqāʾiq al-taḥṣīr

Born in 325/937 in Nishapur in northeastern Iran, al-Sulamī was initially trained by his Sufi father and later became a disciple of the Nishapuri Sufi master Abu’l-Qāsim Ibrāhīm al-Naṣrābādī. Al-Sulamī’s tafsīr was influenced by, and also preserves, exegetical material attributed to earlier Sufis, including Sahl al-Tustarī. Sulamī’s tafsīr was, in turn, an important influence on al-Qushayrī’s Sufi tafsīr a generation later. In addition to his tafsīr, al-Sulamī was the author of many Sufi treatises as well as an extensive Sufi biographical dictionary.

Sy Jalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505)
al-Durr al-manthūr fī tafsīr al-ma’thūr

Ṭ Muhammad ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (d. 310/923)
Jāmiʿ al-bayān ‘an ta’wil āy al-Qurʾān

One of the most prolific Sunni authors of his time, al-Ṭabarī was born in 224–25/839 in Tabaristan in northern Iran. He traveled widely in his youth through Egypt and the Levant in search of learning and eventually settled in Baghdad, where he wrote the two works for which he is known: his encyclopedic Quranic commentary and his universal history, al-Ta’rikh al-rusul wa’il-mulûk, which begins with accounts of ancient prophets and legendary figures leading up to the founding of Islam and then chronicles Islamic history up to his own time. Al-Ṭabarī’s comprehensive Quranic commentary is considered a culmination of the early genre and is perhaps the best classical example of tafsīr bi’il-ma’thūr, or commentary based on the collection of individual exegetical reports transmitted from the Prophet Muhammad’s Companions and earlier generations of Muslim commentators. Al-Ṭabarī’s work therefore preserves the religious views and opinions of many early Islamic scholars that would have otherwise been lost. Al-Ṭabarī is not merely a collector of reports, however, as his commentary also includes his own analysis and evaluation of the varying exegetical claims and readings he reports in his work.

Ṭb Muhammad Ḥusayn Ṭabātabā’ī (d. 1401/1981)
al-Mīzān fī tafsīr al-Qurʾān

A leading fourteenth/twentieth-century Shiite religious scholar, philosopher, and teacher in the Shiite seminary in Qumm, al-Ṭabātaba’ī was a master of the sciences of philosophy, law, ethics, and Quranic hermeneutics. His tafsīr is encyclopedic in scope, treating traditional exegetical questions and debates as well as historical and philosophical issues and themes.

Th Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad al-Tha’labī (d. 427/1035)
al-Kashf wa’il-bayān ‘an tafsīr al-Qurʾān

A Hadīth scholar and preacher as well as an exegete, al-Tha’labī was a renowned and celebrated scholar of Nayshapur even in his own time. Among his students was the well-known Quranic commentator al-Wāḥidi. Al-Tha’labī’s tafsīr, encyclopedic in scope, includes a wide variety of narrative, legendary, and literary materials in the discussions of Quranic passages, yet also pays attention to issues of grammar and recitation. In addition to his commentary, he is also the author of the well-known Qiṣṣa al-anbiyāʾ (Stories of the Prophets), which expands upon the Quranic accounts of the prophets.

Ṭṣ Abū ʿAlī al-Faḍl ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ṭabrisī (or al-Ṭabarsī; d. 548/1153–54)
Majmaʿ al-bayān fī tafsīr al-Qurʾān
A Twelver Shiite Quranic commentator, al-Ṭabrisī was born and raised in Khurasan in northeastern Iran. His name is sometimes given as al-Ṭabaršī, although al-Ṭabrisī seems the more accurate pronunciation. He studied with students of the other great Twelver Shiite exegete Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ṭūsī, spending much time in the Shiite sacred city of Mashhad, where he is buried. Like most prominent Twelver Shiite scholars of his time, he embraced many of the views of the rationalist Muʿtazilite school. His commentary is methodically structured, beginning the treatment of each Quranic passage with a series of technical discussions concerning issues of grammar, philology, and proper pronunciation and then following those with an interpretation of the content of the verses drawn from both Sunni and Shiite traditions.

Ṭūsī Muḥammad ibn Ḥasan al-Ṭūsī (d. 460/1067)

al-Tibyān fī tafsīr al-Qurʾān

Often referred to by his honorific title Shaykh al-Ṭāʾīfah (“Leader of the Community”) al-Ṭūsī was the leading Twelver Shiite religious scholar in Baghdad during the late Buyid period. Born in Tus in Khurasan (northeastern Iran), al-Ṭūsī migrated to Baghdad at an early age in order to study with the leading Twelver Shiite religious scholars al-Shaykh al-Mufīd and al-Sharīf al-Murtaḍā. Al-Ṭūsī tempered the rationalism of these two scholars, incorporating a renewed recognition of the importance of the transmitted traditions of the Imams into a more balanced Shiite theology and legal theory that championed the authority of the Twelver religious scholars and jurists in the absence of the Shiite Imams. This scholarly approach is reflected clearly in his extensive tafsīr. In addition to his Quranic commentary, al-Ṭūsī wrote many other theological, biographical, and bibliographical works as well as two of the four canonical collections of Twelver Shiite aḥādīth: al-Istibṣār and Tahdhīb al-aḥkām.

W. Abu’l-Ḥasan ʿAlī ibn Aḥmad al-Wāḥidī (d. 468/1076)

Asbāb nuzūl al-Qurʾān

A prominent religious scholar born in Nayshapur in northeastern Iran, al-Wāḥidī studied with al-Thaʿlabī, a prominent exegete and author of a comprehensive tafsīr. Al-Wāḥidī is the author of several exegetical works on the Quran. His Asbāb nuzūl al-Qurʾān is the earliest known example of a work devoted to presenting the circumstances in which particular Quranic verses or passages were revealed and the particular historical issues or problems to which they were responding. The tafsīr is not comprehensive, but only treats those verses for which the circumstances of revelation were known or transmitted.

Z. Abu’l-Qāsim Maḥmūd ibn ʿUmar al-Zamakhsharī (d. 538/1144)

al-Kashshāf ʿan ghawāmiḍ ḥaqāʾiq al-tanzīl wa ʿuyūn al-aqāwīl fī wujūh al-taʾwil

Born in Khwarazm in Central Asia in 467/1065, al-Zamakhsharī, a scholar of Arabic grammar and philology as well as Quranic exegesis, wrote numerous works on Arabic language and literature (adab). Al-Zamakhsharī was a great exponent of the beauty and perfection of Arabic as a sacred language, and his commentary is famous for its analysis of the grammatical, philological, and rhetorical aspects of the Quranic text. Theologically, he held rationalist Muʿtazilite views, which are also evident in his commentary.
Map 1: The Ancient World and Arabia with sites and peoples related to pre-Islamic prophets

- The datum of Ma‘rib was destroyed by an exceptional torrent (Siyar at-‘Arab) — perhaps in the third century AD — impelling many Yemeni tribes to migrate to other regions, including Syria and Madinah.
- The purported gene site of the Prophet Muhammad.
- Maritime trade routes to India.
Map 2: The Middle East in the Sixth Century AD until the birth of the Prophet Muhammad

For most of the sixth and early seventh centuries, Yemen was ravaged by internal conflict between the pagan Arab tribes of the coast involving the main Jewish tribes in illustrious alliances.

In ca. 520, Hunayn ibn Ishaq knew a DST with Judaism, persuaded the Christians of Najran, and their state who refused to announce the death of Jesus into forty (al-Dhahabah).

In 529, encouraged by the Umayyad incursion, Abyssinia invaded Yemen with Byzantine naval assistance and established a Christian kingdom in it.

In 570, the Abyssinian Venetian Aqbash led an army with an elephant and an orator at an assembly on Mount Nebi, attempting to destroy the Ka'bah after the demolition of his new cathedral in Jan 5 by an Arab tribesman.

In ca. 572, a Persian force sailed to Yemen and drove out the Abyssinians, reinstating a Yemeni prince as royal king. In 597/98 the Persians established direct control.

While taking part in a Mecca tribal council, the young Muhammad was recognized by certain signs as a future prophet by the monk Bajir near Beira.
Map 3: Developments in the Broader Region during the period of the Prophet's mission (610–632)

- The Persian conquest of the fortified town of Duma (Duma al-Khazā'ī) is sometimes identified with the Byzantine defeat mentioned in the Quran (9:52–53), since it lay on a principal overland route between Arabia and Syria. About nine years later, in 622, the Persians won a victory over the Byzantines at the battle of Una near Antioch, fulfilling the Quranic prophecy.
- First Hijrah: A small group of Muslims fled to Christian Abyaneh from persecution in Makkah in 615; a year later a larger group of Muslim refugees came. The Prophet encouraged them but did not join them. This group of exiles rejoined the Prophet in Makkah in 622, not long after the signing of the peace treaty of Hudaybiyyah and the final Byzantine victory over the Persians.
- The exodus (Hijrah) of the Prophet and his companions from Makkah to Madinah occurred during the last months of 622.
- The Byzantine victory at Una was a turning point of the war, leading to a series of victories that forced the Persians to retreat and abandon the war.

- Byzantine territories occupied by Persians by 622
- Byzantine territories captured by Christians by 629
- Byzantine territories captured by Muslims by 629
Map 4: Regional Map of the Hijāz

With tribes and major military campaigns outside of Madinah during the Prophet's lifetime.

- The tribes indicated in this map represent only a fraction of the tribes existing at the time, those being the main ones mentioned in the commentary. Their locations are approximate.
- In some cases place names associated with battles are rural locations, not built towns or permanent settlements.
- Battles in the immediate vicinity of Madinah are portrayed on map 7b.
- Dates in parentheses indicate when military action occurred.
Map 5a: Makkah and the Hajj Stations

1. Hajj Day One (Dhul-Hijjah): movement to Mina; spend night.

2. Sacred Mosque (al-Masjid al-Haram): three ritual lapsation pillars (Jamaraat) at Mina. Only one of them is stoned on day three, but all three are stoned on the following two or three days, each time with seven pebbles.

3. Hajj Day Two (Ninth Dhul-Hijjah): movement to Arafat; spend day in prayer and meditation until after sunset; then return movement to Muzdalifah to spend night.

4. Hajj Day Three (Tenth Dhul-Hijjah): movement to Minah; stone one pillar; make animal sacrifice; shave or trim hair (exit from ihram); make circumambulation of Ka'bah; return to Minah. The following two or three days are spent at Minah, performing the stoning ritual on all three pillars each day. The third day at Minah is optional.

Traditional border point (migdat) for entrance to sacred territory of Makkah. In consecrated state for minor pilgrimage (haram). These are not the same as the minim for hajj, which are farther away.
Map 5b: Umrah and the Sacred Mosque

This map shows the state of the structure enclosing the Ka'bah circa 2005. At the time of the Prophet no such structure existed. It was built in various ways over the centuries, and it continues to be modified and expanded today.

The first and most important ritual of umrah is circumambulation (tawaf), comprising seven circuits around the Ka'bah, which begin and end at the Black Stone or an imaginary radius extending from it.

The second major ritual of umrah, called sa'iy, entails seven brick laps between the two hillocks beginning with Safl and ending with Marwah.

The Black Stone (al-hajar al-awad), embedded in the eastern corner of the Ka'bah.

Map 7a: Battle of Uhud

Febunwal 3 March 625

Initially, the Muslim forces break through the enemy lines, put the Meccans to flight, and begin to plunder the Qayyarah camp, whose horsemen cannot maneuver effectively among the foot soldiers and cannot attack the Muslim flank due to the archers and the terrain.

In the ensuing rout, the Muslims, seventy of whom are slain, flee in all directions. The Prophet is wounded and is taken to safety by a small band who retreat into the gorge and up the slopes of Uhud.

The Prophet arranges his troops with their backs to the mountain, stationing 50 archers on a strategic hillock with strict orders to remain there to protect the army's rear and flank from enemy cavalry.

Most of the archers abandon their posts to join the plunder. The Maldan cavalry use this opening to swing around the hillock and attack the Muslims from the rear, turning the tide of battle.

The Prophet reaches Uhud in the predawn darkness with 700 men on foot. They face a Maldan army of 3,000 soldiers, including 200 horsemen.

Map 8a: Battle of Badr

Ramadan 2/March 624

Regular coastal caravan route between Syria and Makkah halted at the wells of Badr, about 19 miles (30 km) inland. Having seen the Muslim plan to attack his caravan, Abu Sofyan altered his course and led it farther west, closer to the sea.

Arriving from Madinah, the Muslim force of 313 men and only a couple of horses already knows that the caravan has escaped them and that a Makkah army is on its way.

The battle began with three simultaneous contests of single combat in which all three Makkah combatants were slain. Then the general engagement commenced, resulting in a stunning victory for the outnumbered Muslim forces who suffered 14 dead while slaying 70 of the enemy and capturing 70 others.

Arrival of the Makkah relief army, comprising around 4,000 men and 100 horses, certain of victory and eager to finish off the Muslim threat to their northern trade route.

Subsequently, the Muslims moved south down the valley, taking possession of a strategic well and despoiling several other wells nearer the Makkah encampment.

Muslims take possession of strategic wells, ruin others close to enemy camp.

Map 8b: Conquest of Makkah, Battle of Ḥunayn, and Siege of Ṭaʾīf
Ramadan–Shaʿwāl 8 / January–February 630

A dozen days after leaving Madinah, the Prophet and his army of 10,000, including large contingents of Bedouin, reached-Mar al-Zahran, about 9 miles (15 km) NE of Makkah.

Jiṭranah

Under strict order to avoid bloodshed and to avoid meeting with armed resistance, Muslim forces were divided into several regiments to enter Makkah from different directions simultaneously. The city was occupied with almost no fighting.

Taʾīf

During the Prophet’s two-week stay in Makkah he had news that the tribes of Hawazin and Ṭaʾīf assembled an army of 20,000 men to attack Makkah. Therefore, he set out with a force of 12,000, including 2,000 new Makkans recruited to launch a preemptive assault against their encampments north of Taʾīf.

A general amnesty was declared by the Prophet who destroyed all the idols around the Kaʿbah. Raids were also sent to demolish some nearby pagan shrines.

Following the victory at Ḥunayn, the Muslim forces marched on Taʾīf, one of the few walled fortified cities of Arabia at the time and a major pagan shrine, and besieged it for about two weeks before withdrawing.

At Jiṭranah, the booty of Hawazin was distributed by the Prophet, and he reassured the Ansār about his firm intention to return to Madinah. From this miḥtāj the Prophet’s last act in Makkah was to perform lesser pilgrimage.

The Muslim army was ambushed by the Hawazin in the narrow canyon of Ḥunayn, leading to an initial rout. But the Prophet’s forces regrouped and counterattacked, pursuing the enemy to their main encampment at Anṣaṭ (precise location unknown) seizing enormous booty and a large number of captives who were sent to Jiṭranah for safekeeping. Some of the Beirid Hawazin took refuge in the walled city of Taʾīf.

6. The most comprehensive examination of iltifāt in any European language is that of Muhammad Abdel Haleem in Understanding the Quran: Themes and Style (London: Tauris, 1999), 184–210.
8. M. A. S. Abdel Haleem, trans., The Qur’an (New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 2004), 208. Abdel Haleem adds a translation closer to that of Arberry in a note: “We sent you [the Prophet] only as a mercy to all people.”
10. Some scholars have proposed that dīn is a loanword borrowed from the Persian word den, meaning “systemic religion.” However, the variety of uses of dīn and words from the same root in the Quran and pre-Islamic poetry demonstrates that it has variegated meanings that are not all captured by the Persian word den.
11. For a full discussion of the meaning of dīn in the Quran, see Toshihiko Izutsu, God and Man in the Koran (Salem, NH: Ayer, 1987), chap. 8.
The situation is further complicated by the way dīn is used in pre-Quranic poetry, where it implies “wont” or “custom.” Thus one could say, “He followed the custom (dīn) of his people.”

It should also be mentioned that Shiite copies of the Quran have become more standardized and the discrepancy in numbering is seen less often now. Moreover, there is very close but not universal agreement as to the exact number of verses in the Quran. This disagreement pertains not to the text itself, but to how the text is divided. For example, some scholars say that al-Baqarah has 285 verses, while others say 286 or 287 verses, and this variation exists for other sūrahs as well.
30. Muslim 7.27 (no. 1850).
Certain more esoteric sciences dealing with the mysteries of the Quran, such as jafr, the science that treats the numerical symbolism of the letters of the Arabic alphabet (like gematria in the Kabbalistic sciences dealing with the Torah), reveal the significance of the existing order and numbering of the sūrahs in relation to their content and to each other. A clear indication of this matter is found in Ibn ʿArabī’s al-Futūḥāt al-makkiyyah (“The Makkān Illuminations”), a main section of which has 114 chapters, each related to a particular sūrah and following their order in the Quran, but in reverse.
34. One author compiled a list of 118 ḥuffāẓ from the six to seven hundred martyrs killed in the Battle of Yamāmah. See al-Qurṭubī, al-Jāmiʿ li-aḥkām al-Qurʾān, 1:50.

To cite an example from the English-speaking world, it is estimated that the number of U.S. dialects ranges from a basic three (New England, Southern, and Western/General America) to twenty-four or more. Some researchers claim it is impossible to count the number of dialects in the United States due to a loose definition of the term; thousands of cities and towns have their own subdialects. See Walt Wolfram and Natalie Schilling-Estes, American English: Dialects and Variation, 2nd ed. (Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2006).

64. Compare “color,” “center,” “organize,” and “program” (U.S.) with “colour,” “centre,” “organise,” and “programme” (U.K.).
This is true in other languages as well. Until 1901 the German language had no unified spelling rules; e.g., Thor and Tor were equally acceptable variants for the word meaning “gate.”
66. A detailed and fully documented discussion of these and other related issues can be found in Mohammad Mustafa al-Azami, The History of the Qur’anic Text: From Revelation to Compilation, 2nd ed. (Riyadh: Azami Publishing House, 2008).
1. Around the beginning of the fourteenth/twentieth century in Egypt, for instance, there were calls for the adoption of English or the Roman script for writing or even the local Arabic dialect of Egypt. These were fiercely rejected, because it would have meant severing the connection with the language of the Quran and the rich history of Arab Islamic culture.
2. The Archangel Gabriel merely transmitted the Quran to Muhammad: It is a revelation of the Lord of the worlds, brought down by the Trustworthy Spirit, upon thine heart (26:192–94).
4. A person touching the Quran has to be ritually clean.
5. In the Islamic educational system, learning grammar is connected, to this day, with the Quran. In my first grammar lessons, at the primary school of Al-Azhar in Cairo (opened in 361/972), we were told that the status of grammar was very elevated because it ensures correct understanding and reading of the Arabic text of the Quran and as such its study was an obligation of the Muslim community. See M. A. S. Abdel Haleem, “Early Islamic theological and juristic terminology: Kitāb al ḫudūd fīʾl-usūl, by Ibn Fūrak,” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 54, no. 1 (1991): 5.
6. Thus the Quran is not a book of history, science, or literature as such.
17. For additional examples, see, e.g., 2:68–69; 23:117.
19. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Masā’il fī adab al-kātib wa’l-shā’ir, ed. M. M. A. al-Qazwīnī (793/1338; Cairo: al-Ḥalabī, 1971), 2:43–45. Without referring to the Arabic term, Theodor Nöldeke remarks in discussing some examples of this feature that “the grammatical persons change from time to time in the Quran in an unusual and not beautiful way” (see Neue Beiträge zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft [Strasburg: Trubner, 1910]).
As can be seen from the fact that Ibn al-Athîr, when writing about rhetoric in prose and poetry, derived most of his examples of iltifât from the Quran.
23. See Ḥassān, al-Bayān fī rawāʾī al-Qurʾān, 95.
25. The Makkans were demanding that the Prophet perform such miracles to convince them of his prophethood. The Quran explains that it is not in his nature to do so.
26. Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh Darāz says: “Place your hand wherever you wish on the text of the Quran and count the number of words in the statements you see. Then compare this to what you consider most eloquent outside the Quran and then compare the amount of meaning in the two texts. Consider further how many words you can drop or replace from the Quran without disturbing the meaning and purpose of the statement” (al-Nabaʾ al-ẓīm [Cairo: Dār al-Qalam, 2005], 147).
These are all Indo-Aryan languages derived from Sanskrit. Of course all these languages have been influenced by Persian (and Arabic, lexically), but the languages remain Indo-Aryan. See any tree of the Indo-European languages.

46. Even though, according to one religious interpretation, it is permissible for those who cannot read Arabic to read the prayers in a foreign tongue, this rare view is opposed by the vast majority of Muslim experts on Islamic Law and is not practiced anywhere in the Islamic world.
Starting with the Ṭāhirid dynasty (821–73) and continuing under the later Saffārid, Samānid, and Ghaznavid dynasties. See Muḥammad Ghunaymī Hilāl, Mukhtārāt min al-shīr al-fārsī (Cairo: Maktabat al-ʿArabiyyah, 1965), 7.

There are now many schools, publishing houses, educational institutions, media outlets, and publications called *Iqra*². For example, a series of publications in Cairo is called *Iqra*²; there is an educational institution in Arabia with branches in other countries including Britain and America called *Iqra*²; and an Arab television channel also bears the same name.
1. Tafsîr in this article refers to the Sunni and Shiite exegetical traditions and, more specifically, the surviving tradition written in Arabic. A history of tafsîr that accounts for the output of all different schools and in many different languages is a project not likely to be attempted anytime soon. Moreover, a history of the genre of tafsîr, even when limited to one school, will always have to live with the fact that many major works of tafsîr have been lost. In the case of the Muʿtazilite tradition, the situation is irredeemable; most of the works of this school have not survived. For a survey of studies on early tafsîr, see Herbert Berg, The Development of Exegesis in Early Islam: The Authenticity of Muslim Literature from the Formative Period (London: Curzon, 2000). Special mention should be made of John Wansbrough, Quranic Studies: Sources and Methods of Scriptural Interpretation (Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1977); see also Meir Bar-Asher, Scripture and Exegesis in Early Imâmi Shiism (Leiden: Brill, 1999). Ignaz Goldziher, Die Richtungen der islamischen Koranauslegung (1920; Leiden: Brill, 1970) remains foundational in the field and a must-read.
2. The two classical biographical dictionaries on tafsīr authors are neither studied by Western scholars nor available in translation. Al-Suyūṭī’s Ṭabaqāt al-mufassirīn, ed. ʿAlī ʿUmar (Cairo: Maktabat Wahbah, 1976), and Shams al-Dīn al-Dāwūdī’s book with the same title and editor (Cairo: Maktabat Wahbah, 1972) have not been mined by the scholars in the field. The recently published inventory of tafsīr manuscripts al-Fihris al-shāmil li’l-turāth al-ʿarabī al-islāmī al-makhṭūṭ, ‘ulūm al-Qurʾān, makhṭūṭāt al-tafsīr, 13 vols. (Amman: Muʾassasah Āl al-Bayt li’l-Fikr al-Islāmī, 1987), offers the most comprehensive list of titles available so far. The value of this inventory has not been fully appreciated in the secondary literature. For the time being this is the standard reference work we have on tafsīr. By its very nature, however, the work has its limitations. It is simply a listing of titles and the locations of manuscript copies of such titles in the world, hardly the analytical history one would have hoped for. This is also not a complete inventory of the works produced in the history of the genre, since many works were lost and thus not listed in this index, which by definition is a list of extant works. Moreover, the catalogues that form the basis of this cumulative index have mistakes that gave rise to titles that do not exist in reality, and many collections were not and still are not properly catalogued. Yet even with all these drawbacks, this index is indispensable and should be the starting point of any historical handbook for the field.
The standard survey of tafsir works written in Arabic is Muḥammad al-Dhahabī, al-Tafsīr wa’l-mufassirūn, 3 vols. (Cairo: Dār al-Kutub al-Ḥadīthah, 1961). We should add Ibrāhīm Rufaydah, al-Naḥw wa-kutub al-tafsīr, 2 vols. (Binghāzī: al-Dār al-Jamāhīriyyah li’l-Nashr wa-al-Tawzī wa’l-ʿIʿlān, 1990). This is an essential work on the history of “grammatical” works in tafsir and is based on a survey of a large number of tafsir works. It is also the first work to offer a chronological periodization of the history of tafsir. Finally, the work written by Muḥammad al-Fāḍil ibn ʿĀshūr, al-Tafsīr wa rijāluh (Cairo: Majmaʿ al-Buḥūth al-Azhar, 1970), is the only history that discusses the glosses (ḥawāshi) and their place in the history of tafsir. This slim volume is an essential corrective to our current distorted view of tafsir. There are also a large number of monographs written in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish on individual exegetes. Eventually a survey of the secondary literature in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish is needed.
Recently, publishing houses in Beirut and Cairo have reissued out-of-print early ḥawāshī editions. The reprinting of ḥawāshī does not change the general assessment offered here. There has been no printing of any new ḥawāshī in the last sixty years or so in the Muslim world.
12. The three-volume history of tafsīr written by the modern Egyptian scholar al-Dhahabī fails to mention any ḥāshiyyah work, a remarkable omission. The only Arab scholar to give glosses their due was Ibn ʿĀshūr, the mufti of Tunisia, in his slim yet fundamentally significant history of the genre, al-Tafsīr wa rijāluhu (see n. 7).
There seems to have been a general trend at the middle of the fifth century AH to establish philology as the only method. We know of al-Hawfī among others; see Rufaydah, Nabw, 1:641–55.
17. The Quranic commentaries of these two exegetes, like the work of Abū Ḥayyān al-Gharnāṭī, though published, are still unexplored. These are massive works and await incorporation into the history of tafsīr.
18. A study of the Salafi radicalization of tafsīr is still a long way from being complete.
The two major studies in the West on modern tafsīr, which are now several decades old, are J. J. G. Jansen, The Interpretation of the Koran in Modern Egypt (Leiden: Brill, 1974); and Jacques Jomier, Le commentaire coranique du Manār (Paris: G.-P. Masionneuve, 1954).
2. Alan Arthur Godlas, “The ʿArāʾis al-bayān: The Mystical Qurʾānic Exegesis of Rūzbihān al-Baqli” (PhD diss., University of California, Berkeley, 1991), 60 (English), 257 (Arabic). There is in part an Ashʿarite doctrinal background to the comment. The Divine Word/Speech is an eternal Attribute of God and is thus characterized by God’s own intrinsic infinitude.
5. See Gerhard Böwering, The Mystical Vision of Existence in Classical Islam: The Qurʾānic Hermeneutics of the Sufi Sahl al-Tustarī (d. 283/896) (Berlin: De Gruyter, 1980), 139. A very similar interpretation of these terms is attributed by the great early redactor of mystical commentary al-Sulamī (see below in the text) to the much higher authority ʿAlī ibn Abī ṭālib himself. However, the authenticity of this has been disputed (Böwering, Mystical Vision of Existence, 140). Nevertheless many exegetes follow al-Sulamī in attributing the statement to ʿAlī, for example, Rūzbihān al-Baqlī. See Godlas, “ʿArāʾis al-bayān,” 63 (English), 259 (Arabic).
7. For example, ʿAlāʾ al-Dawlah al-Simnānī (d. 736/1336) says that the fourth level, al-muṭṭalaʿ, is only to be spoken of hesitantly: “The individual who has attained the secret of the essence should not comment at all, but proceed in a faltering manner into the point of ascent (al-muṭṭalaʿ) of the Quran” (Tafsīr najm al-Qurʾān, MS 165/1, Ḥeḥit Ali Pasa, 1–68, 18b). Translated and quoted in Jamal J. Elias, The Throne Carrier of God: The Life and Thought of ʿAlāʾ ad-Dawla as-Simnānī (Albany: State Univ. of New York Press, 1995), 40.
13. Ibn Rushd views it of course as a collective obligation (fard kifayah), to be fulfilled by those qualified on behalf of the whole community. He does not view it as an obligation at the level of the individual (fard 'ayn).
“I am not that beauty” renders man ān shāhid nīstam; that is, “I am not that beautiful person through whom God is contemplated.” There may be an implicit reference here to the mystical practice known as shāhid-bāzī, or contemplating the face of a beautiful individual as a reflection of Divine Beauty.
21. See Imam Ja‘far’s comment on Quran 24:35, which respectfully lists all four “Righteous Caliphs,” stating that just as God illumines the heavens through the archangels, He illumines the earth through the four Caliphs. The relevant comment quotes the ḥadīth, “My Companions are like the stars: whichever you follow, you are guided” (Nwyia, “Tafsīr mystique,” 212). Also see the reference to Abū Bakr as al-ṣiddīq al-akbar in the comment on 57:10 (Nwyia, “Tafsīr mystique,” 225).
22. For instance, there is a repeated stress on the doctrine of infallibility (al-ʿiṣmah). See, for example, the comment on 12:81 (where it is ruled that the statement that Benjamin, “the son of a prophet,” had stolen, is among the problematic verses, mushkilāt al-Qurʾān; Nwyia, “Taṣfīr mystique,” 201); also the comment on 20:121 (where Adam’s fall is said to have been outward, but not inward; 210); also the comment on 21:83 (where Job’s cry Affliction has befallen me! is not seen as a complaint, but rather as “part of his secret converse,” al-munājāt; 210). Al-ʿiṣmah is also mentioned explicitly in the comment on 2:210 (190). Nwyia has additionally presented a strongly Shiite comment on 2:27 absent from his edited text, but available in the manuscript Yeni Cami 43. See Paul Nwyia, Exégèse coranique et la langue mystique (Beirut: Dār Machreq Éditeurs, 1970), 159. Here God is said to have primordially created five beings from His Glory and attributed one of His own Names to each of them. They are the Prophet, ʿAlī, Fāṭimah, Ḥasan, and Ḥusayn.
In explaining this identification, we perhaps need to think of the verbal root underlying asmā‘, namely sīn-mīm-yā‘. Moreover, Arabic acronymy sometimes employs root letters other than the first.
32. One of many possible examples is the comment on 2:210: Do they wait for naught less than that God should come in the shadows of clouds? This ostensibly anthropomorphic statement is interpreted to mean the witnessing of God’s Kindness and Gentleness (birruhu wa-lufuhu) by way of the removal of amnesic veils (astār al-ghaflah; Nwyla, “Tafsīr mystique,” 190).
Among many examples: We have expounded the signs (or “We have detailed symbols,” qad fassoalna’l-āyāt) for a people who take heed (6:126).
35. Among many examples: We have set forth for mankind in this Quran every kind of parable (mathal), that haply they may remember (39:27).
41. As distinct from metaphor in praesentia and simile.

44. Ibn ʿArabī, Taṣḥīr al-Qurʾān, 2:38.
This analysis draws on a point made by Gavin Flood about ascetic practice, in which an “internalization of the tradition can also be described as the entextualization of the body” (The Ascetic Self: Subjectivity, Memory, and Tradition [Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2004], 212).
46. Ā‘ishah’s report continues: “He would be pleased through its good pleasure and angry through its anger (yārādi lī-ridāhu wa-yashkhu lī-sukhrihi),” or similar wording according to the version. See Aḥmad 10 (no. 25240); al-Ṭabarānī, al-Mu‘jam al-awsat, 1:30 (no. 72); al-Muttaqī, Kanz al-ʾummāl, 7:137 (no. 18378).
47. See n. 7.
48. Al-Sīmānī, Tafsīr najm al-Qurʾān, 89a. The general point has been well summarized as follows: “The spiritual realm, which is the world that lies within the body, is the macrocosm of the physical world, and the physical world, which appears to be larger than the body, is a microcosm. Since we view the relationship of the body and the soul from the point of view of human perception, the breast appears to be larger than the heart and to encompass it. However, at a metaphysical level, it is the heart that is larger. The spiritual realm, of which the mystical heart is a part, exists beyond the confines of the temporal realm and structures such as the human breast, which exist within it” (Elias, Throne Carrier, 68).
50. See Paul Nwyia, ed., “Muqaddimat tafsîr al-Qurʾân li-ʿAlâʾ al-Dawla al-Simnânî,” al-Abhâth 26 (1973–77): 141–57. Al-Simnânî says, for example, about the Eden narrative and references to Adam in the Quran, that these are to be read in relation to the basal center, al-laṭîfât al-qâlabiyyah (lit. “the matrix subtle center”): “Whenever you hear a part of the Book addressing Adam, listen to it with your bodily subtle substance (laṭîfah qâlabiyyah). . . . Know with certainty that the inner sense (baṭn) of this Book is connected to you in [the realm of] souls (anfus) just as its external sense is connected to Adam in [the realm of] horizons (āfāq)” (Nwyia, “Muqaddimat tafsîr,” 147). Quoted in Kristin Zahra Sands, Ṣūfî Commentaries on the Qurʾân in Classical Islam (London: Routledge, 2006), 44.
51. “The Quran has an exterior (ṣahr) and an interior (baṭn), and its interior has an interior—up to seven interiors or up to seventy interiors.” See, for example, Muḥammad Ḥusayn Ṭabāṭabāʾī, Tafsīr al-mīzān, 1:7. Also see al-Kulaynī, al-Uṣūl min al-kāfī, 2:599, bāb faḍl al-Qurʾān, no. 2. On al-Simnānī’s coordination of the levels of interior meaning mentioned in this ḥadīth with the seven subtle centers, see Sands, Ṣūfī Commentaries, 44.
Al-Subkī quotes al-Shahrastānī’s contemporary Abū Saʿd al-Samʿānī: “He was suspected of inclining to the people of the mountain fortresses (ahl al-qila‘), meaning the Ismāʿīlīs, their missionary activity, and defending their calamities” (Ṭāj al-Dīn al-Subkī, Ṭabaqāt al-shāfiʿiyyat al-kubrā, ed. Maḥmūd al-Tanāḥī and ʿAbd al-Fattāḥ al-Ḥalw [Cairo: Ṭabāʿat ʿĪsā al-Bābī al-Ḥalabī, 1383/1963], 128–30).

1. The “sign verses” are so called because of a refrain that often occurs in these verses in various forms, such as Truly in that is a sign for a people who reflect (16:11) or Surely in this is a sign for a people who hear (16:65).
2. See also 25:62 and 78:11, in which the day is mentioned as a time for seeking sustenance.
9. See n. 8. The word ṭibyān ("clarification") in the title is taken from 16:89: And We sent down unto thee the Book as a clarification of all things, and as a guidance and a mercy and glad tidings for those who submit.
Other distinct categories of traditional tafsīr include: tafsīr riwāʾī, which makes transmitted report (riwāyah) its mainstay; tafsīr kalāmī, which focuses on theological issues; tafsīr nabhī, which discusses issues of grammar; tafsīr ṣūfī, mystical tafsīr; tafsīr ʿirfānī, gnostic tafsīr; and tafsīr adabī, which treats matters of language and style. In many tafāsīr, aspects mentioned above are often combined.
11. Muḥammad Ḥusayn al-Dhahabī, al-Tafsīr waʾl-mufassirūn, 4th ed., 2 vols. (Cairo: Maktabat al-Wahbiyyah, 1985). This work has been posthumously reprinted in three volumes by Shirkah Dār Arqam ibn Abiʾl-Arqam, n.d. In a short note at the beginning of the third volume, the publisher states that this volume is based upon al-Dhahabī’s lectures delivered at the University of Baghdad, 1960–63, and that these lectures act as a prologue to many discussions of al-Tafsīr waʾl-mufassirūn. All references are to this expanded edition.
Asad’s scientism and rationalism are more obvious in the translation and notes of those verses of the Quran in which direct reference is made to miracles. For instance, he translates 3:49, in which the Quran mentions miraculous actions of Jesus, such as the breathing of life into clay birds, the healing of the blind and the leper, and bringing the dead back to life, as: “And [will make him] an apostle unto the children of Israel. ‘I have come unto you with a message from your Sustainer. I shall create for you out of clay, as it were, the shape of [your] destiny, and then breathe into it, so that it might become [your] destiny by God’s leave; and I shall heal the blind and the leper, and bring the dead back to life by God’s leave; and I shall let you know what you may eat and what you should store up in your houses. Behold, in all this there is indeed a message for you, if you are [truly] believers.” Explaining his translation in notes (nn. 36–39), he states: “In the parabolic manner so beloved to him, Jesus intimated to the children of Israel that out of the humble clay of their lives he would fashion for them the vision of a soaring destiny, and that this vision, brought to life by his God-given inspiration, would become their real destiny by God’s leave and by the strength of their faith. . . . It is probable that the ‘raising of the dead’ by Jesus is a metaphorical description of his giving new life to people who were spiritually dead. . . . If this interpretation is—as I believe—correct, then the ‘healing of the blind and the leper’ has a similar significance: namely, an inner regeneration of people who were spiritually diseased and blind to the truth” (p. 74).
22. The word iʿjāz, from the root ʿ-𝑗-;z, has various meanings including "to disable," "to incapacitate," "to be impossible," "to be inimitable." The Quranic challenge occurs in 2:23; 10:38; 11:13; and 17:88 in slightly different forms. The first one states: If you are in doubt concerning what We have sent down unto Our servant, then bring a sūrah like it, and call your witnesses apart from God if you are truthful. Responding to disbelievers accusing the Prophet of fabricating the Quran, 10:38 challenges them to produce a sūrah like the sūrahs of the Quran, and 11:13 asks them to produce ten. The last one, 17:88, maintains that even human beings and jinn working together could not meet the challenge.
Many books have been written on this aspect. See, e.g., Muṣṭafā Muslim, Mabāḥīth fī iʿjāz al-Qurʾān (Damascus: Dār al-Qalam, 1999).
24. Ghulam Ahmad Parvez says: “It is generally understood that Adam, about whom the Quran states at various places that he was expelled from jannah (the Garden), was a prophet, but the Quran does not support this view. What the Quran has stated in different verses indicates that the person expelled from jannah was not any specific man, but a metaphorical representative of humanity. In other words, the story of Adam is not the story of one particular person (or a couple), but the tale of Man which the Quran has told metaphorically” (Lughāt al-Qurʾān [Lahore: Adārah Ṭalūʿ-e Islām, 1960], 1:214).
Muḥammad Iqbal did not write a commentary on the Quran, but the Quran was the most central influence on his life and thought. He had studied modern Western philosophy and was aware of new developments in modern science. His poetry does not show any sign of Western influences, but in his basic philosophical work, The Reconstruction of Islamic Thought, he seems to be deeply influenced by evolutionary concepts: “I am, therefore, inclined to think that the jannat in the Quranic narration is the conception of a primitive state in which man is practically unrelated to his environment and consequently does not feel the sting of human wants the birth of which alone marks the beginning of human culture. Thus we see that the Quranic legend of the Fall has nothing to do with the first appearance of man on this planet. Its purpose is rather to indicate man’s rise from a primitive state of instinctive appetite to the conscious possession of a free self, capable of doubt and disobedience” (The Reconstruction of Islamic Thought [Lahore: Iqbal Academy, 1986], 66–67).
30. This literature is being produced in all languages and countries. A few examples of such works are: Muhammad ʿAlī al-Bārr, Khalq al-insān bayn al-ţibb wa’l-Qurʾān (The Creation of the Human Being in Medicine and the Quran) (Jeddah: al-Dār al-Saʿūdiyyah, 1986); Ghulam Jilani Barq, Dō Qurʾān (Two Qurans) (Lahore: Shaykh Ghulam Ali, n.d.); S. Pannell and the author as The Bible, the Qur’an and Science (Indianapolis: North American Trust Publications, 1978). Since its original publication, the book has been published in hundreds of pirated local editions all over the Muslim world. Also of interest is a rebuttal to this work by William F. Campbell, The Qur’an and the Bible in the Light of History and Science (Upper Darby: Middle East Resources, 1986).
Notable among the Muslim scholars who have been associated with the commission are Sheikh Abdul Majeed Zindani, its founder and first secretary-general, and Zaghloul El-Naggar, an Egyptian geologist. The commission has published about twenty books dealing with the “scientific miracles” of the Quran in fields such as embryology, botany, geology, astronomy, and cosmology. Among non-Muslim scholars who have participated in these conferences are gynecologist Joe Leigh Simpson, marine scientist William Hay, and embryologist Keith Moore.
The first international conference organized by the Commission for Scientific Miracles of the Quran and Sunnah was held in Islamabad, Pakistan, in 1987; the fifth in Beirut in 2000.

1. According to the majority of scholars (‘ulamā’), verses revealed during the Prophet’s migration to Madinah, prior to his arrival, are classified as Makkan, and verses revealed after the Prophet’s migration to and travels outside of Madinah after his migration there are classified as Madinan.
2. These fundamentals invite people to virtue, noble character traits (makārim), and good manners (adab) and warn them against acts of vice (radhāʾil) and vileness (qabāʾil) in speech and deed.
3. Of course, the Quran can certainly be explored through literary-critical means—the results of such inquiry will be further testament to its “inimitability” or miraculous nature—but an integral understanding of the Sacred Text requires it to be read as such, making use of the full breadth and depth offered by the traditional Quranic disciplines.
6. The ḥajj may be left undone if one is unable to perform it (for financial or health reasons) or in the case of a lack of security on the road; prayers may be shortened during travel; dry ablution may take the place of water ablution; two canonical prayers may be combined; prayer may be discontinued and made up later in case of fear or danger; carrion meat may be eaten in case of need; and wine may be drunk to remedy choking.
13. The Quran draws attention to the law of “change” in 13:11 (Truly God alters not what is in a people until they alter what is in themselves). We note here that awareness of the principle of becoming and continuous change in this world is deeply rooted in Islamic thinking, most of all in the sciences of wisdom (ʿulūm al-ḥikmah): falsafah (philosophy), kalām (theology), and taṣawwuf (mysticism). The theologians of Islam (al-mutakallimūn) have been conscious, from the very early days of philosophical meditation in Islamic civilization, that the universe is in a state of flux, becoming, and change. Abu’l-Ḥasan al-Ashʿarī (d. 324/935) emphasized that no accident can occur twice; the Muʿtazilites took a similar view. The theosopher of great genius Mullā Ṣadrā al-Shīrāzī (d. 1050/1640) departed from philosophical convention by introducing a profound theory about substantial motion (al-barakah al-jawhariyyah). Whereas Ibn Sīnā and the philosophers of the Middle Ages, Eastern and Western, maintained that motion occurs only in the category of accidents (time, place, quantity, quality, etc.), Mullā Ṣadrā added to these the category of substance, demonstrating that motion occurs in the category of substance itself and not only in the category of accidents. According to Mullā Ṣadrā, change and renewal from moment to moment is a definite law in the cosmos, in both the celestial (the planets and the heavenly bodies) and the terrestrial realms—in this matter, “The condition of the sun and the moon is similar to persons, such as Zayd or Ṭāmīr; all are subject to change, evanescence, and perishing”—and this insight was inspired specifically by verses of the Quran, such as the following: And thou seest the mountains that thou dost suppose are solid pass away like clouds (27:88); Nay, but they are in doubt regarding a new creation (50:15); and All affairs are journeying unto God (42:53).
15. Aḥādīth also play a crucial role in the determination of laws based on the Quranic Text; this will be discussed in the final section of the essay.
16. Among the examples scholars posit of equivocal and unequivocal verses one can mention:

(1) Divorced women shall wait by themselves for three courses (2:228). The word translated courses (qurʾ) here possesses the two contrary meanings of both “a menstruation” and “a state of purity from menstrual discharge.” If the first is intended, then a (nonpregnant) divorced woman must wait for three menstruation periods before remarrying; if the second, then for three periods of purity following menstruation. The first suggests a period shorter than the second, and legal opinion differs as to which is correct.

(2) Forbidden unto you [as wives] are your mothers, your daughters, your sisters, your fathers’ sisters, your mothers’ sisters, your brothers’ daughters, your sisters’ daughters, your milk-mothers and milk-sisters, the mothers of your wives, the stepdaughters in your care—born of your wives with whom you have consummated marriage, but if you have not consummated the marriage with them, then there is no blame on you—and the wives of your sons who are from your loins, and two sisters together, save for what is past. Truly God is Forgiving, Merciful (4:23). This text indicates that marrying both a mother and daughter is prohibited unequivocally, but determining what a “daughter” is is equivocal. Does it mean a natural daughter or the linguistic term “daughter,” which includes a foster daughter?
Muslim scholars do not speak of the terms of the Quran (\(\text{alf\(\ddot{a}\)z al-Qur\'\(\ddot{a}\)n}\)), but of Quranic composition (\(\text{al-na\(\ddot{a}\)m al-qur\'\(\ddot{a}\)\(\ddot{a}\)n}\)). Na\(\ddot{a}\)m signifies the ordering of pearls (\(\text{na\(\ddot{a}\)m al-durr}\)) on a string, which sense is more consonant with the words of the Quran, which are strung together in a subtle order like a string of pearls. Sa\'d al-Din al-Taftazani, \(\text{Sharh al-talwih \text{"ala\'}l-tawdib}\) (Beirut), 1:30.
19. Naturally, it is not possible to recount all of the subtle and deep studies that have resulted from research into how words indicate meanings; nor can we summarize them in this essay. It is extremely difficult in our present age for nonspecialists to master the intellectual foundations necessary for the movement of intellectual renewal (ijtihād) that constitutes an essential attribute of Islamic civilization and is in the spirit of the Quran and the Sunnah. Seeking to understand the Quran and the Sunnah in the absence of these fundamentals leads to the abuse and distortion of Islam that negate the learned consciousness of the ummah and lead to the flattening and superficialization of the religion—whether this comes from those working to bring an end to the Quran and the Sunnah as the sources that form the Muslim mind, imagination, and sentiment or from those limited by their own deviant premises, which they believe to be genuine knowledge. The final objectives of both of these camps coincide in their desire to see the Noble Quran reduced to a petrified relic severed from present-day reality. Perhaps one can diagnose the mystery of the affliction that has befallen the ummah by understanding the intentions of these kinds of people, whom the Prophet described when he said: “They recite the Quran, but it does not go beyond their throats; they stray from religion like a shaft strays from its mark” (al-Bukhārī, K. faḍāʾil al-Qurʾān, chap. 36, no. 5058). It will suffice readers to study the subtle inquiries in the science of the principles of jurisprudence, which abound in hundreds of masterly works and are capable of helping people learn how to deal with the Quran and the Sunnah in an adequate intellectual manner, opening up the vistas of learning that previously succeeded in inspiring Muslims and non-Muslims alike and changing the face of history and the march of civilizations.
21. What is meant by Divine Address, in both Sunni and Shi’ite circles, is the eternal Word of God (al-kalām al-azalī al-qadīm), not word in the sense of letters or written text. Thus the legal rulings of God that we know as the Sharī‘ah are actually the eternal Word that is spoken within God (al-kalām al-nafsī al-qadīm), and the Quranic composition that we recite refers to the eternal rule governing God’s Word. As for the Mu‘tazilites, who believe the Quran to be created and who deny the uncreated and eternal nature of the Quran, the legal rulings of the Sharī‘ah are not Divine Speech or Word, but the actions that the Lawgiver establishes in accordance with intrinsic beauty and goodness (husn) or ugliness and evil (qubḥ) of actions. What is beautiful He commands us to do; what is ugly He forbids us to do. This is the inverse position from that of the people of the Sunnah, who maintain that it is God’s Address that makes commands beautiful and God’s Interdiction that makes it ugly; acts themselves, before the arrival of the indications from Sharī‘ite rulings, may not be described as either beautiful or ugly. Therefore, we find the question of the beauty or the ugliness of acts and whether they are determined by reason or by the Sharī‘ah taught in the prologues to the science of the principles of jurisprudence, because it is directly linked to Sharī‘ite rulings and their effects on the acts of those obliged to follow them. Whether these rulings create the nature of acts, as the people of the Sunnah say, or simply reveal their intrinsic nature, as the Mu‘tazilites say, is explained in these sources. See ‘Abd al-‘Alī ibn Nizām al-Dīn al Laknawī, Fawātiḥ al-raḥamūt bi-sharḥ musallam al-thubūt (Beirut, 2002), 2:3; Muḥammad Muṣṭafā Shalabī, ʿUṣūl al-fiqh al-islāmī (Beirut, 1986), 56; and Sayyid Muḥammad Taqī al-Ḥakīm, ʿUṣūl al-fiqh al-muqārin (Beirut, 2001), 1:5–2.

To reiterate the point made earlier, Muslims believe that the Quran fulfills uniquely all of the conditions necessary for the preservation of the authentic, original text, an authenticity that is guaranteed by the fact that it has been preserved unaltered over the ages in hearts as well as in written form.
Concerning these subjects see al-Ḥakīm, al-Uṣūl al-ʿāmmah. This is a precise and valuable work in explaining sources upon which Sunnis, Shiites, and Muʿtazilites agree and those upon which they differ. There is an anthology of Suhrawardi’s commentaries on various verses of the Quran and his interpretation of them edited by Sīmā Sādāt Nūrbakhsh under the title ʿĀyat-i ishrāq: taḥṣīl wa taʾwīl-i āyāt-i Qurʾān-i karīm dar ʿāthār-i Suhrawardī (Tehran: Mihr Niyūshā, 1386/2007).

In the introduction to al-Mīzān he expresses criticism of certain views of the theologians and philosophers; see Muḥammad Ḥusayn Ṭabāṭabāʾī, Tafsīr al-mīzān (Beirut: Muʿassasat al-Aʿlamī, 1997), 1:4–5, 7.
2. The sentence is part of this prayer of the Prophet: “O God, place in my heart a light, in my hearing a light, in my sight a light, on my right hand a light, on my left hand a light, before me a light, behind me a light, above me a light, below me a light, and appoint for me a light” or “make me into a light” (Muslim 7.26, no. 1830).
7. This ḥadīth is not found in the standard collections and is rejected by most Ḥadīth experts, some of whom ascribe it instead to the Prophet’s cousin ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib. See Moḥammad ibn al-Munawwar, Asrār al-tawḥīd fī maqāmāt al-Shaykh Abī Saʿīd, ed. M. R. Shafīʿī Kadkanī (Tehran: Āgāh, 1366/1987), 774–75.
8. Rūmī begins the Arabic introduction to his great work with these words: “This is the book of the Mathnawī, and it is the roots of the roots of the roots of the religion, unveiling the mysteries of arrival [at God] and certainty; it is God’s greatest jurisprudence (fiqh Allāh al-akbar), God’s brightest Path (sharʿ Allāh al-azhar), and God’s most manifest proof (burhān Allāh al-azhar).”
10. Muslim 2.41 (no. 275).
This saying is much quoted in later texts from around the seventh/thirteenth century on, but most Hadīth scholars do not consider it authentic.
In other versions, the ḥadīth of the Hidden Treasure reads “I desired” (aradtu) instead of “I loved” (aḥbantu). Theologians usually classify “love” as a specific form of “desire.”
There are seven or, according to certain classifications, ten “readings” of the Quran, which all go back to the second century AH and are drawn from the Prophetic tradition. They are the schools of Madinah, Makkah, Basra, Damascus, and Kufa and two others propagated, respectively, in Morocco, and eastern Arabia and Iraq. See Muḥammad ṭāhir ibn ‘Abd al-Qādir al-Kurdi, Taʿrīkh al-Qurʾān wa gharāʾib rasmihi wa ḥukmihi, 2nd ed. (Cairo: Muṣṭafa’l-Bābi’l-Ḥalabī, 1372/1953), 108.
A splendid collection of the various styles of calligraphy used to transcribe the Quran has been compiled by Martin Lings in his Splendours of Quran Calligraphy and Illumination, published with great care by the Thesaurus Islamicus Foundation (Vaduz, Liechtenstein: 2005). It contains 180 color samples of Kūfic, Naskh, Muḥaqqaq, and Rayḥān as well as other small and large cursive scripts of the Islamic East and West.
The typology of mosques has been clearly analyzed and presented, with photographs by Henri Stierlin and Eduard Wismer and plans drawn by Alfred Hersberger, in Ulya Vogt-Göknil, Mosquées: Grands courants de l’architecture islamique (Paris: Chêne, 1975). After the Arab hypostyle mosque, the author examines three types of Islamic architecture that appeared up to 1706, namely, the Persian mosque with four īwāns, the Seljuq mosque of Asia Minor, and the Ottoman mosque with dome. None of these types has been considered in our essay, where the primordial simplicity of the earliest Nabawī Mosque has been taken as the key to understanding the nature of the relationship between Islamic architecture and the Quranic Revelation.
2. In this vein the Quran says: We shall show them Our signs upon the horizons and within themselves till it becomes clear to them that it is the truth (41:53).
3. The word zubur is translated here “scriptures.” The singular, zabūr, identifies the revelation with the Prophet David (4:163; 17:55). Zubur could thus be translated “Psalms” or “scriptures.”
4. Al-Bukhārī 60.51 (no. 3481).
5. Several verses also speak of Jesus as confirming what came before him (3:50; 5:46; 61:6), and Moses is said to confirm what was already with his people, i.e., the Torah (2:41, 89, 91; 4:47).
6. For a discussion of Muslims who maintained that the previous scriptures had been abrogated, see Camilla Adang, Muslim Writers on Judaism and the Hebrew Bible from Ibn Rabban to Ibn Ḥazm (Leiden: Brill, 1996), chap. 6.
8. Al-Ṭabarî, Jāmiʿ al-bayān, 1:369. Regarding the claim that 2:62 is abrogated by 3:85, the sixth/twelfth-century commentator al-Ṭabrisî says: “This is far [from the mark], because it is not permissible for abrogation to be applied to a report that contains a [Divine] Promise.” Abû ʿAlî al-Faḍîl al-Ṭabrisî, Majmaʿ al-bayān fī tafsîr al-Qurʾān, 10 vols. (Beirut: Muʾassasat al-ʿĀlamî, 1415/1995), 1:244.
10. Many prefer to interpret these verses as a reference to a group of Jews who became Muslim, but the argument is illogical, as they would no longer be referred to as “People of the Book” after having joined the Islamic community. In addition, many exegetes, such as al-Qurṣūbī (2:532), also mention that it could refer to a group among the People of the Book who believe as opposed to a group who disbelieve (as in 98:1–4). Al-Ṭabarī gives preference to this interpretation, saying that it refers to two groups among the People of the Book, one believing and one disbelieving (4:67).
11. Though the Biblical presentation of the covenant is heavily disputed, making it difficult to draw specific comparisons between the Quranic and the Biblical accounts, the general concept is nonetheless similar enough to warrant comparison. For the Biblical treatment of the covenant, see Delbert R. Hillers, Covenant: The History of a Biblical Idea (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 1969).
12. “Then he [Moses] took the book of the covenant, and read in the hearing of the people; and they said, ‘All that the Lord has spoken we will do, and we will be obedient.’ Moses took the blood and dashed it on the people, and said, ‘See the blood of the covenant that the Lord has made with you in accordance with all these words’” (Exodus 24:7–8).
13. The Quranic assertion that God spoke to Moses directly, which is also part of the Biblical tradition, is the basis of Moses’ Islamic title Kalīm Allāh; it is also the basis for Moses’ particular degree of distinction among the prophets as implied (without mentioning his name explicitly) in Quran 2:253.
“Messenger” and “Prophet” are sometimes used interchangeably, but many consider each to have specific technical meaning. A prophet (nabi) is said to differ from a messenger (rasūl) in that a messenger brings a new religion (dīn), whereas a prophet only reaffirms a previous revealed religion and reestablishes its proper observance or, as in the case of John the Baptist, heralds the coming of a messenger. A messenger thus fulfills all the functions of a prophet and is a prophet, but a prophet does not necessarily perform all the functions of a messenger and is not a messenger.
15. The Gospels implicitly and the Letters explicitly present the new covenant through the blood of Jesus as a return to the universal covenant of Abraham that is for both Jew and Gentile. But the Letter to the Hebrews goes so far as to argue that the former covenant has been rendered “weak and ineffectual” (7:18–19), such that “Jesus has also become the guarantee of a better covenant” (7:22). Jesus is thus believed to replace the levitical priesthood, because “he is the mediator of a better covenant, which has been enacted through better promises” (8:6).
17. Al-Bukhārī 23.79 (nos. 1373–74), 65.[30].2 (no. 4822); Muslim 47.6 (nos. 6926, 6929, 6932).
Such corruption is said to occur through distortion (taḥrīf) of scripture (2:75; 4:46; 5:13, 41), forgetting a part of that whereof they were reminded (5:13; cf. 23:110), and intentionally concealing the truth (2:146, 159, 174; 3:71), among other vices.
The notion of the covenant as presented in the Quran could in principle be applied also to non-Abrahamic religions. Such an allusion is found in 4:163–65, cited above. But as such religions are not mentioned directly in the Quran, they are beyond the scope of this essay.
23. Jewish scholarship recognizes that Abraham did not practice the central rites of Judaism, which were revealed on Mt. Sinai, and was not technically a Jew. The term “Judaism” originates as a designation for the tribe that descended from Jacob’s fourth son, Judah. The religion that we now know as Judaism (Yahadut) was first given that name in 2 Maccabees 2:21 and 8:1, written seventeen hundred years after Abraham. The term “Jews” (Yahudim) appears before this, in Esther 8:17, which is still over a millennium after the period in which Abraham is believed to have lived.
25. For comparison of the Quranic and Biblical stories of the prophets, see Roberto Tottoli, Biblical Prophets in the Qurʾān and Muslim Literature (Richmond, Surrey: Curzon, 2002).
27. For an examination of the story of Moses in the Quran, see Brannon M. Wheeler, Moses in the Quran and Islamic Exegesis (London: Routledge Curzon, 2002).
29. This is similar to the account of the Annunciation in the Gospel of Luke, according to which Mary shows fear and asks the Archangel Gabriel: “How will this be, since I am a virgin?” (1:34), to which Gabriel responds, “For nothing will be impossible with God” (1:37).
Another account of this saying reads: “No child is born but that he is pricked by Satan and begins to weep because of the pricking of Satan, except for the son of Mary and his mother” (Muslim 44.40 [no. 6282]). A third version states: “Satan touches every son of Adam on the day when his mother gives birth to him, except for Mary and her son” (Muslim 44.40 [no. 6284]).
That the Oneness of God is fundamental to traditional Christianity is clear from the beginning of the Nicene Creed: “We believe in one God, the Father, the Almighty, maker of heaven and earth.” As the third-century church father Tertullian writes: “Father and Son and Spirit are three, however, not in status but in rank, not in substance but in form, not in power but in appearance; they are, however, of one substance and of one status and of one power, because God is one, from whom these ranks and forms and appearances are designated in name as Father and Son and Holy Spirit” (Adversus Praxeann, chap. 2; cited in Luke Timothy Johnson, The Creed [New York: Doubleday, 2004], 121).
34. For further elaboration of the manner in which the Quran can be seen as presenting all revelations as deriving from a single source, see 85:21–22c (also see 3:7; 13:39; 43:4).
35. See n. 8.
1. It should be noted that the tradition of Twelver Shiite commentary on the Quran asserts that the verse quoted here, as well as numerous others, should be understood specifically as references to the twelve Shiite Imams—that is, to the hereditary line of spiritual and political authority after the Prophet, which includes his cousin and son-in-law ’Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib and his descendants.
2. On this same subject, it is also worth noting that although a husband may bring unsubstantiated accusations of infidelity against his wife without penalty, his word carries no more weight than her own, such that if he insists she is guilty and she insists upon her innocence, the matter is considered to be without resolution on the human plane, and ultimate justice is left to God (24:6–9).
3. For example, the families of homicide victims are entitled to monetary compensation for their losses, but are encouraged to forgo the payment in forgiveness or charity (4:92; 5:45); and although women divorced before their marriages have been consummated are entitled to a portion of the dowry promised them, the Quran states that to forgo this is nearer to reverence (2:237).
4. An additional example of this principle is the case of the criminal punishments ordained for slaves. Although the Quran establishes a stiff penalty for sexual immorality that is identical for men and women, this penalty is diminished in the case of slaves, who receive only half the punishment normally meted out to free persons (4:25). Therefore, slaves, who enjoy fewer rights and privileges in their social lives, are considered correspondingly less “responsible” for their criminal activity.
5. Divorce in Islamic Law is considered makrūh, that is, discouraged or reprehensible, although not legally forbidden.
Women do have a limited right to divorce in Islamic Law, which stipulates that a man who becomes incapable of fulfilling or fails to fulfill his marital responsibilities can be sued for divorce by his wife in an Islamic court of law. According to the Quran, a woman may also return part of her dowry as a means of seeking her husband’s consent to a mutual divorce.
7. Several Quranic verses provide a list of those who are particularly entitled to charity, with relatives and family members always placed first; see 2:215; 4:36; 17:26; 30:38.
Nothing in the Quran explicitly prohibits women taking active or leadership roles in society. Moreover, it is not uncommon for women to hold positions of considerable, if informal, influence within their own families and, furthermore, numerous women have achieved positions of religious, social, or political influence throughout Islamic history. The Prophet’s first wife, Khadijah, may be cited as an example of a woman who possessed her own wealth and ran her own business. She was also the first person to hear the message revealed to Muhammad, the first to accept it, and one of Muhammad’s most important supporters during the early years of his prophecy.
However, as the nearest of kin, the father could often claim whatever remained of his child’s estate after all explicitly stipulated shares had been distributed, thus potentially inheriting more than the mother; see 4:11–12c.
11. For a similar emphasis on maternal sacrifice and the duty it enjoins upon children, see 31:14. These verses apply to both men and women with respect to their parents; the duties of kindness, loyalty, and care are incumbent upon both sons and daughters.
12. Numerous passages of the Quran chastise those who see great wealth and numerous children as a sign of nobility and maintain that such things come as a free gift from God to the deserving and the undeserving alike, but that these worldly assets cannot avail them on the Day of Judgment or render them impervious to Divine Justice. See 9:55, 69, 85; 18:46; 23:55–56; 34:35–37; 58:17; 63:9; 64:15.
13. Numerous statements about the creation of various beings in pairs can be found in the Quran. See 13:3; 20:53; 31:10; 36:36; 42:11; 53:45; 55:52; 78:8.
The Muslim scholar Asma Barlas has argued that the Quran can be read as an “anti-patriarchal” scripture in that it sought to undo the patriarchy already existent in pre-Islamic Arabia and elsewhere. See Believing Women in Islam: Unreading Patriarchal Interpretations of the Quran (Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 2002), esp. chap. 4. She makes a number of important and substantial points about the limitations to traditional “patriarchal” rights of fathers and husbands in the Quran. However, the conclusion that the Quran is “anti-patriarchal” as such is hard to reconcile with the Quran’s fairly explicit endorsement of male leadership—even if not absolute authority—over the marital unit in 4:34.
Azizah al-Hibri, “An Introduction to Muslim Women’s Rights,” in Windows of Faith: Muslim Women Scholar-Activists in North America, ed. Gisela Webb (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse Univ. Press, 2000), esp. 63–64. In her discussion of this issue, al-Hibri invokes the Islamic legal principle of ʿilla (reason, or juridical rationale). According to this principle, if the Quran gives a particular ruling based conditionally upon a certain set of circumstances (in the case of 4:34, a husband’s authority seems to be explicitly based upon his providing materially for his wife), then when those circumstances fail to obtain in a particular context, the ruling is void in that particular context (see 63–64).

19. Although the gender of the orphans is not explicit in the text, the context makes it clear that the Quran is speaking about orphan girls.
20. “What the right hand possesses” is a common Arabic phrase meaning either slaves or captives.
Islamic Law establishes that a woman’s right to property extends beyond dowry and inheritance to all of her personal property—including that acquired through earnings from her own labor or business enterprise, even if the Quran does not address these issues directly.
The Hebrew Bible mentions levirate marriage as an obligation upon the deceased’s brother only in the case where the deceased has no male issue; see Leviticus 18:16; 20:21; Deuteronomy 25:56. Later Talmudic tradition, however, looked unfavorably on this practice and revised the Torah prescription in this matter.
23. This is one meaning of 4:19; the other is that husbands should not harass their wives in an effort to get them to relinquish part of their dowry or property to them. See al-Ṭabarī, Ḫāmiʿ al-bayān, 4:408–10.
This is also enjoined for the Jews as an obligation second only to prayer (see 2:83; 5:12) and for Abraham’s sons (21:73). Other Quranic passages do not mention the zakāh specifically, but enjoin believers to “spend of what God has given them” as an obligation second to prayer; see 2:3; 8:3; 13:22; 14:31; 22:35.
Voluntary charity as an attitude and practice can be witnessed throughout the Islamic world and is particularly in evidence during the sacred month of Ramadan and during the ʿĪd festivals that follow both the fast of Ramadan (ʿīd al-fīṭr) and the ḥajj, or pilgrimage (ʿīd al-aḍḥā).
27. The Quran recommends caring for orphans out of one’s own wealth, if possible, leaving the orphan’s own wealth untouched, and turning it over to the orphan upon legal maturity. However, in cases where those caring for an orphan do not have the means to support him or her out of their own wealth, they may take a reasonable and just amount from the orphan’s own wealth for that purpose. See 4:2–6; 6:152; 17:34.
29. The description of charity as a form of deriving “profit” from one’s wealth was an image that would have been especially salient for the Arabs of Makkah who made their living through the profitable investment of wealth.
30. The Arabic word used here is tazakkā, which is from the same root as zakāh, or mandatory charity, and which means both “to purify” and “to grow or increase.”
According to traditional commentators, 4:29 represented a prohibition against any wrongful or vain consumption or acquisition of wealth through gambling, usury, or other legally forbidden activities.
32. See 2:275–76, 278–80; 3:130. The Quran also mentions that the Jews were likewise forbidden usury; see 4:161.
Islamic Law developed the institution of the waqf, or donation of one’s entire estate or parts thereof for the establishment of a charitable foundation. In some cases a portion of the proceeds from the foundation were given to family members, but such a foundation, by definition, had to serve a larger public service, and waqfs were frequently used to establish schools, hospitals, and other public facilities.
34. The Quranic laws of inheritance allow for certain voluntary bequests of property prior to the division of the inheritance among relatives. Islamic Law typically limits the amount of wealth individuals may bequeath of their own will to one-third of the entire estate.
36. In other places, guarding one’s private parts is considered a sign of faithfulness among both men and women (see 23:5; 70:29).
37. It should be noted that the Quran prescribes stricter forms of veiling and seclusion for the wives of the Prophet, explicitly because of their unique status. See 33:32–33, 53.
Although each of these verses appears to assign a different legal status to the consumption of alcoholic beverages, the verse revealed latest in Muhammad’s prophetic career is considered to abrogate the legal rulings or implications of the earlier verses (although not the Divine status of those verses themselves). The recognition and identification of abrogating and abrogated verses became one of the most important procedures used by Muslim legal scholars to derive Islamic Law from the Quran. Muslim legal scholars have traditionally understood the different verses concerning alcohol consumption to represent a process of progressive limitation through which the Quran was able to “wean” the fledgling Islamic community gradually from alcoholic beverages entirely.
For example, if Muslims offer fellow Muslims the greeting “Peace be upon you,” it is not uncommon that they would be offered in reply the lengthier greeting “And upon you be peace, and the mercy and blessing of God!”

Intelligence in the Quranic sense differs from the modern usage of the term. In the Quran, the meaning of “intelligence” is much closer to the medieval Christian meaning, which was the ability to perceive first principles, particularly metaphysical truths, which constitute the paramount realization of true intelligence.
